

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

Legends of St. Cecilia.

By N. L. FROTHINGHAM.

I saw thee in Bologna's halls,
By Raphael's art portrayed,
Let drop the charming instruments
Thy skilful hand had played,
Listening to music more divine
Than man had ever made.

I loved that lifted, raptured face;
Loved what that scene expressed;
For sure the symphonies of heaven
Must ever be the best,
And there come strains from upper air
To every hearkening breast.

But there's another mystic tale,
Not told in magic paint;
It rises on my heart in tints
Not meaningless, nor faint,
And brings me closer to thy side,
Cecilia, minstrel saint!

She holds a bunch of flowers aloft,
Richer than earth's can be;
And none but the believing eye
Those matchless blooms can see;
She turns her face to mine, and thus
She cheers and counsels me:

"The world is full of fragrant gifts,
Which sensual eyes can ne'er discern;
But Faith the envious veil uplifts,
And man his truest vision then may learn.
Faith sees the flowers.

"The air is full of odors fine,
Which coarsest senses cannot miss;
And yet there needs a touch divine
To trace their source, or to receive their bliss;—
Faith sees the flowers.

"But there are weeds and thorny ground,
And vapors foul swoop from the sky;
And when you ask where Hope is found,
Or why these noisome, sad distempers,—why?
Faith still sees flowers.

"When grief is choking at the throat,
And fear is knocking at the heart,
And shattering thoughts the brain have smote
And loss, disaster, pain, inflict their smart,—
Faith sees the flowers;

"And when the powers and senses fail,
The end of earth now close at hand,
The flush of life all deathly pale,— Faith, in the gardens of the better land Shall see the flowers.

The Songs of Robert Franz.

[From ROBERT SCHUMANN'S "Collected Writings" we translate the following notice of the set of twelve songs (Op. 1.) with which FRANZ began his remarkable career as a song composer.]

About the songs of Robert Franz much may be said. They are no isolated appearance, and they stand in intimate connection with the whole development of our art during the last ten years. [This was written during, or shortly after, the year 1843.] It is well known, that from the year 1830 to 1834 a reaction arose against the reigning taste. The contest was in fact not difficult; it was a war against that commonplace ornamental style, which, with a few exceptions like Weber, Löwe and others, prevailed in all kinds of music, especially piano music. The attack began with piano music; in the place of pieces of mere passage work came pictures that were more full of thoughts; in which the influence of two masters was especially remarkable, that of Beethoven and of Bach. The number of disciples increased; the new life penetrated also into other departments. For the Song, Schubert had already labored as a pioneer, but more in the manner of Beethoven; while, on the other hand, in the production of the North Germans the influence of the Bach spirit manifested itself. To further this development, a new school of German poetry unfolded itself at the same time: Rückert and Eichendorff, although their bloom dates somewhat earlier, became more intimately known among musicians; but most of all Uhland and Heine were composed. Thus arose that more artistic and more deep-souled kind of song, of which their predecessors could of course know nothing, since it was only the new poetic spirit that reflected itself in music.

The songs of Robert Franz belong entirely to this noble new direction. This manufacturing of songs by the gross, which recites any bungler's poem with the same satisfaction as one of Rückert's, begins to be valued at its proper worth; and if the common public do not perceive the progress, to the better public it has long been clear. And in reality perhaps the Song is the only kind of music in which any important progress has been made since Beethoven. Compare, for example, in the songs before us, the careful conception of the subject, which would fain reproduce the thoughts of the poem even to the very word, with the negligence of the older treatment, where the poem merely ran along by the side of the music; compare the whole out-build here with the slovenly forms of accompaniment, of which the former time could not rid itself:—and only narrow minds can see the contrary.

In what has just been said the characteristic quality of Robert Franz's songs is already expressed; he would give us more than good or bad sounding music, he would reproduce to us the poem in its depth and to the life. In the quiet, dreamy element he succeeds best; yet we find also some things charmingly naïve, such as the first song ("Ihr Auge," or Burns's "Blue-eyed Lassie"); and then the "Tanzlied in Mai" (Dance Song in May); and more spirited ebullitions, as in some of the songs from Burns.

This double set of songs awakens a succession of the most various images and feelings; a somewhat melancholy would fain steal in through all the rest. These songs for their delivery require singers, poets, men; but they may best be sung alone, and then about the evening hour.

Some few details offend my ear, such as the beginning of the 7th and 12th songs ("Sonntag" and "In meinem Garten die Nelken"); for instance, the oft recurring E natural in the last. One of them, the 7th, I could wish entirely left out of the collection; it seems to me in melody and harmony too far-fetched. All that remains is interesting, significant, and often singularly beautiful. To the "Slumber Song" of Tieck I could wish a more musically rich conclusion; but in spite of this it is one of the most felicitous.—Were one to begin citing individual fine traits, there would be no end; persons who are deeply and truly musical will find them out themselves.

These songs then are distinct enough from others. But one, who has made such a beginning, must not wonder if the future makes still higher claims on him. Successes in small genres often lead to one-sidedness, to mannerism. Let the young artist defend himself against that by seizing hold of new Art forms: let him try to express his rich inward wealth in other ways than through the voice. Our sympathy will surely follow him throughout.

Broadwood & Sons' Pianofortes.*

[In the following "Historical Introduction," taken from the pamphlet whose full title will be found in the foot-note below, the Messrs. Broadwood & Sons have made a valuable contribution to the history of the Piano-Forte.]

Before entering upon a technical description of the instruments, and organic parts of instruments representing the mechanical, musical, and ornamental features of our work, which at the second International Exhibition we have the honor to offer, as the results of considerably more than a century's experience, we may, perhaps, be allowed to trace, step by step, in a few sentences as the subject will permit, the progress of our firm in the art of manufacturing that particular structure, which now, in its advanced state of perfection, is recognized all over the civilized world under the name of Grand Pianoforte. The mere personal records of our house would naturally possess but little interest for the public generally; but those who care to learn how the ancient Harpsichord, with its thin wires and tinkling sound, has expanded, by degrees, into the splendid instrument now in general use, and, with musicians, in such universal esteem—how, in short, the Grand Pianoforte has attained its present comprehensive character, both with regard to "action" and to "tone"—may not be unprepared to accord a few minutes' attention to an account of the means by which an establishment, perhaps, among European houses, not the least enterprising, has done its part in expediting the desired progress.

As preliminary, it may be mentioned that, in 1732, Burkhardt Tschudi† came to London, established himself at No. 33, Great Pulteney Street, and was appointed harpsichord-maker to the court of George II.; and that, at the death of Tschudi (in 1773), John Broadwood, who had married one of his daughters, succeeded to the business. In 1838, James Shudi Broadwood, son and successor to the said John Broadwood, virtual founder of our house, occupied his leisure hours by compiling some notes relative to the history of piano-manufacture, from the early harpsichord to the grand pianoforte, at the stage of comparative perfection, which, in his day, the latter had already reached. A condensed version of these notes, together with such additions and comments as they may occasionally suggest, will fill the larger portions of the succeeding pages.

The harpsichords made in England during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, were chiefly imported from Antwerp, the manufacturers being John and Andrew Ruckers.†. At the end of the last century many of these instruments, in thorough preservation, still existed in London, bearing dates from 1569 to 1620. They were in japanned or painted cases, with gilded ornaments, and emblematic devices under the covers. Their tone was sweet and silvery, their mechanism simple. Two strings were tuned in unison, while a third—attached to a separate bridge on the sounding board—was tuned an octave above. In three pieces of wood (technically denominated "jacks") were inserted quills, resting on one and the same key, the key, when pressed down, causing the strings to be "twanged" by the quills, and producing the combined sound of unisons and octaves. These harpsichords had generally two rows of keys, the upper row communicating merely with a single unison string, the lower with the three strings simultaneously—the only method at that time invented for augmenting and diminishing, ad libitum, the volume of tone.

The first who made harpsichords in London was supposed to be a Fleming of the name of Tabel, who had practised at Antwerp with the successors of Ruckers, and resided in England between 1680 and 1720. To this Tabel were apprenticed Jacob Kirkman, a German, and Burkhardt Tschudi, a Swiss, who, at the decease of their patron, established two manufactories—Kirkman, one in Broad-street, Golden square; and Tschudi§ (now writing his name Shudi), one in Great-Puteney-street, at the house subsequently occupied by his immediate successor John Broadwood, and at the present time by the said John Broadwood's grandsons, actual representatives of the firm. Both Jacob Kirkman and Shudi did much towards the improvement of the harpsichord, the chief aim of the latter, however, being to carry out those principles which the Ruckers had given to their instruments that peculiarly free vibration and silvery tone for which they were renowned. A mechanical appliance was invented about 1750, by means of which a diminution of two-thirds of the full force of the instrument could be obtained at the discretion of the performer; but it was not till 1770, when John Broadwood patented his so-called "Venetian Swell" which gave to the foot of the player a power of modifying the intensity of tone somewhat similar to that appertaining to the swell of the organ—that any intermediate variety was obtained. Many amateurs and professors of the pianoforte will doubtless remember the performances of Herr Moscheles,|| in 1837, at the Hanover-Square Rooms and elsewhere, on a grand harpsichord, made by Burkhardt Shudi in 1761,¶ to which the "Venetian Swell" of John Broadwood was attached. This instrument, and another—inscribed "Burkhardt Shudi e Johannes Broadwood, 1773"** both in excellent preservation, may still be seen at our manufactory in Great Putney-street.

For many years Kirkman carried all before him in London, as harpsichord-maker, Burkhardt Shudi being somewhat too independent and unaccommodating to make his way so readily. A powerful friend, however, a constant guest at his table, and a staunch admirer of his instruments—no other than the immortal Handel himself—stood the latter in good stead; and chiefly through the patronage of that great man, Shudi's business gradually began to increase, and soon became considerable. His fame as a manufacturer ultimately spread over the continent; and a picture (in our possession) attributed to Zoffany, represents him tuning a grand harpsichord, which he actually sent over to Berlin as a present to Frederick the Great, just after the battle of Prague (Shudi being himself a zealous upholder of the protestant cause in Germany, and believing that the King of Prussia was one of its most earnest and powerful champions). The Schweizerische Lexicon (see note to page 8) gives 1765 as the date of the instrument forwarded to Frederick the Great, but the family tradition is not likely to be unfounded, and as the battle of Prague was fought in 1757, the date is evidently erroneous. For 1765 read 1758. Ten or twelve years ago, the harpsichord sent as a present to the king was still at Potsdam, together with some original Silbermann pianofortes††, small oblong "squares" developed from the old spinet, just as the grand pianoforte, to which the German title "Flügel" has descended, was, as will presently be shown, developed from the grand harpsichord. The German square is denominated Tafelformat, "table-shape." Near the middle of the eighteenth century, others took to the business of harpsichord-making in London; but all—including Baker Harris, Faulkner, and the rest—were, more or less, imitators of Kirkman and Shudi. Baker Harris was especially fortunate with the spinet, a kind of diminutive harpsichord.

From the spinets came the square pianoforte, at one time generally in use, at present—for evident reasons (being as unsightly in frame as it is, and must inevitably remain, meagre, and otherwise unsatisfactory in tone)—going out of fashion. The first square pianoforte ever seen in this country was brought over from Germany, by a well-known harpsichord-maker, named John Zumpe, about 1768 or 1769.‡‡ Specimens of these instruments were multiplied by Zumpe, on his return to England, after a visit to his relations in Germany; but his principal object—notwithstanding the new mechanism, which pointed towards material progress—was still to imitate the tone of the harpsichord. The origin of the name "pianoforte" (or, as it was first styled, "Forte-piano") is derived from Zumpe's instruments, the construction of which differed essentially from that of the harpsichord—the uniform and unmodifiable "twang" of the "plectrum" being replaced by a device of percussion, in the shape of a "hammer," which, however rude in its appliance, for the first time enabled the performer to play loud and soft, at discretion. Notwithstanding this advantage, however, the square pianoforte, and even its subsequently illustrious and usurping cousin, the "Grand," were for a long period regarded as of so little importance by musicians, that the half of the lower bass octave which—ordinarily embracing five octaves and a half from C:—

was considered indispensable to the harpsichord, used to be altogether omitted, the scale almost universally adopted for the instrument being five octaves—F to F. When, some time later, John Broadwood applied a thicker covering of leather to the hammers of the "Square," through which means a softer and sweeter tone was produced—so fixed was the prejudice in favor of the crisp, wiry sound of the harpsichord, that the most practised players of the day condemned the innovation, pronouncing the new tone "wooden, flat, and dull." Contemporary makers, however,§§ enlarging the dimensions of the pianoforte, gradually enriched its tone. But the most striking improvement at that period was furnished by John Broadwood, whose "brass dampers" and "new modeling" (for which he took out a patent) laid the foundation of a complete and salutary revolution in the mechanical construction of the instrument. The "brass dampers" have long gone into disuse; but the "new modeling"||| has been since adopted by all the most noted European manufacturers.

Meanwhile, the grand pianoforte (to which, further on, we shall more directly allude) had come into vogue; and much of its brilliancy was attributable to the extra keys, which (at the suggestion of his friend, J. L. Dussek)¶¶ John Broadwood had introduced. This invention was greedily seized on by the manufacturers of the "square"; but, unhappily, what in the instance of the "grand" (owing to its wide scope and particular conformation) was a manifest advantage, in the comparatively diminutive "square" was as manifest a deterioration, only partially remedied when one William Southwell (of Dublin) increased the dimensions of the "sounding board," and invented the "damper," since in general use. To this William Southwell we owe the "vertical" or "cabinet" pianoforte, constructed after a sketch presented to him by James Shudi Broadwood, in 1804.*** To Broadwood's sketch, and Southwell's application of it, all the modern upright pianofortes, both of foreign and English manufacture, are mainly indebted; and although at the time, Southwell could not succeed in disposing of the patent he had taken out, the new instrument, partly owing to its peculiar quality of tone, partly, when compared with the square, to its superior advantages as a piece of furniture for a drawing-room—obtained universal favor, "bidding fair" (employing the precise words of James Shudi Broadwood), "to generally supersede the present small or square pianoforte"—a prediction triumphantly verified by the subsequent popularity of the earlier oblique, as well as vertical-stringed "cottages," of which (among others) the long-defunct houses of Tomkinson and Wilkinson produced such generally admired specimens.

* INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION, 1862. List of Pianofortes, and of various samples and models, intended to illustrate the principles of their manufacture, exhibited by Messrs. Broadwood & Sons, London, with an historical introduction, explanatory remarks and illustrative plates and diagrams.

† The supplement to the Schweizerische Lexicon (Zurich, 1786), in a general account of the Tschudis (originally a noble Swiss family), contains the following about Burkhardt, or Burkhard, Tschudi: "From the Schwauden branch also descended Burkhard (Tschudi), a poor journeyman cabinet maker, who came to England and became famous at the Court in London as a harpsichord maker. Among other beautiful things, he made for the king of Prussia, in 1766, an elegant harpsichord with two manuals. Burkhard Tschudi married in London, where he died in 1773." The harpsichord mentioned in the above extract was, not many years since, in the palace at Potsdam, where, in all probability, it still remains. After working for a time with Tabel (an esteemed pupil of the celebrated Ruckers) Burkhard Tschudi (in 1782) established himself as a manufacturer, at 38, Great Putney Street, Golden Square, the business-residence of the present firm of John Broadwood & Sons.

‡ John (Jean, or Hans) Ruckers, the most renowned of the ancient manufacturers of the clavier, harpsichord, or spinet (Spinett), lived at Antwerp at the end of the sixteenth and beginning of the seventeenth centuries. A son—Andrew (André), born at Antwerp, at the commencement of the seventeenth century, and who lived till about 1670—made great improvements on his father's work, both as regards tone and finish. The most celebrated Flemish painters used to ornament the instruments of Andrew Ruckers with devices, the value of which was esteemed so highly that when the pianoforte had thrown the harpsichord into disuse, many of the finest specimens were destroyed for the sake of the panels. About 1770, a good harpsichord of Ruckers used to fetch as much as 8,000 francs (£120). Handel's harpsichord, now in possession of our house, was made by Andrew Ruckers, in 1681.

¶ The identical instrument played upon by Herr Ernst Pauer, this year, at his recent concert (in Willis's Rooms), in illustration of the History of Pianoforte Composition.

** Broadwood married Shudi's daughter in 1769; and, at the death of the latter (in 1773), entered into partnership with the son and successor, who styled himself Burkhardt Shudi.

†† The Pianofortes manufactured by Silbermann (of Freiburg) pleased Frederick the Great so much that he resolved to buy them all up at once, and was soon in possession of fifteen of them. Upon every one of these the celebrated John Sebastian Bach was invited to play, when (in 1747 at Potsdam—three years before his death)—at the request of Charles Philip Emanuel Bach, who had been for some years in the Royal service—he paid his first and last visit to the King. It was here that Bach received from the King the subject for a fugue, which was subsequently amplified into an elaborate piece, entitled Musicalisches Opfer "Musical Offering," and dedicated to His Majesty. A detailed and interesting account of this is given by Bach's biographer, J. N. Forkel, who adds that (even in his time) the whole of Silbermann's pianofortes remained in the palace, unfit for use.

‡‡ The French Piano à queue, like the German Flügel, or "wing-instrument" equivalent to the English "Grand"; and the French Piano carré, like the German Tafelformat, or "Table-form" equivalent to the English "Square," were gradually developed from these instruments—not by Frenchmen, but by the apprentices and followers of Silbermann, at Strasburg and Freiburg—to which fact the Alsatian Burkhardt (Erard), and Pleyel, the German Herr, &c., bear witness.

§§ In some imperfect remains of old books connected with the transactions of our house, we find allusions to a small F F (five octave) Square Pianoforte, dated 1760.

|| Beyer, Buntebart and Böhm (all Germans as may be guessed from their names.)

||| A device by which the wrest (or tuning) pins were placed at the further extremity of the keys, instead of, as before, in a block to the right of the sounding-board—a modification of the first importance, whether its influence upon the tone of the instrument or its capacity for keeping it in tune be taken into consideration.

¶¶ Born at Caslau (Bohemia), Feb. 9, 1761; died at St. Germain-en-Laye (near Paris), March 20, 1812.

*** The upright grand pianoforte, which had existed many years in advance of this, were merely instruments erected vertically on a box with four legs. The upright "Cabinet" of Southwell differed from these in certain mechanical arrangements, unnecessary here to describe.

BY CHARLES LAMB.

Some cry up Haydn, some Mozart,
Just as the whim bites. For my part,
I do not care a farthing candle
For either of them: nor for Handel.
Cannot a man live free and easy,
Without admiring Pergolesi?
Or thro' the world with comfort go,
That never heard of Doctor Blow?
So help me heaven! I hardly have;
And yet I eat, and drink, and shave
Like other people, if you watch it,
And know no more of stave or crotchet
Than did the primitive Peruvians,
Or those old ante-queer diluvians
That lived in the unwashed world with Tubal,
Before that dirty blacksmith, Jubal,
By stroke on anvil, or by summ'at,
Found out, t' his great surprise, the gamut.
I care no more for Cimarosa
Than he did for Salvator Rosa,
Being no painter: and had luck
Be mine, if I can hear that Gluck.
Old Tycho Brahe and modern Herschel
Had something in 'em; but who's Purcell?
The devil with his foot so cloven,
For aught I care, may take Beethoven;
And, if the bargain does not suit,
I'll throw him Weber in, to boot.
There's not the splitting of a splinter
To choose 'twixt him last named and Winter.
Of Doctor Pepusch, old Queen Dido
Know just as much, Heaven knows, as I do.
I would not go four miles to visit
Sebastian Bach—or Batch—which is it?
No more I would for Bononcini.
As for Novello and Rossini,
I shall not say a word to grieve 'em,
Because they're living—so I leave 'em!

English Vocalists.

I. MR. BARTLEMAN.

James Bartleman, the finest and most intellectual bass-singer of his own, or indeed, any other time, was educated as a chorister in St. Peter's, Westminster, under the celebrated Dr. Cooke, and maintained his place before the public in the Ancient and Vocal Concerts, of which latter he was, together with Messrs. Knyvett, Harrison, Vaughan, and Grestorex (the conductor), one of the original proprietors, as well as at the Lent oratorios, and all private concerts, for a period of nearly thirty years. Bartleman was a man of an original and enthusiastic cast of mind, which undoubtedly would have enabled him to excel in any walk of art he undertook. By his powerful talent he contributed to keep alive the passion for Purcell's and Handel's music, which at that time, together with the great Italian masters, Pergolesi, Jomelli, &c., almost exclusively enjoyed the favor of the musical public. With a low barytone voice not of great power, not remarkable either for sweetness or roundness of tone, this highly-gifted singer produced effects by mental energy and a just conception of the characters he for the time represented in his songs, that made a lasting impression upon his auditors. His style was at once bold, commanding, and illuminated whatever it glanced upon. With a fancy lively to an extreme degree, and a chastened temperance which he derived from his education in the church, the dramatic effect, visible in all his efforts, was refined and rendered fit for the more polished singing of the chamber and concert room. The songs he made his own were, "O rud-dier than the cherry" in Acis and Galatea, which before he sang it was always considered a rude and unmanageable composition; those who had the good fortune to hear him, cannot, even at this distance of time, (1838) forget the highly dramatic and spirited manner in which he delivered that remarkable song. "Thus saith the Lord to Cyrus his anointed," was another of his chef-d'œuvres; here the magnificent conception of his author kept alive the interest to the very last note of the song. But, perhaps, his greatest triumph was in Purcell's music; the enormously difficult phrases in "Let the dreadful engines of eternal will" he so alternately elevated and subdued, according to the sentiment so powerfully embodied by our native composer, blending the several gradations of passion with delicacy and precision, while, at the same time, his whole strength was tasked to the utmost that the effect upon the auditor, it is no exaggeration to say, was perfectly astounding.

The frost scene in King Arthur was another of those pieces in which his just and bold conception of the dramatic effect which ought to attend the Cold Genius—produced a freezing sensation on the hearer. His tremulous tones seemed actually to issue from some ice-bound cavern, where lay the shivering, slumbering Genius. If Bartleman had sung this on the stage, it would have been referred to as one of those efforts of his art that would have taken rank with Pasta's personification of Medea; for no one who knew him could doubt that his acting would have been as fine as his singing.

"Rising unwillingly and slow,
From beds of everlasting snow,"

Dr. Calcott, one of the first glee writers of his day, was a personal friend of Bartleman, and wrote for him "Angel of life," "These as they change," and one or two other songs now forgotten, which, in his hands, retained their places in public estimation for many years. The glees "Peace to the souls of the heroes," "Who comes so dark," "Red cross knight," all owed their great success principally to Bartleman's singing; although due merit must be accorded to the vocal party who constantly sang with him, and contributed to the unity of effect so indispensable to this style of vocal composition, as yet unrivalled by foreign composers. Horsley's fine glee, "Cold is Cadwallo's tongue," was another of this mentally-gifted singer's favorite specimens, exhibiting the power obtained by superior reading of his poetry. For him Stevens composed "Some of my heroes are low," a work conceived in the true Ossianic spirit of the poem.

There is another fine glee now seldom or never heard, "Mona on Snowdon calls," written by Dr. Crotch, in which both expression and effect were considerably enhanced by the superior style in which Bartleman led the principal bass part.

As, in point of science, few singers ever attained to the knowledge he possessed of the business of an orchestra, in drilling and training the vocalists for the madrigals and other full vocal pieces, then forming the principal attraction as concerted music, at the original Vocal and other concerts, it might be imagined that in singing the more simple style of English ballads Bartleman would not succeed, because of the danger arising, as the vulgar suppose, from too much learning; but, happily, such was not the case; for, among others, in the pure and beautiful little song written by Robert Cooke, "Farewell to the nymph of my heart," the utter abandonment of grief from constant separation was so strongly portrayed by the singer, that we well remember on one occasion several ladies were taken out fainting from the concert room at the close of the song. Neither time nor space will allow of our enumerating all the beauties that this eminent artist created; neither should we condescend, but with the utmost contempt, to notice the party formed against him in his latter days of public exertion, at the head of which was a provincial critic, who prided himself upon discovering the mare's nest, that Bartleman had faults in his singing! Now his greatest admirers never denied this fact, which applies equally, as a blot of human imperfection, to most of the greatest men who ever lived; and without the malice which swayed the aforesaid narrow-minded and self-sufficient person, candor will readily acknowledge what these faults were,—too great a breadth in pronunciation upon certain words, maan, for man; luard for lord, &c.; and too great a propensity to open the mouth in the contrary manner to what the Italians term "bocca ridente." These errors, if persons came purposely to watch for them, were easily discovered. In the same manner, in viewing one of Claude's pictures, we may notice how inferior are his oxen and sheep to all other parts of his landscape; but we contend that these by no means destroy that great master's productions as works of high art. So Bartleman's faults were forgotten by all unprejudiced persons when he was singing. They only heard his energetic style, his bold conception of his author, his complete identification with both poet and composer, and the unabating spirit which carried him on, even while suffering the severest torture from a painful internal disorder which afflicted him for years, exercising his great talents, and keeping the English professors together by his zeal and attainments, as well as by his integrity and kindness to all who required either advice or assistance from him. It does not appear that any particular incident occurred in his life of alternate suffering and study, that could interest the reader, excepting one, which showed his independent spirit.

During a rehearsal at the Ancient Concerts, Lord Darnley (a proud, haughty nobleman, who was one of the directors), made a remark, in his dictatorial manner, that something was wrong while Bartleman was singing, and intimated that he (Mr. B) was the perpetrator of the erroneous passage. Bartleman, who not only knew his business eminently well, but was also aware of the total ignorance of his rebaker, said a few, not the most placable, words in his own peculiar way, to the effect that perhaps his lordship would condescend to take his place in the orchestra and perform it more to his own satisfaction, instantly quitted the rooms in a towering passion, "being so pestered by a popinjay," and went home, leaving the rehearsal of onerous pieces for the principal bass unfinished. He declared he never would utter another note there again; and it was only by the mediation of friends who persuaded my lord to make the amende honorable, which, after a week had elapsed, he did in a very handsome and satisfactory manner. In this little fracas was exhibited the value this great singer set upon his own exertions; and although on the score of politeness, perhaps, the action is not to be imitated, still it serves to show how powerless are even rank, wealth, and influence, against determined talent, energy, and consummate skill; for had he then left the Ancient Concerts, they must have dwindled into utter insignificance for want of his powerful aid.

It is not known that Bartleman ever composed either song or glee. He was a good performer on the violoncello, and possessed a large and valuable library of music, which after his decease was sold by auction, and the respectable auctioneer ran away with the proceeds, which thus became lost to his two sisters who survived him.

In summing up the merits of this great English singer, we may say that the chief points he made were a poetical reading of his author, without affectation or bombast, a never tiring energy of style, resulting from his strong feeling of the situation in which the person represented was supposed to be placed, and to which the mere musical notes were always rendered subservient, both in time and style, a true devotional sense of the high class of composition* he spent the greater part of his life in illustrating, and a determination always to support the interests of his art, and of his brother professors to the utmost.

* This reminds us of that lovely song by Pergolesi, "O Lord have mercy upon me." Can any forget who heard it, the slow melancholy shake upon the words, "My strength faileth me," and the electrical burst of tone in the last movement, "But my hope hath been in thee, O Lord!"

Moritz Hauptmann.

(From the Musical Review and World.)

The abundant and useful instruction which the student of art may gain from the study of Hauptmann's polyphonic and fugued themes, will be still further-increased and more easily attained by an acquaintance with our author's theoretical writings. They are peculiarly adapted to assist the learner towards an independent judgment as to works of art and artistic forms. His deep, inclusive criticism on the works of Bach and Klengel; his clear explanation of Bach's "Art of the fugue;" his grounding in those rules that step forward, one after the other through the history of art, according to natural laws; excites the student to careful observation, and a lofty, clear understanding of all artistic inventions and phenomena.

From the introduction to the review of Klengel's fugues and canons, many musical critics may learn that modesty, which is so much needed in a portion of the musical world. Such criticisms as Hauptmann has written, might be taken as a pattern by some of our musical writers; and from them they would learn that truthful opinions and criticisms can only proceed from a perfect understanding of theory, and an entire mastery of practice. How admirably Hauptmann places Klengel's value in the right light, adding to his analysis a view of Klengel's life that puts it clearly before the reader, while in a few words he brings forward his most distinguished qualities, and points out to the student all that is most valuable and useful in them. In the preface to John Sebastian Bach's Masses in F, A, G, and G minor, our author proves himself to be a deep thinker and inquirer. He compares Bach's great mastery over technical means with that of Haydn, showing that while Haydn arranged his oratorio, "The Last Words of our Saviour," from seven orchestral adagios which he had written for Passion-week, Bach undertook the far more difficult task, to accommodate choirs to ready written orchestral themes. "This was an undertaking," says Hauptmann, "such as only Sebastian Bach would set about and the completion of which is all the more to be admired in him, as it would have cost him less trouble to write new music." Our author then goes on to the description of the different masses, and gives various readings of them from the manuscripts before him. He clearly proves how Sebastian Bach completed his masses from other pieces of music, and fortifies his opinions by the evidence of other learned writers on music, Mosewius for instance, in his work "Sebastian Bach's church cantatas and chorals." In his critical explanations, Hauptmann steps prominently forward as an historical searcher; his principle was, truth before every consideration in historical development; in this he resembled Humboldt, to whom the truth of natural laws was an impalpable and sacred thing.

In his "Explanations of J. S. Bach's 'Art of the Fugue,'" our author says, that this work will be principally valued for its instructiveness, although the 20 pieces of music contained in the work, regarded merely for their musical and poetic worth, witness every moment to the powers of the lofty master. He then goes on to the thematic development, and reminds the student, how fitted are the counter movements of the major and minor modes, to the subversions of a fugued theme. He then analyzes the 14 fugues and 4 canons in a brief and simple manner, clearly bringing out the principal points of each, afterwards treating of the 2 fugues for 2 pianos. Finally, he says of Bach's uncompleted fugue, that this work, even in its incomplete form, must be regarded, both on account of its intrinsic merit, and as the last work of Sebastian Bach, as a valuable supplement, but as nothing more, since the book is complete without it. And something of what Hauptmann says, in his noble enthusiasm for Bach, at the close of the work, is not altogether inapplicable to himself.

The experience of a whole artistic life, at least so far as regards theoretic inquiry, is laid down by Hauptmann in his "Nature of Harmonics and Metrics." In this work Hauptmann reached a point in the history of art, from which all theorists must in future start. With S. Bach the chain of theoretic combinations closed. The theoretic rules, which, like peculiar systems in the history of philosophy, stepped forward in the course of experience, both before and after Bach, have been explained, with more or less success, in the many books on theory. But, so far, these rules had only found their use in the practice of our most prominent composers, especially J. S. Bach.

Was it not then probable, that many in the later times would say, that free creation in art was quite sufficient, without being too strongly bound to the rules of established forms? and that what is called "aesthetic feeling," was the sovereign judge of musical composition? But feeling readily goes astray into wrong paths, when it is not supported by reasonable thinking. The lunatic has feeling; but logical power of thinking he is utterly destitute of. It was easy to come to fallacious conclusions regarding the laws of art, because early composers had succeeded just as well as the later, with all history and theory at their command, so long as proof was wanting that such conclusions were sophistical. These errors were certain to spread, and to find ready assent in our times, so long as they were only opposed by an abstract theoretic system, and until it was fully proved that this system is rooted in the human mind, and that it rests upon natural laws. The merit of bringing forward this proof belongs to Hauptmann only, and for this he stands alone in the history of art. In his book "The nature of harmonics and metrics," the main substance of the musical system of tones is clearly explained to be founded in the human nature, according to unalterable laws, and it is proved that "correct musical expression in composition is always natural, human, reasonable, and generally intelligible." As ideas are developed in the universal intellect of man, which, by means of logical thinking, become clear conceptions and comprehensive principles, whose results are intelligible expressions,—so arise musical ideas in the musical intellect; but if these are not correctly ordered by means of reasonable and logical thinking, they will never become clear conceptions, and still less intelligible forms. They rather become erroneous results; something that is never born of a sound brain. So Hauptmann says: "That which is musically inadmissible, is so, not because it is opposed to certain rules set down by musicians, but because it is contrary to laws set down by human nature to the musician; because it is logically untrue, a contradiction throughout. An error in music is a logical error, a fault according to the universal human mind, not a fault to the musical mind in particular. That which is musically right and correct, appeals to us in a humanly intelligible manner."—"That which is erroneous does not appeal to us as the expression of something incorrect; it does not appeal to us at all; it finds no response within us, we cannot understand it, for it has not any meaning."—"Music hath no indefinite sense; it speaks to humanity, and speaks only that which is felt by humanity. A manifold significance only appears in music, when each one seeks to find, in any peculiar musical idea, his own particular impression; when we strive to fix the flowing being of music, and to speak that which is inexpressible."

The gift of imparting knowledge is not granted to all great men. But all who had the good fortune to know Hauptmann as a teacher, acknowledged that a better instructor for cultivated circles could not be found. Our master developed the talent of his scholars with equal carefulness both in general and in detail; while in that grounding which is notably the most difficult task of the teacher, he especially excelled. His amiability and kindness were so remarkable, that among the immense number of his pupils, not one has been found to make the slightest complaint of his failure in this respect. And, full of humanity, he was always ready to assist others where it was possible to him.

Musical Delusions of John Bull.

I am always put in the very best of humors when I receive the Musical World, a journal costing sixteen shillings a year, and published in London.

It is almost incredible what an enormous number of vocal associations, monster concerts, musical festivals and Philharmonic clubs* there are in England, how many doctors of counterpoint and fugue, and how many enthusiastic amateurs who swear only by Mozart, Beethoven, Weber, Handel and Mendelssohn.

Nations, like individuals, have always an inclination to shine by those very qualities in which they are totally deficient. England desires, at any price, to be accounted a musical nation, and its reason for this is because it consumes a prodigious quantity of music. We might with as much justice say it was a wine country, because it drinks a great deal of champagne and claret.

England is indebted for its music, its aesthetics and everything connected with vocalism and instrumentalism to the Germans, the Italians and the French. A feeling for Art with difficulty strikes root in an English organization. England is everything: coals, roast-beef, bales of cotton, and ginger-beer, except music. Every germ of art is smothered at its very birth under the factory, the counting-house, the shop, and the hurry of business. A man must devote his energies to obtain what is necessary, and Heaven knows how much is necessary in England, before he can think of what is unnecessary, like art and poetry. As long as a man does not possess an income of a thousand a year, a brilliant establishment, and a colossal stock of linen, he remains in the category of the "mob." In order to obtain "honorability," in order to be able to sustain the part of a "gentleman," a man must work frantically, trade and cheat, for the purpose of making money; that is the great battle-cry, the banner, the universal object, "Make money!" The Englishman who owns no patent of nobility, no landed estate, no exchequer bonds, must do nothing but "make money." On this soil, put in tilth and sowed wholly and solely for positive life, the Ideal is a plant of luxury, and the fine arts unnatural wants.

I am extremely sorry for the Musical World, but I am compelled to repeat a thousand times: England is not a musical country. and it can boast of no musical world, unless we regard as such the paper which has assumed the name.

Nature herself, however is to blame for this. In the first place, an Englishman can no more sing than a South American dog can bark; he has no voice, no speech, no melody. The voice is disorganized simultaneously with its birth, immediately the mouth begins to masticate English. It is a well-known fact that the vowels a and e are the first elements of singing; they constitute the principal and fundamental tone-color in music. But Englishmen have no a; it speedily degenerates into a dull, undecided o, which can never make up its mind to be a frank, honest e; or else a is changed into e, but, ah, what an e!—an e which sounds like the point of a knife, and cuts its way through the air.

The same is true of the other vowels, for all tones, immediately they proceed from an English gullet, are spoilt; they come as bastards into the world.

But if we must pity the vowels, how much more ought we to pity the poor consonants, for they are born, as it were, with broken limbs.

In addition to all this, the English vocabulary contains myriads of words of one syllable, and persons speaking, instead of pronouncing each word separately and distinctly, for this would take up too much time, make a single mouthful of three or four words, which they chew together, swallowing some, chewing some over again, and hurling out the rest with the hissing of a viper—and this is called speaking English.

Who would sing in such a language?

SOUV. KROUT.

* Thus spelt by the talented author of the article, which we take from a Berlin paper.—T. V. BRIDGMAN.

The Choral, or Psalm Tune.

1. The character of the tune should accord with the sanctity of the place and occasion.
2. It should be such as to allow the meanest and most untutored person in the congregation readily to unite.
3. It should be free from monotony and dullness.
4. It should be united to the subject of the Psalm or Hymn with which it is connected.

1. The rule is violated when tunes are introduced of a light and frivolous character.

Were the pieces, indeed, of a superior excellence,—the characteristic productions of some master spirits—if we dare not plead their toleration, we should yet seal their banishment with regret. But in most instances their character is widely different. Not only do they fail to promote edification, but continually violate those principles of musical taste, which are almost intuitive in every mind. The anthems, fugues, psalm-tunes, and other pieces in general use throughout the country, are as a body, beneath criticism: they have noise, and that is all. They possess none of that exquisite blending of sound and idea which long lingers in the affection, and in moments of thoughtfulness and melancholy musing, is ever at hand to soothe or to enliven. The fact is, that, in general, they claim neither sweetness of melody nor breadth of harmony, and the mind wearies itself with the attempt to shape that which is evidently shapeless, and bring the noisy and discordant particles to something of a consistent form.

It is not uncommon for the well-intentioned persons who have been captivated by some secular melody of the day, to introduce it into the church. It is possible that its complexion might not be unsuited to the sanctity of the service to which it is applied; yet the associations connected with it are sufficient to render it a most unfit medium of spiritual communications. When, for instance, the pleasing melody of the tune called "Prospect" is performed in the church, no words, however sacred, can blot from the mind every remembrance of the equally pleasing but profane lines of Ben Jonson, to which they were originally composed. Besides that there is a want of proper feeling and correct taste in going elsewhere to gather the glittering tinsel of theatrical music, when the richest bullion of untouched gold lies neglected at our very feet.

Similar to this is the custom of mutilating some masterly and splendid sacred composition of a more extended character, and obliging it in contempt of its original design, to usurp, in a cramped and altered form, the place of the genuine Psalm tune. Nothing can be more wanton and needless than the efforts made to accommodate the works of great masters to a purpose not originally contemplated.

2. As with other things, so with music.—

"When evils come, they come not single spies,
But in battalions."

The tunes of the character just specified are further objectionable, as they generally involve the violation of our second rule. They present obstacles to that unity, which is the chief charm of congregational Psalmody; and this in many ways. First, by their lightness and rapidity. All great bodies move slowly. They possess power; but they require time to develop it and space to apply it, otherwise their strength becomes weakness, by their efforts falling short of their object.

If then the tune be designed for the mass of a congregation, it must be satisfied to assume a deliberate character, abounding in minims and semibreves, and not in crotchets and quavers.

Again, the sudden and marked transitions of many tunes of this kind present needless difficulties, passing from one chord to another through a strange and unexpected interval, without breaking the fall by some easy and leading note. Far from being an inherent defect, this is frequently a great beauty, and some of our most original and magnificent harmonies abound in the most startling transitions. But such are manifestly unsuited to a mixed assembly, where the composition should be as simple as the performance is rough. If when the tune is steadily pursuing a straight track, time and patience are requisite for the proper development of each several note, it is natural to suppose that any unexpected break will be likely to occasion confusion.

Hence the necessity of choosing tunes not only grave in character, but simple and flowing in their design. The opposite practice is one cause why, in many parishes, the ground has been so exclusively occupied by the singers. Nothing could better answer their end of monopolizing the psalmody to themselves than the adoption of such tunes as were too rapid or rugged for the congregation. Idleness is not the most general natural infirmity of man; and there can be little doubt but that, had the tune been suited to the capacities of the multitude, there had been less cause to complain of their silence. Let music once be intelligible, and it will soon wind itself into the affections of the people.

Another obstacle that comes under this head is the complex character of many tunes. This is especially seen in those miserable compositions that are presented to many a country congregation under the prostituted name of fugues. In the performance of such pieces, the people ignorant of the first principles of musical science, have no choice—they must either be silent, or they mar the music! Away then with all country fugues and anthems, if we seek to cherish real psalmody!

Another class of tunes, without assuming the scientific appellation of fugues, display a fondness for occasional division of parts perfectly advisable in extended compositions, executed by a practised choir, but only apt to bewilder a congregation. When the treble is left to perform singly, and the bass has its pauses and places of conjunction to mark, the mind of the singer is too much engrossed to feel the benefit of a spiritual exercise, and the people at large are utterly precluded from a cordial participation. They are continually at fault. But this species of tune brings with it another evil. The scope of a plain verse is found far too narrow for its full development. Hence the necessity of embarrassing repetitions of words, lines and even syllables. Now, if repetitions are at all admissible, it may only be when neither musical nor poetical properties are in any respect violated. For this purpose the composer must adapt his composition to certain words; and if as in translations, it be necessary to apply other words to the same composition, it is easy to see that great skill, patience and ingenuity are requisite to prevent violations of rhythm and accent. What bound there can be set to such violations, when a tune demanding constant repetitions is applied arbitrarily to the successive verses of a hymn, without any other restriction than its accordance with the general measure? The less repetition and network there is in plain psalm tune, the less confusion will there be in its performance; and in vain shall we look for a thorough reformation of our psalmody, till the entire adoption and restoration of the good old church tune in all its ancient rights and privileges. There alone is found that freedom from light runs, sudden transitions, ornamented flourishes, rapid movements, and perplexing repetitions, which are sure to blur over all attempts to give full energy to this most interesting and influential portion of divine worship.

3. It may be imagined that the species of tune recommended in the foregoing remarks, cannot possess that life and energy so necessary to sustain the popular attention. Hence the objection has arisen that what is gained in facility of execution is lost in diminution of interest; and that, without noise and motion, the musical feelings of a congregation must remain torpid. Now, if languor were a necessary adjunct of a slow and majestic tune, we should indeed find some difficulty to reconcile feeling and understanding. Happily, however, we are spared this perplexity; neither harmony nor melody are destroyed, or even impaired by suitable variations of time. It is with music as with poetry. In both arts the most sublime and weighty passages require deliberate and marked emphasis to render them effective; if hurried over lightly, their character is lost. A pleasant superficial composition, on the other hand, agrees well with an easy and flowing delivery.—Gravity, solemnity, and majesty of step, are as needful to inspire feelings of awe and reverence in music as in manners; and when we consider of how great importance it is that the seriousness of the spirit should be maintained in every part of divine service, it were enough, though no other end were gained by the introduction of this species of Psalmody.

But it may be fearlessly asserted that it is inferior to no kind of composition in arousing the attention, or keeping alive an excited interest. It yields to none in ministering to the very highest degree of musical gratification.

We have no lack of compositions rich both in melody and harmony; and that such will be comprehended and admired when lighter ones are forgotten, may be seen from the hold which Luther's Hymn and the Hundredth Psalm unceasingly retain of the public ear,—tunes which increase the more in popular estimation the better they are known.

It is, however, a mistake to suppose that tunes of this class, in which each word has its distinct note, and all generally of the same length, must be performed in the same time. Some, as for instance the Old Hundred and Fourth Psalm, are in their own character energetic and spirited. Such, therefore, should be played with greater sprightliness than others naturally more solemn and sedate.

It is incumbent upon us to accommodate our tunes as well to the subject-matter of the words to which they are applied, as to the difference of times and seasons.

It is, therefore, the duty of those who have any influence on the Psalmody, to study carefully the character of each sound and legitimate tune, and so to apply it that it may strengthen and not impede the impression designed to be conveyed on occasions of peculiar solemnity.

"How many things by season seasoned are
To their right praise and true perfection."

Musical Intelligence.

NEW YORK.—Semiramide was performed by Martetzek's troupe last Monday evening. The Tribune says:

The cast, last night, was as follows: Semiramide, Mme Guerrabella; Idreno, Mlle. Sulzer; Arzace, Signor Minetti; Assur, Signor Biachi; Oroe, Signor Coletti; Shade of Ninus, Signor Coletti.

Semiramide must be handsome in addition to other political qualifications, and certainly Madame Guerrabella looked every inch a noble and beautiful classic queen. Besides, we have never heard her to the same advantage. She executed the music with much brilliancy; and increased in force as she proceeded during the evening. Mlle. Sulzer sang the gay griefs of the young prince in all their rapid turns and runs; and called forth liberal applause in her solo. The part of Idreno gave Signor Minetti very little to do. Signor Biachi affords a specimen of the old classic school of singing. He possesses the utmost flexibility of voice; and executes with the most artistic finish.

There is so much dull priestly work and ponderous recitative in Semiramide that it drags at times on the stage, notwithstanding its superb music. If it could be compressed a little, it would be better; not that there are not operas longer, but their stage business being lively, their length seems less.

To-night Lucia will be rendered, with Mlle. Ortoloni, Brignoli, Sig. Mazzoleni, and Sig. Bollini.

The Concordia, a German singing society in Hoboken, have recently performed a little opera by Franz Schubert: "The Conspirators, or the Domestic Strife." It is the first operatic work of Schubert ever attempted in this country. The Musical Review says of it:

The opera was written in 1819, when Schubert was but 23 years old. No doubt the work itself gives unmistakable sign of the youth of the composer. Those riches of modulation, those traits of originality, with which his later works abound, are not to be found in the score. Everything is simple, very intelligible and often by no means peculiarly Schubertish. For instance, the song-writer Schubert, as he is known to the present generation, will be scarcely recognized. With exception of the romance of the Countess in F minor and the first part of the Duo between Adolf and Helene in B flat, there can be hardly in the whole score traced anything, which might point to the manner and the turns of melody we find for instance in his songs. Yet the music is much more modern, than most of the music of this style was, composed forty and fifty years ago. One can take the comic operas of the German composers of that time, and one can easily see, how independent Schubert appears in spite of his twenty-three years. Besides there are scarcely any songs in the opera. The choruses, the ensembles, form the chief features of the work, and these in some instances are of an irresistible charm, as for instance the welcome chorus of the women, in C. The conspiracy scene is also of good effect, especially the concluding Andantino in D. Of excellent and even dramatic effect are the two Ariettas by the Count and the Countess, the one in A, the other in C, although in the main features the same music. The finale, too, offers some excellent music, but here the want of really dramatic progression is felt most. The music does not reach its climax, on the contrary it loses its interest. It is true this is partially caused by the libretto (by J. F. Castelli) but on the whole this libretto is better than the majority of text-books of this class, especially of an older period of operatic art. With a few cuttings and alterations the little opera could be made very effective, especially on a large stage, and with the help of the orchestra, the treatment of which, to judge from the Piano-score, must be occasionally quite interesting. But even without these accessories and alterations the operetta has proved quite attractive, as all those can testify, who witnessed the performance in Hoboken. The scenery worked well, the costumes were very appropriate and pretty and everything was neat and acceptable. The choruses, some of which are by no means easy, were creditably sung, and the soloists, Miss Ludewig, Messrs. Uehs and Schoenfeldt, and two or three others, whose names we could not ascertain, gave general satisfaction. We need simply add that Mr. Timm was at the piano (one of Steinway's Grands) to satisfy our readers, that the accompaniment was in the right hands. The performance was preceded by the overture to "Euryanthe," rendered by Messrs. Timm and H. Brackhausen.

We understand that the opera will be repeated for the benefit of Mr. Sorge, the conductor, to whose energy and zeal the bringing out of the work is chiefly due.

PHILADELPHIA.—Of Nicolai's "Merry wives of Windsor" (Die lustigen Weiber von Windsor), performed by the German Opera Company for the first time in America, a fortnight since, the Evening Bulletin says:

It was brought out with great care by Mr. Anschütz's company; the costumes were all new and elegant, and the general mise en scene was excellent. The music of this opera is very fresh and beautiful. The overture is familiar to concert-goers, and last evening it was played better than we have ever had it here. The orchestral music, from beginning to end, is extremely beautiful, and among good judges it had a full share of the applause.

The story of the opera is an abridgement of Shakespeare's comedy. Mrs. Ford and Mrs. Page appear as "Frau Fluth" and "Frau Reich," and the other characters are close reproductions from the original play. Mme. Johanness, as the Mrs. Ford of the opera, sang better than we have ever heard her, and acted with uncommon spirit. Mme. Schaumborg took the part of Mrs. Page, and Mme. Rotter that of "Anne Page." The latter sang beautifully, and made a great deal out of rather an unimportant part. Herr Graff's "Falstaff" was scarcely up to the ordinary conception of the part in America and England, but he was correct and at times very amusing. Hartmann as "Ford," Weinlich as "Page," Lotti as "Fenton," Quint as "Slender," and Kronfeld as "Dr. Caius," were excellent, though Lotti got sadly off the key in his principal solo, and was some time in recovering himself.

A first hearing of an opera does not qualify one for reporting on its merits in detail, and we cannot refer to all the beauties of this one. The opening duo, between the two "merry wives," is excellent. The finale of the first act is grand, and it was admirably sung by this company. There is a capital drinking scene in the second act, which was extremely well done by Graff and the chorists. Mme. Rotter and Lotti have a beautiful duo, with a peculiar cadence, in which the first violin has a principal part. The music of the last act, where the elves and fairies appear, was of a light character, and scarcely equal to that which preceded it. But the opera, as a whole, was a great success.

Among the pieces given during the past week were Auber's Fra Diavolo (with Mme. Berkel as Zerlina, Quint as Fra Diavolo, Lotti as Lorenzo), Der Freyschütz, and, for the farewell of the company on Monday, Don Giovanni. Fitzgerald (City Item) says, no doubt with justice:

The German Opera does not receive all the praise which it deserves. We hear it compared, to apparent disadvantage, with the Italian opera. It ought not to suffer by comparison. The German company altogether has done harder and better work than any Italian company that has visited us—harder, because its music has been more difficult, and more various, better, because the music is in general the best. Its performance, on the whole, if not in detail, is superior to what we have been accustomed to from the Italian opera,—it is more entire, earnest, and possesses a higher purpose, and it has accomplished more good. That is due chiefly to such a manager as Anschütz, whose generalship of music is unsurpassed, but it is also due to the artistic spirit which seconds him. With not altogether the best voices, the German company possesses superior intelligence and energy. Madame Johanness, for zeal, ability, and satisfaction, surpasses in essential respects many prima-donnas of the Italian school who create superficial furores; and the same, in a different application, might be said of Madame Rotter, than whom, in a certain line of operatic character, few singers have given our public better satisfaction. The difference between the schools is decidedly in favor of the sincerity and earnestness of the German, which, with inferior voices, can accomplish greater results.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, APRIL 4, 1863.

New Volume—A Change.

We begin the twelfth year of our Journal of Music with a change of plan. Henceforth, instead of once a week, it will be issued only ONCE A FORTNIGHT.

We are convinced that this change is dictated alike by the interests of the public, the Art, the Editor, and the publishers.

1. It will be better for the public, for the class who read. It is a limited class at best, that spends much time in reading about Music, or cares much about discussions of artistic questions, critical analyses, comparison of composers, schools, historic periods, or to keep up with the record of current musical news; while nearly all delight in hearing music for inspiration, solace or amusement. In these grave times, especially, how few have time or thought to spare to really read so many pages, presenting themselves so frequently, as we for eleven years have filled with matter relating almost exclusively to music! Music itself, under the weight of times like these, the spirit needs; its halls and theatres are gladly thronged; but how many persons can we invite with the same confidence to read and think about it? A fortnightly journal will doubtless be read with more eagerness, than one which comes too often.

2. It will be better both for Art and Editor. Imagine the sounder half selected out of all the matter contained in any two successive numbers of the Journal and put into one, or the whole condensed into one, and you will have our meaning. The opportunity for greater condensation, for more carefully considered articles, for preparing a larger proportion of original matter, for entering into some departments of the subject, for which time has hitherto been short, for gathering up the gist of more intelligence within less space,—in short for offering more matter in but half as many words,—is one which the Editor for many years has coveted and felt the need of. He thinks he can do better service to the cause of Art, and fuller justice to himself, by one volume in the year than by two. At all events the present times dictate the trial; of the result it becomes us to speak modestly, though hopefully and with determined purpose.

3. To our publishers, on whom the Journal imposes a heavy pecuniary risk, of which our subscribing and advertising patrons have only partially relieved them since the War began, it becomes a necessary economy, that our work should (for the present at least) be done upon a somewhat less imposing outward scale, provided it can be essentially as well done (for the reader and for Art);—and that it can be, has been shown above.

We do not propose to change the size, external style, or price of the Journal. In spite of the doubled cost of paper and other increased expenses, the subscription price will remain relatively the same as heretofore: namely, one dollar per annum. Those who have already prepaid for a year on the weekly plan, will be credited for two years, or may receive their money back, if a fortnightly paper does not suit their purpose.

Our next number, therefore, will be issued on Saturday, April 18, and the paper will appear thereafter on alternate Saturdays.

Concert Review.

All the concerts of the week have been for patriotic objects; to send health and comfort, and good cheer and music to our brave soldiers in the field.

1. The Concert at Chickering's Hall, last Saturday evening, to raise funds for circulating Prof. Child's capital collection of War Songs in the army, was as unique in character, as it was eminently successful. Tickets enough had been purchased at the dollar price, to crowd the hall. Fortunately for those present, if unfortunately for the absent, a snow storm, of the least attractive variety, suddenly intervened, so that the room was but comfortably filled, and with excellent people, all impressible and readily responsive to the stirring patriotic strains. The selections were of three sorts: specimens of the War Songs; instrumental pieces for orchestra and stringed quartet; and grand choruses with orchestra; as follows:

Part I.

1. Songs: Our Country is calling! The Land and the Flag. Sharpshooter's Song. O, we're not tired of fighting yet!
2. Symphony in G minor.....Mozart
Allegro Molto—Andante—Allegro assai.
3. Songs: Northmen, come out! Cavalry Song. Put it through!
4. Chorus from "Antigone".....Mendelssohn

Part II.

1. Quartet in D, 3d and 4th Movements.....J. K. Paine Andante—Allegretto con Variazioni e Fuga.
2. Songs: The Lass of the Pampunty. Duet. Shall Freedom droop and die? Harvard Students' Song: Solo. Trumpet Song.
3. Domine, salvam fac Patriam nostram.....J. K. Paine

The songs and choruses were sung by a choir of about thirty rich and powerful male voices, mostly members of the Harvard Musical Association or undergraduates at Cambridge. The ensemble was very fine, and the body of first tenors uncommonly effective. It was in fact the same choir which contributed so much to the interest of the exercises at the inauguration of President Hill a few weeks ago. They had been carefully drilled by Mr. J. K. PAINE, the musical instructor at the University, who officiated very ably as conductor of the whole concert, besides being the author of a considerable and not the least interesting portion of the music.

The war songs were sung with much more life and spirit than at the former concert for the same object. Indeed there was an inspiring ring to most of the pieces, and a solemn earnestness in some of them which no one could help feeling. The humorous ones, to Prof. Child's quaint words, seasoned the mess agreeably. Mr. Paine's "Cavalry Song" was one of the most effective pieces of music; and, in another vein, his music, Mr. Hale's words, and all the voice, with a will conspired in "Put it through." The third set of songs had been arranged by Mr. Paine with orchestral accompaniment. Messrs Langmaid and Powers in the Duet, and the former gentleman in Mrs. Howe's "Harvard Students' Song" (to the German air Denkst du daran), sang with artistic style and feeling. "Shall Freedom droop and die?" (words by C. G. Leland), was adapted to a very appropriate melody and was deeply impressive. The "Trumpet Song" had a ringing trumpet flourish for an introduction—an accompaniment which the men in camp can easily command.

Mendelssohn's noble music (in double chorus) to the Bacchus chorus in the Antigone of Sophocles was given with splendid effect both by voices and orchestra; and only strengthened our wish that this choir may be kept together, until it shall have learned and shall be in a condition to bring out the entire music to Antigone. It will only require a good reader for the connecting portions of the tragedy. The Domine salvam fac Patriam nostram, the same piece which hailed the new President at Harvard, with words altered, confirmed the good impression it there made as a spirited, musician-like, effective composition.

It was a new sensation to hear a Symphony in that small room, sitting as it were in the very midst of the conversing instruments. It was a small orchestra, the "Germania," about twenty instruments, among whom were Eichberg, Meisel, Wulf Fries, Ribas, Heinecke, &c., and all all parts fairly represented. Mozart's G minor was quite well played. Under such circumstances the listener was fixed, held by the button as it were. There was no escaping what each instrument had to say; following the themes and imitative phrases from one set of voices to another, watching their combinations, divergences, responses, and their tutti asseverations, you had really a nearer study of the composition, than is usually possible in large halls, although the æsthetic unity and blending may be better there. The two movements from Mr. Paine's Quartet, nicely played by Messrs. Eichberg, Meisel, Eichler and Wulf Fries, made a very agreeable impression, although they would have been more justly appreciated, had the first movement also been given. For so youthful an effort it showed much artistic skill and genial conception. The variations were particularly ingenious and interesting.

We have spoken in praise of these performances, generally and singly, not meaning to assert that there were no technical imperfections. But there was life and right spirit in it all; the music told for its full meaning on an audience, which it warmed into sympathy with itself; and that after all is the main thing; where that is vouchsafed, it is folly to be critical. We trust the War Songs will do the same live service in the army. Judged by the specimens, the little book should be highly useful.

2. Mr. GILMORE's Patriotic Concerts for the benefit of the Sanitary Department of six Boston regiments, (with one of which, the 24th, Mr. Gilmore and his excellent Band served during the first year of the war), have been given with faithful adherence to programme, and with good success apparently, every afternoon and evening of this week. The usual place has been the Tremont Temple, but on the evening of Fast Day Faneuil Hall resounded to the stirring strains of orchestra, and reed band, Mme. ANNA BISHOP's sweet voice and still exquisitely finished singing, Mr. GEORGE SIMPSON's (tenor) smooth and delicate delivery of sentimental ballads, solos on various instruments, &c. The selections have been mostly light and popular, but good of their kind, and the execution has left little to be desired. Mr. Gilmore enters with real patriotic fervor and enthusiasm into his work; and so does his most active and obliging agent, Mr. Blake. The spirit and purpose of these concerts certainly commends them.—Mr. Gilmore has labored in season and out of season, in spite of discouraging beginnings some weeks since, to bring them about, and he is now giving all that he has promised. We trust that the material result will fully equal the large sum he anticipated; it will be a noble gift of one man's heart and energy to the defenders of the sacred cause.

The concerts are continued this afternoon and evening for the special benefit of the 45th Regiment under the auspices of the Independent Cadets. To-morrow (Sunday) evening, they will close with a grand Sacred Concert in which Mr. RUDOLPHSEN will sing, besides the above named vocalists.

GRAY'S ITALIAN OPERA troupe paid a flying visit at the Boston Theatre, on their way back from Portland to New York, last week, and gave two performances of Don Pasquale, in connection with M. Juignes's French dramatic company, on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon.

We understand that MARETZK's Havana troupe, of whose performances in New York all the accounts, including our own trustworthy correspondent, are so favorable, will open at the Boston Theatre on the 13th inst. The singers will all be new to us, although the operas may be old.

It does not yet appear how soon we may expect CARL ANSCHÜTZ with his German Company, to give us new operas, at least almost so to us: Fidelfio, Magie Flûte, The Soraglio, John of Paris, Merry Wives of Windsor, &c., &c.

The next Concert that we have in prospect (except Gilmore's), is that of the ORCHESTRAL UNION next Wednesday Afternoon, at the Melodeon, while the Boston Music Hall is being renovated and re-organized.

There is yet one more of CARL ZERRAHN's Philharmonic Concerts awaiting us (would we might say many more!). Whether it will come next Saturday we do not learn.

Mr. PARKER's singing Club of lady and gentleman amateurs have been practising all winter Schumann's beautiful Cantata "Paradise and the Peri," founded on Moore's poem. It was to have been performed before an invited and an eager audience. But March winds are harsh, and Peris, Houris, and such creatures of milder heavens where no East winds blow (they being in the East already), can hardly be expected to escape colds; therefore the pleasant event has had to be postponed. But it is worthy of note, meanwhile that such good things are studied in these parts.

LISZT'S CHOPIN. — We cheerfully give place to the following, and regret that we could not do it earlier. It was an inadvertent statement on our part that both Mendelssohn's Letters and Liszt's "Chopin" had been translated entire in this Journal, that being true only of the former work. Our translations from the "Chopin" appeared so many years ago that we had really forgotten about them. For the same reason, they could scarcely injure the forth-coming book.

J. S. DWIGHT, Esq.

Dear Sir: I observe in your notice of the forth-coming "Life of Chopin" from the press of F. Leyboldt, Philadelphia, a statement which may have an injurious effect upon the sale of the work in musical circles. You say the book is already known to the readers of your periodical through a translation given in that Journal. Now, according to a letter written by you in 1855, the translation there given consisted of such portions as were found in one of the German musical papers, and, by comparison of those portions with the original work, only sixty pages of the whole two hundred and four were published in the Journal of Music. Thus, more than half of Liszt's book was omitted, including especially such parts as were chiefly illustrative of the Polish nationality of the great composer.

I feel quite sure that this error in statement has on your part been made inadvertently, and I rely upon your well known fairness and sense of justice to correct the false impression it must make upon the minds of the reading public. Of course all who think they already possess a translation of the entire work will not purchase Mr. Leyboldt's edition.

This enterprising publisher, having undertaken to bring out a book pronounced by numerous American houses so far above the heads of the people that its sale would not pay for paper and ink, surely merits support from all who desire the real advancement of genuine art in America. Trusting that you will at once correct the erroneous impression conveyed by the Journal of March 14th, I remain,

Respectfully yours,
Hoboken, March 17. L. D. P.

The Philadelphia Evening Bulletin says:

The last performance of Mr. Anschütz's company drew a fine audience to the Academy of Music, although it took place in Holy Week. The opera was Don Giovanni, with the following cast:

Donna Anna.....	Mme. Johanna.
Donna Elvira.....	Mme. Zimmerman.
Zerlina.....	Mme. Berkel.
Don Giovanni.....	Herr Hartmann.
Leporello.....	Herr Weillisch.
Don Ottavio.....	Herr Lotte.
The Commander.....	Herr Graff.
Masetto.....	Herr Quint.

Although the general performance was quite good, yet the only artist who was really equal to the work was Mme. Johanna. She sang well all the difficult music of her role, including the grand aria, "Non mi dir," which the Italians always omit. Mme. Zimmerman is a very poor representative of "Elvira," and Mme. Berkel only a passable "Zerlina." The male characters were better supported, but none of the singers were quite up to the mark. But the fidelity, earnestness and intelligence with which the Germans sing and act, make up for many deficiencies of voice and style, and with Mr. Anschütz's fine orchestra, the performance was a very satisfactory one. The grand finale of the first act was given with splendid effect, the chorus being greatly enlarged.

Between the second and third acts, Mr. G. Gumpert, on behalf of Mr. Anschütz's Philadelphia friends, presented to him a beautiful baton, of ebony, mounted with gold, and bearing a suitable inscription. Mr. Gumpert made a neat and brief presentation speech, while the gift was presented from the hand of a pretty little girl, and acknowledged by a kiss. The affair was altogether very well managed. Although, from various causes, such as Lent and the illness of Madame Rotter, the last season of the German company has not been successful in a pecuniary point of view, we have reason to believe that Mr. Anschütz does not regret coming to Philadelphia, and will pay us another visit next season.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, MARCH 30.—The representation of Bellini's "Norma" on last Monday night, was very successful, so much so as to warrant its repetition on Friday. The length of time during which this opera has held a prominent position on the lyric stage (more than thirty years, a long period for most modern operas!) is not to be wondered at, when we consider its real wealth of melody, and its great dramatic effects. In spite of frequent repetition, the Druid choruses, the scene following Norma's entrance, the trio at the close of the first act, the fine declamatory passages, and torrents of angry fortissimo scattered through the music allotted to Norma, still strike us as remarkable, poetic, and in a certain measure, truthful. This opera requires good actors as well as singers; fortunately, Mr. Maretzek's company tolerably well answers these requisitions.

MEDORI looked the Druid princess finely; her attitudes were nobly picturesque, her acting frequently rose to a degree of impassioned intensity, as genuine as rare. Her singing was more than satisfactory, although it is to be regretted that she makes such a constant (and, we fear, involuntary) use of the tremolo, which would be effective in so rich and powerful a voice as hers, were it only heard occasionally. MAZZOLINI made a great deal of the part of Pollione; but so fine an artist can make much of very little. SULZER was correct, but weak, as Adalgisa; BIANCHI pretty good as Oroveso, if not quite up to our childish recollections of Lablache's colossal voice and majestic port and action. The choruses and orchestra were well sustained. On Wednesday night the company gave Donizetti's "Linda di Chamounix," and at Saturday's matinée "La Traviata." "Semiramide" is promised for to-night, quite a pleasant change from the routine repertoire.

On last Tuesday evening, Messrs. MASON and THOMAS gave their fifth soirée of the present series, at Dodworth's hall. The programme comprised Mozart's quartet in E flat major, (No. 4 of the Haydn quartets), and, in some respects, the finest of the six—with its visionary Andante, and lovely Scherzo; Bach's Piano and Violin Sonata in E major,— "something rich and strange," which from the beginning to the end gave us a sense of quaint delight, yet somewhat mysterious and unheimlich; but it must have proved a cold bath to many among the audience, who did not seem to know what to make of it; then three of Schumann's Novellets for the piano-forte, played by William Mason; and lastly, Mendelssohn's Octet in E flat major, opus 20, which has uncommon strength for a work of this class by Mendelssohn the elegant; the Scherzo is a summer-night's dream—in Spain, with a rich gloom over it at times.

The Philharmonic Society gave their first rehearsal for the last concert of this season, on Saturday afternoon.

Schubert's operetta "The Domestic Quarrel," has been brought out in Hoboken, by a musical society.

The Italian opera company has given occasional performances in Brooklyn—usually repetitions of the operas produced here.

GOTTSCHALK is inaugurating a new series of concerts here and in Brooklyn.

PHILADELPHIA, MARCH 29.—A few days ago I chanced across the programme of Mr. WOLFSOHN's fourth classical soirée. As the names, both of artists and compositions, promised a rare feast, I concluded to be on hand on the evening of the 26th, and had every reason to congratulate myself, since the concert was, in many respects, a delightful one. Beethoven's Trio, in B flat major, for piano, clarinet and violoncello, was played by Messrs. WOLFSOHN, STOLL and AHREND. Though it is full of beauty and contains two movements (the Allegro and the Adagio) of exceeding interest, it is one of Beethoven's lighter works. It was well played and, barring the rather too loud performance of various violoncello passages, would have pleased the most exacting of critics.

There was also Mozart's lovely Quintet, in E flat major, for piano and wind instruments. It is one of the most pleasing of the works of the composer who never wrote a page that tires, or a phrase that does not seem as fresh and as acceptable at the fiftieth as at the first hearing. He, indeed, may be said to be musically blond, who has lost his love for Mozart. As the E Flat Quintet is very well known, I will not dwell upon it, except to pay my respects to those who played it.

For the sake of the wind instruments, it ought to have been more frequently rehearsed. Mr. Kellnor's hautbois was, at times, positively painful. The Larghetto, beginning like Leporello's Nella bionda in "Don Giovanni," pleased more than the other movements, though the whole work was well received.

To describe Mr. Wolfsohn's playing would necessitate the bringing forth of various commendatory adjectives rather the worse for wear. I will, therefore, content myself with remarking that Chopin's Nocturne, in F sharp major, was played exquisitely; and that the Henselt Etude, Si oiseau j'étais, &c., would have been better had it received the same careful shading as the Nocturne.

Mr. Ahrend phrases well, plays with fine feeling and has immense tone. His bowing is excellent. In his solo, Schubert's Ave Maria, his sliding for notes that should have been attacked squarely did much to mar the beauty of the performance. I am surprised that Mr. Ahrend should allow himself to fall into such a careless manner. As it was, it pleased the audience, who were delighted to obtain the somewhat familiar Schubert's Serenade when M. Ahrend re-appeared.

In the Mendelssohn Sonata, both players (Wolfsohn and Ahrend) gave the various movements, and especially the Andante, carefully and impressively.

The German operas for the week were Nicolai's (and Shakespeare's) "Merry Wives of Windsor," Auber's Fra Diavolo, and Weber's Freischütz. "Don Giovanni" is announced for to-morrow night.

NEMAND.

A SHARP REBUKE TO MUSICAL HUMBUGS.—It seems that to gain the public confidence, the manager of a juvenile concert troupe lately had it announced that it had received the sanction of Trinity Church; whereupon a letter of correction is sent as follows. We quote it from the Brooklyn Daily News:

TRINITY CHURCH, New York, }
March 23d, 1863. }

MR. D. F. HARDY—My Dear Sir: In a copy of the Brooklyn News, of recent date, which you have sent me for examination, I find an article describing a concert lately given at the Athenæum, by some Horace Waters "Sunday School Vocalists." While reading the article, I came upon the following startling announcement:

"The Sunday School Vocalists are rapidly growing in favor with this community; and they have, we understand, received liberal offers to sing at Trinity Church (New York), but have very wisely, we think, resolved to remain and exercise their talents in a community that has shown a disposition so liberally to reward their efforts."

"Dear me!" I exclaimed: "is it possible? Something must be the matter with my eyes." I thereupon mounted a pair of powerful, self-adjusting, over-strung, back-action spectacles, of about six horse power. This process, however, revealed nothing new. I think—mind, I am not certain—but think the above announcement "lacks confirmation." I have, however, referred the whole matter to my first assistant organ blower (a intelligent contraband), with power to send for persons and papers! Yours truly, (Signed) HENRY S. CUTLER,

Organist, Trinity Church, New York,

We should think that in future Mr. Waters would be a little careful how he meddles with dignities unauthorized.—N. Y. Sund. Dispatch.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

The Trout. (Die Forelle). One May day in the Morning. German and English words.

Franz Schubert. 35

Schubert's Forelle is already widely known and liked. The German song has a very simple story of a trout in a brook, who was cruelly caught by an angler. The English words describe the beauties of an English May morning, on the banks of the romantic and fish-fall river Dove. The music of song and accompaniment is, of course, perfectly graceful and beautiful.

In Dark'ning Night. In Dunkler Nacht. F. Abt. 35

Many of the German songs have a dusky, sombre, semi-melancholy character, as if written in a cloudy twilight. Many American songs are full of brightness and glitter, like our own sunny days, just the reverse of the moist, mild, smiling and weeping ones, which constitute the rule in Deutschland. But such songs as this of Abt's are beautifully German American, with rich and tender harmony, and a pleasant, bright melody. The ballad is also very sweet.

Heather Bell. Song. C. Krebs. 34

Another beautiful German ballad, with words in German and English, like the other. Very tender and delicate. These two songs will have many admirers.

Instrumental Music.

Cherry Ripe. Transcription. B. Richards. 40

Another of Richard's skillfully transcribed songs, sweetly easy, with two somewhat difficult passages in five sharps. Excellent for students, and pretty for anybody.

The Queen of the Harvest. Waltz. (New dance music). C. Coats. 50

Has a rich, melodious introduction, followed by four waltzes and a Coda or Fugue. The waltzes remind one of those of Strauss, which they resemble somewhat in style, and are very good.

La Favorita. Franz Nava. 30

Potpourri from the above "favorite" opera. Not difficult. Good for learners who have just progressed beyond easy pieces.

Midnight Chimes. Morceau de Salon. Lindahl. 35

A pleasing and not difficult nocturne. Something in the style of "Monastery Bells."

THE CHERUB.—Songs for Sabbath Schools and Sabbath Evenings. By J. C. Johnson. Boards 25 Paper. 20

This new book, which, it is hoped, will be a great favorite with all who go to Sabbath Schools, and those who love to sing on Sabbath Evenings, contains a very few of those psalm tunes, which seem to be indispensable to the closing exercises of schools, and a great many new and bright hymns and melodies, songs, duets and choruses, of a style similar to that now so popular with young and old. Persons who have "sung out" the books now used in their schools and classes, are invited to try the sweet music of the Cherub.

I.

LOVE AGAINST LOVE.

As unto blowing roses summer dews,
Or morning's amber to the tree-top choirs,
So to my bosom are the beams that use
To rain on me from eyes that love inspires.
Your love,—vouchsafe it, royal-hearted Few,
And I will set no common price thereon,
O, I will keep, as heaven his holy blue,
Or night her diamonds, that dear treasure won.
But aught of inward faith must I forego,
Or miss one drop from truth's baptismal hand, Think poorer thoughts, pray cheaper prayers, and grow

Less worthy trust, to meet your heart's demand?
Farewell! Your wish I for your sake deny;
Rebel to love in truth to love am I.

II.

DEFIANCE.

Time's wonted ravage shall not touch my love:
His wrath I challenge, his assault defy.
Rust gathered never on the blue above,
Nor blearing film upon day's golden eye;
Earth and the heavens have gems that are eterne,—
The ruby whitens not with bleach of years,
Ever Orion and his brothers burn,
Nor even Despair itself their fading fears.
O, would he say, who all truth did discern,
That you, then, stars of my heart's heaven, may die?
Or can that heart its wisdom quite unlearn,
Nor be illumined when your light is nigh?
Though Time o'ercame the skies, their azure staining,
Time's lord were Love, immortal and unwaning.

III.

ROYALTY.

That regal soul I reverence, in whose eyes
Suffices not all worth the city knows
To pay that debt which his own heart he owes;
For less than level to his bosom rise
The low crowd's heaven and stars; above their skies
Runneth the road his daily feet have pressed;
A loftier heaven he beareth in his breast,
And o'er the summits of achieving hies
With never a thought of merit or of meed;
Choosing divinest labors through a pride
Of soul, that holdeth appetite to feed Ever on angel-herbage, naught beside;
Nor praises more himself for hero-deed
Than stones for weight, or open seas for tide.

The Midsummer Night's Dream.

A LETTER.

Translated from the German of ROBERT SCHUMANN, by FANNY M. RAYMOND.

— Naturally, the first one to hear something about the "Midsummer Night's Dream," from me, is yourself, my dear friend. We saw it at last, yesterday (after nearly 300 years, for the first time), and that the manager set off a winter's evening with it, shows that he has the right sense of things—for in summer one always longs for a "Winter's Tale," and everybody knows why. I can assure you, that many people only went to see Shakespeare, in order to hear Mendelssohn; this seemed to me a perversion. For Mendelssohn is not like those bad actors who largely display themselves at every incidental opportunity; his music (with the exception of the overture) is only an accompaniment, a mediation, a bridge between Bottom and Oberon. without which, the passage into Fairy land is almost impossible. He who expects more from this music, will certainly be disappointed; it keeps even more modestly in the background than that to "Antigone," where the composers has worked up his choruses to a richer development.

This music does not much illustrate the story of the play, or the loves of the four young people; only once Hermia's search for her beloved is sketched in moving accents; this is an admirable number. It prefers to accompany the fairy portion of the play; and here Mendelssohn was in his own kingdom, and no one more at home in it than he, as you know. The world has long been but of one opinion about the overture; above all, it paints the transformation of Bottom the weaver. The bloom of youth is spread over this, as scarcely over any other work of the composer: the clever master took his first and highest flight in one happy moment. I was pleased, as fragments of the overture came to light in succeeding numbers; but the conclusion of the whole, which brings back the close of the overture almost note for note, did not satisfy me. The composer's ideas, as to the rounding of the whole, are clear; but they seem too understandingly, too reasonably brought out; he should have illustrated this scene with his freshest tones; and just here, where music would have produced the greatest effect, I expected something creative, original. Think of the scene yourself; the elves dance their merry round through every chink and crevice of the house, with Puck at their head, to sweep all bright and clean, while Oberon gives his blessing; nothing more charming or more suited to music can be imagined. Had Mendelssohn only composed something new for this scene! And so, it seemed to me, the highest effect of this piece was wanting; one recollected the many charming numbers as they had passed by. Bottom's asses head may yet divert many even to-day; the enchanted night in the greenwood and the wanderings in many paths will be lastingly impressed on many; and yet it made more the effect of a curiosity, than of any thing else, on me.

The music is all finished and intelligent, from the very first entrance of Puck and the elves; then what a beckoning and jesting there is among the instruments! it is as if they were playing the elves themselves; and we hear quite new tones there too. Very lovely is the subsequent song with the closing words: "so good night with lullaby," and indeed all that has anything to do with the fairies. There is a march (the first, I believe, that Mendelssohn wrote) before the close of the last act; it has reminiscences of Spohr's march in the "Weihe der Töne" (Consecration of Tones), and might have been more original but it contains an interesting trio.

The orchestra played admirably under M. D. Bach's direction, and all the actors took the greatest possible pains, but the piece was but indifferently put upon the stage. It is to be repeated to-day.

Mme. Cinti Damoreau.

(From "Spiridon's," letter to the Evening Gazette, Paris, March, 1863.)

We are mourning the loss of a brilliant artist, who gave delight to all of our ago-silvered playgoers, the charm of the Opera Comique, the star of nearly all of Auber's and Adolph Adam's operas comiques: Mme. Cinti Damoreau. She was one of the most thoroughly French songstresses Paris ever saw. Brilliant—not deep; sprightly—not sentimental; gay—but heartless; she was the very personification of the opera comique which is the very impersonification of French musical genius. The French have taste; they have none of the qualities of genius. They can habit you in an attire which is perfection itself. They can brush you a picture which will please everybody. They can fill the back of the restaurant-bill with verses in praise of the pleasures of table and bed which shall sparkle as the wine of St. Peray. They can send you smiling to bed even after four hours of torture on a hard-seated parquet stall. They cannot touch your soul. They cannot bring down your tears. They cannot rouse your hair on end. The deepest impress they can make is a dimple on your cheek.

They shine in opera comique, because opera comique is elegant, trifling, married to elegant melody. It is tasteful music. Nobody expects when he enters the Opera Comique to give those horse-laughs which form the proper accompaniment of the Neapolitan opera buffa, nor those sobs which opera seria commands; no merriment greater than a smile is decent at the Opera Comique, and tenderness dare not go further than filling the eye with a tear. An opera comique is an aid to digestion, an usher to supper. it opens one as 'twere to sensual enjoyment; its giddy, gay, rattling, conversational music drives away care and keeps the soul "fret," as a squad of policemen preserve a thoroughfare "free" on a holiday. Mme. Cinti Damoreau was just the person to glitter (and she did glitter) in music of this sort. She was not a woman of genius, or of acute sensibilities, or of lofty emotions. She had none of Malibran's all-consuming fire, nor of Pasta's fine-toned soul, nor of Grisi's tragic sentiment. She was the perfection of the art of singing. All that art could accomplish with the human voice, all of sedulous study and miracles, you could find in her voice and with them all that decency and grace and piquancy and quickness all French women have. She never gave you all you wanted—but her co-tiveness irritated you as La Bruyere counsels visitors to irritate their hosts by leaving the moment before their hosts wished them gone. You wished for something more, and she left just at the very moment where she seemed about to give you that "something more," that soul, that sensibility, those sentiments for which, tired of mere brilliancy, you craved, and was artful enough to make denial seem reticence, when 'twas really lack of power. This was Mme. Cinti Damoreau's prevailing charm; the setting was better than the jewel it encased.

After a clear idea has been formed of her talents it is easy, by synthesis, to discover her biography. She was led to success by patience and by time. She was born in some obscure corner of Paris life. Some say her parents were porter and portress at the conservatory; others know that her father taught some foreign language and that her mother was an engraver upon metal, and that the future pride of the Opera Comique was born on the 6th of February, 1801. She reckoned her birth day to be the night when in Fernand Cortez she commanded her first applause. Her maiden name was Cynthia Montalant. She was advised to change it for the sake of the effect on the play-bills, when she was engaged in 1819 at the Italian Opera. She then called herself Mlle. Cinti, which name was, as you see, an alteration of her Christian name, Cynthia. Mlle. Cinti continued to be as obscure as her parents from 1819 until 1826, when, called upon to play a part in Fernand Cortez, she won many plaudits. Her performances in Le Siege de Corinthe and in Muse were still more applauded, and then she underwent, from causes which are not now to be discovered, an eclipse. During this period she married a fifth-rate singer named Damoreau, and became Mme. Cinti Damoreau. In 1829 she was again engaged at the Italian Opera, where she appeared by the side of Mme. Sontag and Mme. Malibran, and to so much advantage in the famous trio of Il Matrimonio Segreto, that she thenceforward became famous. Of a truth, an artist who can appear in company with such eminent songsters and not prove the shadow of the brilliant picture, may of right command high rank. After some time passed at this theatre, Mme. Cinti Damoreau emigrated to the Opera Comique, and there she proved herself in her true sphere. She never appeared without winning favor. She created the leading part in all of Auber's and of Adolphe Adam's operas, and the perfection with which she filled that part in L'Ambasadrice, Acton and Le Domino Noir was most admirable. She bade farewell to the scene of her many triumphs in 1844 in Adam's opera, La Rose de Peronne. Her retreat was wise. It took place while her powers were scarcely impaired by age, and yet at the moment when all her legion of admirers could not refuse consent to the departure. How few people know when to retire! She spent twelve or eighteen months in professional tours, she visited America, and then she settled down quietly here as a singing mistress. She was appointed a chair in the Conservatory, and the rest of her time was given to private pupils. She never appeared on the stage or in a concert after her farewell performance. She had guarded against the afternoon of life, and her declining years were passed away in ease and dignity. She was taken sick eight months ago, for the last six months she had not left her bed, and death proved a relief from sufferings which were almost intolerable. Her funeral was well suited with her career. Her pall was borne by MM. Auber, Ambroise Thomas, Perrin (the old manager of the Opera Comique), and de St. George. The funeral music was sung by the best artists of the Grand Opera and of the Opera Comique. All the musical world of Paris followed her remains to their last resting-place at Montmartre Cemetery.

Broadwood & Sons' Pianofortes.

The Grand Pianoforte may be said to have been born in England; for although its inventor, Americus Backers, was a Dutchman, it was in Jermyn-street, about the year 1767, that the instrument was originally planned. Backers was a manufacturer of harpsichords. Instead of clothing the strings (when first "applying hammers"), he merely caused them to be struck by soft wood or cork, with a view to obtain the harpsichord tone so much admired at that period. Subsequently, however, he adopted a thin covering of leather.* His mechanism, which possessed the double merit of effectiveness and simplicity, competed successfully with that of the most noted and ingenious of his contemporaries, and was gradually adopted by the principal makers, not only in this country, but on the continent, where it was specially recognized as the "Mécanique Anglaise," or "Die Englische Mechanik." Upon his decease (somewhere near 1781), Backers, proud of his discovery, confided it to the future keeping of his friend, John Broadwood, who, while in the employ of Burkhardt Shudi, used to go every evening, accompanied by his own apprentice, Robert Stodart, to assist in bringing it to perfection. Broadwood, nevertheless—subsequently engaged in other projects—bestowed little thought on the new instrument, until several years later. He had, in 1773, succeeded to Tschudi's business (Great Pulteney-street); and his increased responsibilities absorbed the whole of his time and attention. Meanwhile Robert Stodart, who, at the expiration of the term of his apprenticeship with Broadwood, commenced "making" on his own account (in Golden-square), had applied himself with eminent success to the manufacture of Grand Pianofortes, on the model of Backers, his opportunities of acquiring familiarity with which have been described. Besides materially improving the mechanism in several essential particulars, he increased the power and enriched the quality of tone. The vogue and extensive publicity which the new instrument deservedly obtained, under Stodart's name, at length awakened John Broadwood to a sense of its importance. For some years Broadwood emulated his contemporary with but indifferent success, till Muzio Clementi † (as influential a friend to him as Handel had previously been to Tschudi), through continually pointing out the defects of his instrument, and urging him to profit by the experience and counsel of eminent musicians and men of scientific acquirement, not only roused the pride of one to whom the art was already in some degree indebted, and who had succeeded to an inventor and manufacturer of the highest eminence, but particularly excited his interest in the progress and improvement of the Grand Pianoforte. Among the rest he solicited and obtained the advice of Cavallo, ‡ author of A Treatise on Acoustics, and other works, which at that period were in high repute. Cavallo, having deduced from the Monochord a theory concerning the length and proper tension of the strings of the pianoforte, drew up a paper on that very interesting and important subject, which he subsequently read, with great success, at one of the meetings of the Royal Society. Dr. Gray, too, formerly of the British Museum—who, after certain valuable experiments, had fixed the absolute proportions of gravity and vibration, respectively belonging to strings of brass and strings of steel (which first led to a division of the bridges on the sounding-board of the Grand Pianoforte)—was also one of Broadwood's advisers. With the aid of these distinguished men, he advanced so rapidly, that his reputation as a manufacturer of Grand Pianofortes was in a brief space established; and as a proof of the worth of those modifications and improvements which the suggestions of Cavallo and Dr. Gray had emboldened him to carry out, they were speedily adopted by every maker of note, both in England and abroad.

In 1792, Jean Louis Dussek, the greatest pianist and the greatest composer for the pianoforte of his day, arrived in London. That this distinguished professor at once came to our House, may be accepted as proof of the estimation in which the firm of Broadwood was held in Germany (as in Italy, where Dussek had travelled, and where Clementi had not been chary of expatiating on its claims to consideration); and that he should immediately take so deep an interest in our instruments as to propose several important modifications, shows that the qualifications they already possessed were such as to elicit the serious attention of a man to whom the pianoforte, as a medium of display, owed more than to any other. It was he who first suggested to John Broadwood the "additional keys." For these Dussek expressly composed concertos, sonatas, &c. (among the rest his famous Military Concerto in B flat ♭), which he played with extraordinary success at his own concerts, and at other entertainments, where, being the "lion" of his day, he was in continual request. From the time of Dussek's improvements to a long period onwards—with the exception of a mechanism invented by Sebastian Erard, of Paris (in 1818), to facilitate the increased rapidity of execution demanded by the works of more modern composers; and another invention, with the same object, introduced somewhat later by John Broadwood and Sons (an ingenious, although simple addition to the still invaluable mechanism of old Backers)—nothing has since been done to change, in any marked degree, the internal construction of the Grand Pianoforte. The consideration of chief importance during the last quarter of a century, or thereabouts, has related to the amount of power, and to the quality and possible variety of tone, which, as practice taught more and more surely the scientific use of weight and percussion—the bearing of the hammers to the strings, the solidity and the method of striking, the most convenient mode of bracing, and the most efficient construction of the sounding board—have advanced nearer and nearer to perfection. The peculiar requirements of modern pianoforte music have induced manufacturers to pay especial attention to the general action of the "dampers," and to the mechanical appliances through which the "dampers" are controlled—the "loud pedal," which entirely neutralizes the effect of the "dampers" (the object of the latter being to arrest the vibrations of the strings when the fingers are removed from the keys), and the "soft pedal," which, by shifting the hammers to a single string, materially diminishes the volume of sound.

For further details about the early invention and progressive history of the Grand Pianoforte Action, whether in connection with our House, or with the valuable labors of some of its contemporaries, during a century past, the reader is referred to Mr. Pole's book, entitled Musical Instruments in the Great Industrial Exhibition of 1851—page 13. | This important action—"facile princeps," it can hardly be denied, among the discoveries that have helped to bring the art of manufacturing Grand Pianos to its present state of comparative perfection—while an estimable boon to players and composers, who, through its means, have been able to express on the keyboard, fully, and with every conceivable modification, whatever they wished to convey, is at the same time, in virtue merely of the simplicity of its construction, the most durable, as well as the most practical mechanism ever invented.

To the patronage with which our House has been honored, on the part of the great composers and players—from Haydn, Dussek and Clementi, to Bennett, Hallé, Pauer and Arabella Goddard—we may allude with some pride. Until 1789, however, when Potter (father of the eminent Professor), and 1791, when Haydn, Dussek and Hummel first played upon our instruments, we have no dates (at least in regular succession) upon which reliance can be placed—scattered and unconnected portions of our books, previous to that period, being all that remain to us. Nevertheless, libris perennis, our work can still be adduced in testimony of early success; inasmuch as we have, in excellent order and preservation, a harpsichord by "Burkhardt Tschudi," of 1771, and another by "Burkhardt and Johannes Broadwood," of 1773. What John Broadwood owed to the suggestions of Clementi, Cavallo, Gray and Dussek, has been stated. We, however, John Broadwood's successors, have also some debts of gratitude to acknowledge. The benefit we have derived from the criticism and friendly advice of such artists as J. B. Cramer, Sterndale Bennett, Chopin, Madame Pleyel, Charles Hallé, Ernst Pauer and Arabella Goddard, we readily admit; and we may add, that occasional hints from one and all of these have been acted upon with unquestionable advantage. Nor must we by any means forget what we owe to the compatriots of John Broadwood (the earliest of our name), whose marriage with the daughter of Burkhardt Tschudi laid the solid foundation of our House. John Broadwood (who came up from Scotland with the traditional "half-crown") was no sooner established in business than Scottish fellow-laborers gathered around him; and to this day the names of Black, Murray, Russell, Forsyth, Finlayson, Allen, ¶ and other representatives in the third generations, of the early friends of John Broadwood—all Scots, too, like himself—claim eminent distinction in our estabishment, as belonging to those whose science, experience and industry are indispensable to its prosperity. May the appearance of egotism inevitably suggested by this history of our progress be in some degree tempered and excused by such acknowledgments.

*** [On the 27th of December, 1817, the Grand Pianoforte, No. 7,362, was forwarded to Beethoven at Vienna. It had been tried by Clementi, J. B. Cramer and Ferdinand Ries (Beethoven's favorite pupil, and subsequently his biographer), whose names, with those of other professors of less eminence, were inscribed upon it. It was unpacked at Vienna by Streicher, and Mr. Cipriani Potter, then happening to be at Vienna, was the first to try it. Beethoven set such value on it that he would allow no one but himself to play upon it, and, only as a great favor, used to permit Stumpff to tune it.

When the composer of Der Frieschütz came to England, John Broadwood and Sons forwarded a Cottage Pianoforte to his residence at the house of Sir George Smart, in Great Portland-street, where it remained from the 3rd of March to the 27th of June. Weber arrived on the 4th of March and died on the 6th of June. Except at his own concert in the Argyle Rooms (at which M. Moscheles played), it is believed on good authority, that Weber only played twice in London away from his own abode—on both which occasions the entries in our books warrant us in stating that, in all probability, he used our instruments.

It may also be pardoned in us mentioning, that the last pianoforte ever played upon by Mendelssohn was one of our manufacture, which had been forwarded to his house at Leipsic, during his temporary sojourn (in the summer of 1847) at Interlachen, in Switzerland. Mendelssohn, on arriving home, found the new instrument, and played upon it for several hours. He had been ordered, however, by his medical adviser, neither to play nor listen to music, and this was the last occasion upon which he infringed the regulation. He died very shortly after—Nov. 4, 1847.]

From the beginning of 1780 to the end of 1861, our House has manufactured 124,048 pianofortes, 75,700 of which have been made since 1826. Of the total number, no less than 27,479 were Grand Pianofortes. That these Grand Pianofortes are endowed with a power of resistance, formerly neither attained nor believed to be attainable, combined with a durability at one time regarded as scarcely less utopian, may be gathered from two of their number (fair specimens of the rest), which, though both were completed in 1852, are still, in 1862, the leading concert-instruments. The Concert Iron Grand, No. 18,192, finished September 8, 1852, had, up to January, 1862, been used at 460 concerts. The Concert Iron Grand, No. 18,215, finished December 29, 1852, up to the same date, had been played upon at 458 concerts. During this arduous labor, each instrument lost one string. **

The Grand Pianoforte, indeed, may, at this present period, be said to have attained the maximum of power. The scientific application of the principles of mechanics and acoustics to enriching tone and facilitating touch, so as to add still further to the resources of the skilled performer, must henceforth be the chief if not sole object of manufacturers. With what constant solicitude our House, from the commencement, has studied these important desiderata we have endeavored, in the foregoing pages, to explain. That we shall not deteriorate for want of zeal, or from a belief that absolute perfection has been reached, may, we hope, be taken for granted.

* As the ears of the musical public became more and more sensible to the charm of a sweet, full and mellow tone—legitimate tone, in short—the clothing of the hammers, in leather, or whatever covering preferred, by the manufacturer or by his patrons, became more and more substantial.

† Musio Clementi, one of the greatest pianists and composers for the pianoforte of whom the history of the art makes mention, was born at Rome, in 1752, and died near London, March 10, 1832. In conjunction with Longman, Broderip, and Co., he founded a pianoforte manufactory himself, under the title of Clementi and Co., from which has descended the now eminent firm of Collard and Collard.

‡ Tiberio Cavallo, a learned Italian, who established himself in London during the second half of the eighteenth century, published (among other works of which no reliable record at present exists) a treatise—in Philosophical Transactions, vol. lxxviii—entitled, Of those Musical Instruments in which the Tones, Keys, and Frets are fixed, as in the Harpsichord, Organ, Guitar, &c. (1788).

§ Op. 40. In the first edition of this concerto may be seen certain passages written in two ways—one for the old instrument, the other, and of course most brilliant for the instrument "with the additional keys." This instrument "with the additional keys" was, at the period under notice, solely manufactured by John Broadwood.

¶ The whole of these improvements"—says Mr. Pole, in his very interesting summary—"were made at a very early period in the history of the pianoforte. To whom we are indebted for them appears uncertain. Some accounts state that the hopper was patented by Longman and Broderip (the predecessors of Clementi and Co., now Collard's); but there is a tradition that, when the manufacture of the instrument was taken up by Beckers, he himself, in conjunction with Mr. Broadwood and Mr. Stodart (both then young men, just embarking in the business), devoted much time privately to the improvement of the mechanism; and that the joint production of the three, when made public (probably about 1770), was the perfect action, known in England as the 'Grand Action,' and on the continent as 'die englische Mechanik,'—being the combination of hammer, hopper, and check, above described. It has been ever since in use; and with only one further improvement, forms now the simplest and best action known.

"This last improvement is called the 'Repetition' mechanism; and its object may be thus briefly explained. In the ordinary action, after the hammer has fallen, the key must rise to its position of rest before the hopper will engage again in the notch of the hammer, so as to be ready for another stroke; and hence a note cannot be repeated without not only requiring the finger to be lifted through the entire height of the key's motion, but also demanding a length of time between the repetitions, sufficient to allow of its full rise. The contrivances by which this inconvenience has been overcome are of various kinds, according to the fancy or the ingenuity of the makers; but they all act on the same principle—namely, by holding up the hammer at a certain height while the key returns: by which means the hopper is allowed to engage itself under the hammer earlier, and to reproduce the note in less time, and with less labor to the finger than before."

‡ It is but just to state that the first important step towards improving the power and quality of tone in Grand Pianofortes was made in 1820, when a William Allen discovered the first systematic combination of Tension Bars ("bracings"), with a metallic spring plate, an invention patented by his employers Messrs. Stodart. What our House effected in 1849 and 1851, to neutralise the inconveniences, to simplify, and otherwise perfect the working of this new mechanism—the creation of the "Iron Grands," in short—may be seen in the technical description of our work.

Moritz Hauptmann.

We must once more allude, in conclusion, to Hauptmann's great acquirements in the domain of musical history, which the writer of this learned to know, from personal experience, in all their remarkable extent. Two years ago, the Leipzig philosophical faculty entrusted to Dr. Hauptmann the task of judging and criticizing a dissertation, prepared by the author of the present pamphlet, which treated of the history of musical theory among the ancients, and also comprised a review of the oldest and newest musical histories. In the course of the at first perplexing examination, the master placed the mistakes in regard to the enharmonics of the Greeks, the hexachord of Guido, the Latin verbal explanations, &c., in so clear a light before the author, that he became convinced of the incorrectness of several of his statements. This was done, however, with so much kindness and fine philosophical taste, that the first anxieties of examination were replaced by unbounded confidence.

This confidence in him was felt by all his scholars; an assertion that is best proved by the universal honor in which the master is held. His whole life has been a confirmation of the old saying:—

Strength in art makes morals sure;
Is the artist high and pure,
Then the man is better, truer.

Operatic Finance

(From the New York World.)

The facility with which water pours through a sieve may be taken as a perfectly fair illustration of the ease with which capital sifts through the fingers of an opera manager who endeavors to deal well alike with his artists and the public. The lawlessness of necessity, which prompts foolhardiness to become the most valuable of managerial virtues. The opera manager must possess the infatuation of a gambler. He must put his pile on the pool of chance; bet on fair weather forty-five nights out of his season of fifty; bet on the steadfast health of his principal singers; bet on the value of gold when monthly salaries shall fall due; and bet on clearing the expenses of every individual performance. Then he must shut his eyes and await the results. The knowing ones, who watch the game, always give odds, and wager that he will lose on weather, health of the artists, and the gold market.

No one need be told how the leading opera houses of Europe are supported, yet the running expenses of a first-class season in a first-class establishment in the old world are really less than the forced expenditures in New York, Boston, or Brooklyn. Havana and Mexico insure the director against personal loss. Until New York can summon enough art patriotism to shoulder a moderate share of the expense involved in the use of a luxurious opera house, we good people must rest satisfied with paying frequently for representations that are interesting from the display of astounding choral, orchestral, and scenic economy, and beggarly management generally. . . . Maretzek has peopled the Irving Place stage with new faces, many of which belong to artists truly great, as the town has duly discovered and acknowledged. He has infused new life into some worn operas, and has scores in rehearsal that indicate a brilliant wind up to his term of office. When this shall have passed and gone he will be very likely to sit down and count the cost of replacing Mr. Grau, who has been exercising his troupe in the bracing air of Boston Common. If he find that New York has had at his hands twenty operatic representations, for which he is compelled to draw on his security for ten thousand dollars to meet the deficit of receipts versus expenditures, why matter-of-fact people will be apt to admit that it would pay this benevolent creature far better to take his show somewhere else. And if he does, who is ready to repeat his experiment? The truth is New York pays so much per annum for opera which it demands, but the amount paid would not more than yield a fair profit to a minstrel company, if any could be found to engage the Academy nightly for six months. This may sound disrespectful, but the statement is Gradgrindian, as future figures may show.

If patience is being wearied, suppose that the reader favor us by looking over this little sum:

Expenses of one good operatic representation. . . . $1,000
Receipts at one good operatic representation (average). . . . 1,200

Excess of outlay over income. . . . $400

Now carry this calculation through a season of twenty representations, and we discover a loss of $8,000.

This curious result may pique inquiry still further, and so we will append some items illustrative of where the money goes to.

The smallest orchestra that ought to be employed at the Academy, as computed by the best authority, should consist of sixty-four instruments, as follows:

Violins, first. . . . .	12
Violins, second. . . . .	10
Violas. . . . .	8
Violoncellos. . . . .	8
Contrabasses. . . . .	6
Flutes, first and second. . . . .	2
Piccato. . . . .	1
Hautboys, first and second. . . . .	2
Clarinet, first and second. . . . .	2
Bassoons, first and second. . . . .	2
Horns. . . . .	4
Trombones, tenor. . . . .	4
Trumpets, first and second. . . . .	2
Base Tuba. . . . .	1
Kettle drums, pair. . . . .	1
Total. . . . .	64

This classification is about up to opera requirements, but managers have usually deemed it expedient to live on half or two-third orchestral rations. We have heard operas at the Academy when only thirty instruments were present; and even now the weakness in the string department is lamentable, though owing probably more to the actual scarcity of players than the spirit of managerial economy. Probably a fair estimate of the average expense of each instrument for one week is fifteen dollars. Fifty instruments then cost about seven hundred and fifty dollars for five performances—three nights in New York, one in Brooklyn, and one matinee—weekly. In Paris musicians receive from four to six dollars a week at the Grand Opera, consequently an orchestra of one hundred and fifty there is had for the same money that obtains one of fifty here. The salaries of artists here are paid in gold or its equivalent, and generally average higher than the highest European standard, except in certain remarkable cases.

Mr. Maretzek pays monthly to Madame Medori, $3,000; to Mlle. Sulzer, $1,000; to Mlle. Ortolani Brignoli, $1,000; to Signor Mazzoleni, $2,000; to Signor Bellini, $1,000; and to Signor Biachi, $1,000. An idea of the increase obtained by artists within a few years in New York will be gained by giving the salaries that were paid by Mr. Maretzek to a company that excited interest some dozen years ago. Then Madame Bosio received $1,000 or 1,200 a month; Signor Salvi, tenor, 1,500; Signor Radiali, baritone, 800; Signor Marini, basso, 800, and Mlle. Vietti, contralto, 400. The present company is the most expensive one that Maretzek has ever brought out. In addition to the salaries of his leading people and the enormous weekly stipend of the orchestra, the manager is saddled with a heavy rent—how much at this time we cannot say positively—a heavy expenditure for advertising and printing, for a chorus, and for an army of scene painters, stage carpenters, machinery operators, costume makers, supernumeraries, doorkeepers, porters, messengers, hallet people, &c., besides a number of box-office employees whose services are indispensable to the satisfactory conducting of a season. Into these several channels the money pours from the pocket-source, and a nice calculation which need not be reproduced here shows that the average expenses of one single operatic representation are, as we stated, about $1,600. It is seldom that the receipts warrant this outlay.

Mr. Grau, we have good reason to believe, seldom allowed his expenses to gallop beyond $900 or 1,000 per night, and so furnished an exception to the rule that managers are prone to infatuation and court disaster. But Mr. Grau hardly satisfied the exigent taste of his patrons by the system which he introduced, although there can be no question but that facts justified his policy. The artists' salaries paid by him latterly, we believe, amounted to a monthly total of 4,000 dollars for six persons. Mr. Maretzek's corresponding expenses for six artists will be observed to foot up as high as 9,000 dollars, and all other expenses are proportionately greater this season than last. Yet the capacity of the Academy is no greater than before, and the rates of admission are the same. Mr. Grau was singularly fortunate in obtaining such good voices as are numbered in his company at such low rates. We doubt if he could do it again. Artists of high European estimation will not cross the Atlantic unless they can obtain a large advance on the salaries which they command in the old world. A year from now the prospect is that the cost of a season's opera will be full one-quarter if not a third greater than at present.

However, these facts should not be deemed wholly discouraging. Let it be always borne in mind that Italian opera never has paid its own way when living respectably anywhere. It must be nurtured by public and private liberality. Except in this country it has never been esteemed a commodity to be speculated in. Our academies have been built on the same principle as our railroads, canals, and ocean steamers. The capitalists have deemed it possible to make art pay its regular dividends—and no doubt it has seemed strange to many a stockholder that it won't. When a man offers five thousand dollars for a painting by Church, does he propose to sell it again to one who will bid higher? Generally he does not. His taste will not readily yield to the temptings of his pocket. He does not consider his money as thrown away. Why then should such a person view the patronage bestowed on art in another form as wanton waste unless it returns itself with interest within a specified time? True, the works of the painter are permanent monuments of genius, and as such command prices at all times, the same as merchantable commodities, but then they are equally liable to depreciate in value. But these considerations really have but little weight with genuine connoisseurs of painting and sculpture. Why should a different spirit exist when the fostering of a kindred art is in question? That it does exist needs no confirmation.

Music Abroad.

PARIS.—At the Grand Opera, during the first week of March, two representations of Manon Lescaut were given, and the first performance of La Mule de Pedro, a light, comic opera by Victor Massé, pronounced skilfully written, but not equal in vivacity to his Les Noces de Jeannette and other sprightly trifles. Mme. Guymard and MM. Faure and Warot (his debut at this theatre) took part in it.

Rossini's Comte Ory, another of the only three or four little operas which have figured at the Imperial Theatre for some time past, was in rehearsal, with Warot, Obin, Borchardt, Mmes. Vandenhoevel and de Taisy in the principal roles.

Tamberlik has made his first re-appearance at the Italian theatre in Polinto. Otello was announced for the following week.

The first representation of Mozart's Così fan tutte (the title changed to Les Peines d'Amour perdues) took place during the same week at the Théâtre Lyrique.

Offenbach's new operetta, Les Bavards, has obtained an immense success at the Bouffes-Parisiennes. The Entr'acte talks of the originality of the piece the beauty of the score, in which Offenbach has surpassed himself, the consummate comic acting and singing of Mme. Ugalde, the fine mise en scène &c.

On the 9th of March Mlle. Gillebert (whose name spelt backwards makes Trebelli, the admired contralto) was married to the tenor, Alessandro Bettini, at the church of St. Roch.—On the same day, at noon, in the church of St. Eustache, Mozart's Requiem was performed in memory of Wilhelm (founder of the Orpheonist societies), by the Orpheonists, the choirs of the city of Paris and the orchestra of the Popular Concerts, under the direction of M. Padeloup. The proceeds went to operatives in cotton mills thrown out of work.

The fifth of the famous Conservatoire Concerts (Sunday, March 8) had for its programme: Symphony No. 31 of Haydn; Chorus from Custor at Pollux, by Rameau; fragment from Beethoven's "Men of Prometheus"; Psalm (double chorus) by Mendelssohn; 7th Symphony by Beethoven.

On the same day was the fourth Popular Concert of Classical Musical (third and last series), under Padeloup's direction. The pieces were: Symphony in G, No. 45, by Haydn; Allegretto un poco agitato (op. 58) by Mendelssohn; Heroic Symphony by Beethoven; Overture to Semiramide.—Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave" overture, and Schumann's Symphony in B flat were the chief features of the preceding concert.

Mme. Clara Schumann was to give her second concert, at Erard's rooms, with the assistance of Mme. Viardot, Mme. Szarvady (Wilhelmina Clauss) and other distinguished artists.

BERLIN.—The tenor Wachtel has had great success in the parts of Jean of Leyden in the Prophète and Raoul in the Ugouettes.

Two little French operas, Les Pêcheurs de Catane and La Cloche de l'Ermite have had a good run at Kroll's, where Sivori, the violinist, also helps to draw the crowd.

Handel's oratorio of "Samson" has been given with great effect by Stern's Society.

Mlle. Artot was to sing her part in the Domino noir in Gorman.

The Baroness Delphine von Schaurroth, to whom Mendelssohn dedicated his Concerto in G minor, lately performed that piece in a charitable concert given by six ladies of noble birth. Mendelssohn became acquainted with her in Munich when she was a young girl, and admired her talent so much that he wrote the Concerto for her. She has composed some classical pieces said to be of sterling merit. Her playing, both as to technics and artistic conception, is highly praised.

VIENNA.—Adelina Patti and the tenor Giuglini have had wonderful success in La Sonnambula. Their triumph in Don Pasquale was equally great. In Il Barbiere, Patti's Rosina ravished the audience; and Carrion (the Almaviva) is one of the few tenors who recall the best days of the Rossini period.

DRESDEN.—Rubinstein's new opera, Lalla-Rookh, has been given at the court theatre with great success. Critics praise its fresh and graceful melodies, its original, yet not far-fetched, rhythms and modulations, its richly colored, yet simple and natural instrumentation. "In short the whole score breathes a dreamy, oriental poesy, perfectly in harmony with the subject." The principal parts were sung by Schnorr von Karolsfeld (tenor) and Mme. Janner-Krall.

TRIESTE.—Alfred Jaell still follows up his triumphs. Four concerts have not sufficed for the enthusiasm of the people of his native city. A young violinist, Consolo, pupil of Léonard, took part in Jaell's concerts. It is said he promises to be a future Paganini—but that is said so often!

London.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE (Opera), Mr. Mapleson manager, was to open last Saturday, April 11.

The best artists of last season are retained, and the strength of the company increased in each department. Mlle. Titiens, Mlle. Trebelli, Mlle. Louise Michal, Madame Lemaire, Signors Giuglini, Zucchini, Vialelli, M. Gassier, and Mr. Santley, alone make up an efficient company. To these the director has added Madame Alboni, Mlle. Kellogg (the young American prima donna, promised last year), Mlle. Artot (her first appearance in England), and Mlle. Rosa de Rada (ditto); Geremia Bettini (brother to Alessandro), Alessandro Bettini (brother to Geremia); two new tenors—Signor Baragli, from Madrid, and Signor Gambetti, of whom we know nothing; Signor Delle Sedie, the barytone, whom Mr. Mapleson originally introduced to London at the Lyceum, and who last year was at the Royal Italian Opera; Signor Rovere, formerly prima buffo at Covent Garden; Signor Fagotti, whom E. T. Smith brought out at at Drury Lane in his Italian Opera Season; Signor Fricca, of the Royal Opera, Berlin, and Signor Baggiolo, from Parma and Barcelona, both first appearances. Among these may be concealed a Tamberini or a Lablache.

The new works promised are Verdi's last opera, La Forza del destino, to be brought out under the "immediate personal superintendence" of the composer; M. Gounod's Faust, to be produced under the "personal superintendence" of its composer; and M. Flotow's Stradella, also to be produced under the personal superintendence of its "eminent composer." (Is M. Flotow the only "eminent"?)

The following operas will be revived:—Linda di Chamouni, for Mlle. Kellogg; Fidelio, for Mlle. Titiens; and Oberon, with the following cast—Sir Huon, Signor Baragli; Oberon, Signor A. Bettini; Scherazmin, Mr. Santley; Babelkah, Signor Gassier; Fatima, Madame Alboni; Puck, Mlle. Trebelli; Mermaid, Mlle. Kellogg; and Rezia, Mlle. Titiens.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—A remarkable feature in Mr. Gye's prospectus is the strange names it includes. No less than nine singers are announced to make "their first appearance at the Royal Italian Opera," all of whom, except one (Signor Naudin), pay their first visit to England. These are—Mlles. Fioretti, Maurenst, Elvira Demi, de Maffei and Pauline Lucca; Signors Naudin, Ferensai, Cafferi, and M. Obin. Signor Naudin was last season at Her Majesty's Theatre. That much dependence is placed on the new comers is shown by the parts assigned to them. Mlle. Fioretti (well known to Naples, Vienna and St. Petersburg) comes out as Elvira (I Puritani), Mlle. Elvira Demias as Desdemona, Mlle. Lucca as Valentine (Huguenots), Signor Ferensai as Edgardo (Lucia), Signor Cafferi as Arnold (Guillaume Tell) and M. Obin as Bertram (Robert le Diable)—all characters of importance. Of Mlle. Lucca the Berlin journals speak in high terms, and M. Obin is first bass at the Grand Opera of Paris. To counterbalance those additions to the company we are to lose Mesdames Cillag and Penco, Signors Gardoni and Delle-Sedie. However much the first three may be regretted, none will complain that Signor Ronconi, who returns after a long illness, is to take the place of the last—and this with no disrespect to Sig. Delle-Sedie.

Mlle. Adelina Patti! Mlle. Patti could ill be spared. We are glad to find her repertory enlarged by new parts selected with judgment. Ninetta (La Gazza Ladra), Adina (Elisir d'Amore) Maria (La Figlia del Reggimento), and Zerlina (Fra Diavolo), are each and all well suited to her powers. In the Elisir d'Amore and Fra Diavolo she will be associated with Signors Mario and Ronconi. Signor Mario is to play the hero of Auber's opera, for the first time; not so, however, Nemorino, as stated. The other lady singers are Mlles. Antoinetta Fricci, Marie Battu, Dottini and Anese, Mesdames Miolan-Carvalho, Didié, Rundersdorff and Tagliafico; the other tenors, Signor Tamberlik, Neri Baraldi, Lucchesi, and Rossi; the other barytones and basses, Signors Graziani, Tagliafico, Fellar, Ciampi and Capponi, M. Zelger and Herr Formes.

Two works new to this country are promised—Signor Verdi's La Forza del destino and M. Flotow's Stradella. "Three of the principal rôles having been written expressly for Madame Didié, Signors Tamberlik and Graziani" will make the production of the former comparatively easy. Among the revivals most worthy notice are La Gazza Ladra, Otello and the Etoile du Nord. Meyerbeer's opera was produced towards the close of the season 1855, and performed seven times. In 1856 the theatre was burnt down. The part of Caterina is to be sustained by Madame Miolan-Carvalho.

The band and chorus will speak for themselves on the opening night, Tuesday, April 7th, when Masanella is to be given, with (we may presume) the same distribution of parts as last season. It is unnecessary to add that Mr. Costa is once more "director of the music, composer and conductor."—Musical World.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, APRIL 18, 1863.

The change from the habits of a weekly to those of a fortnightly journal is beset, in the beginning, with some unexpected difficulties, which render it impossible to make this number a fair illustration of the working plan into which we hope, after two or three experiments, to settle. To-day we present by no means such a paper, or such proportions of various kinds of matter, as it is our hope to give. It involves much change of method and arrangement, and we have much to learn in the art of condensing; besides that we must impress that art upon our correspondents and contributors, who have kindly continued to favor us at a rate that would soon overflow the single bucket which now takes the place of two. Letters, already in type a week since, are partly superseded by more recent dates; and so we have been reluctantly compelled to some abridgment of these favors; and even now our columns of correspondence are not free from repetition. For some letters, which we would gladly print, we have absolutely no room to-day; some of them will serve for next time.

A little time will adjust the machinery. Then, with method, and, above all, conciseness, friends, we shall begin to go all right.

Concert Review.

PHILHARMONIC.—The sixth and last of CARL ZERRAHN's present series (which we are sorry to learn has not proved remunerative, although so much that was excellent has been offered) took the form of a benefit to him, and was given in the Academy of Music. The audience was very large. The orchestra sounded well, although two important members of the first violin group, Messrs. Eichberg and Schultze, were missing.—The opening piece was Spohr's Symphonic Poem (as it might be called with as much reason as those works of Liszt, the commonly accredited inventor of the form and name), "The Consecration of Tones." The programme contained an English version of the poem, which furnishes the poetic contents of the music.

We cannot think that this was a happy selection for the winding up of a series of concerts, Spohr, with all his excellencies, musical magnate as he was, had not the quickening and inspiring sort of genius. In his larger works, even the best of them, he grows monotonous, fatiguing. You feel that there is much excellent matter, many beautiful and delicate thoughts, wonderful skill in treatment, and even great diversity in the successive phases of the masterly unfolding; and still the effect is cloying, wearisome and drowsy. This Wehe der Töne is his best work, and every one really interested in music wants to hear, more than once in his life, the best work of so great a musician as Spohr. We heard it ourselves with great interest when it was first brought out here ten or twelve years ago by the Germanians; we have not found that interest to grow with repetition. Although several passages, such as the Cradle Song and more of the second part, the theme of the Allegro, after Tone is born, &c., are always beautiful, yet the work as a whole seems every time more heavy—an experience which no one has with Beethoven at least, to name no other. This Symphony certainly deserves a place in some part of a series of concerts that is continued year by year; our only quarrel with it is that it should have come in just at this time, for the finale of our season. We wanted the vigorous and bracing breath of a Beethoven to clear away the sultry and oppressive atmosphere of that day of sudden summer; but this partook too much of the same Sirocco quality. Spohr's instrumentation, too, with all its art, sounds dull and close and, as it were, matted down, compared with the lively, springing, pungent quality of Beethoven's, or the elastic brilliancy of Rossini's. On the other hand, it is but justice to Mr. Zerrahn to say, that there is much in this kind of music which appeals to a wide public of its own, to almost all persons, perhaps, at the sentimental age; and to these too he must appeal, or give his concerts only to the few.

The other purely orchestral pieces were the Andante from the "Jupiter" Symphony of Mozart, and Beethoven's "Leonora" Overture, No. 3, always most acceptable.

Miss ELIZA JOSSELYN played Mendelssohn's G minor Concerto in a manner very creditable for a young lady for the first time attempting so formidable a task, with orchestra, before a great public. She has studied earnestly and intelligently during her three years in Weimar and Leipzig. It would be too much to say that there were not defects; there was a certain stiffness in the general rendering, more force than delicacy often, and in some parts, especially the rapid finale, the execution was not always clean. Doubtless allowance is to be made for the debutante not feeling quite at ease; one may show force of will, as she did, and yet not realize the freedom so essential to an artistic act. We should think Miss Josselyn excellently qualified for a teacher, and for classical interpretation to a very considerable degree; but the gift for really fine Concerto playing belongs after all to few.—The singing was no addition to the concert, but an added weight. It was simply a mistake. An unfinished pupil makes her trial effort in a formidable piece like the Frey-schütz Scena, only to prove that it is beyond her powers, so far as yet developed, and make everybody feel that a classical Philharmonic Concert is not the proper place for such experiments. We could not but sympathize with the young lady, who had been ill advised. The intonation was false, the tones sounded hard and forced, the whole thing was crude. In the Frey-schütz piece, the interest of the orchestral portions partly saved it; but it was worse in the popular waltz "Il Bacio", where the music in itself is common-place, and is only useful for the brilliant display of a well trained voice. As we said, we have more sympathy than blame for the singer, placed in so false a position. The real and only important question is, whether it has been wise, or just to the subscribers to a set of first-class orchestral concerts, to introduce pupils for singers, risking the chances of their first trials. We have not room to say all we would about it now; but we may at least suggest, that there was no need of any singing at all in a programme otherwise so rich; and that there is no gap in a concert which a good orchestra cannot fill far more acceptably than any singing which is not of a really high order. Unfortunately for us and for him, Mr. Zerrahn has not had that constant support from a musical public, which could make it unnecessary for him to try experiments.

Mr. Eichberg's "Rose of Tyrol"

Another light, fresh, humorous little operetta by the author of "The Doctor of Alcantara," who seems to have opened here a vein of composition and a career, which might suggest comparison with those of Offenbach. The Boston Museum, if it keeps on in this vein, will become our Bouffes Parisiennes. The new piece was performed every evening last week to a crowded house.

Mr. Eichberg has not been so fortunate in a libretto this time as he was before. The "Doctor" was a trifle, a Possencpiel or nonsense piece, as the Germans call it, but it had real laughing matter in it, and piqued the composer's humorous fancy more originally by some of its points. The present plot and dialogue are rather flat and pointless. There are only three characters, Grittly (the Rose) and Franz, her lover, who are Tyrolean travelling minstrels on their way through Swabia to Strasburg, and Berthold who figures as a pedler and turns out to be the rich uncle, supposed lost. It all turns on a mistake about the number of a lottery ticket, which the silly Franz has bought, who on the false presumption of a prize, buys out the pedler's fineries and puts on the fine gentleman, in spite of Grittly's sensible protest and entreaties, to whom however he remains faithful, before as after the discovery of the mistake, and so it all ends happily. But there is a chance for some very good music, to relieve the audience, as much as the flat spoken dialogue relieves the singers' voices, and Mr. E. has well improved his opportunities.

First there is a clever overture, in a light opera comique style, pleasing in all but the rather humdrum quality of the Allegro tune that sets in after the pretty pastoral introduction. The curtain rises on a rousing chorus of vintners: "The harvest is over." The heroine's voice is heard approaching over the mountains in a tender Arioso, greeting the "scones of the past." This and several songs of hers which follow, now with chorus, now with her lover, are melodious and pleasing, if not particularly original. Miss CAROLINE RICHINGS, one of the most accomplished singers of English whom we have had since Miss Louise Pyne, at once established her welcome in these little pieces. In the "Tyrolienne" she displayed some admirable execution; her trill is remarkably perfect. Her voice is clear and powerful, although a little hard, but always artistically managed.

Then comes in the pedler (Mr. RUDOLPHSEN), and the peasants crowd around him as he sings his buffo proclamation of his wares;—a Dr. Dulcamara in a smaller way. His is about the best part in the play; the comic concerted pieces of which he forms the centre contain the happiest musical inventions, and Mr. R. sings and acts well his part throughout. Perhaps the Trio in which he announces the lottery prizes, is the best music in the opera. We think Mr. Eichberg's muse is happier and more original in this class of pieces, than in set tunes or arias. But the latter are addressed to a Museum public, and must needs be somewhat common-place and sentimental to reach their destination. The Finale of the first act is droll and lively.

Grittly's ballad in the second act, mourning the loss of her guitar flung away by foolish Franz, is touching and was beautifully sung. There follow: a nice duet, in which uncle pedler feigns to tempt the Rose; some couplets, very grotesquely treated, between her and Franz: "A fool! a fool!" a Terzetto (Franz's despair on finding his mistake), and a very effective jubilant Finael, consisting of a full chorus and a brilliant waltz air sung by Grittly. Mr. HILL's tenor voice still gains in power and beauty, and his singing was artistic in a high degree. The choruses were better sung, and the little orchestra far more effective and more musical, than one would ever have expected from the Museum. But they have Eichberg for director! This evening he is to have a Complimentary Benefit, when both the "Rose of Tyrol" and the "Doctor of Alcantara" will be performed.

OUR ARTISTS.—The third and last "Reception", was given at the Studio Building last week, Wednesday evening. What is more agreeable than artist life, unless it be their pictures? There is so much geniality, innocent freedom, hearty, happy industry natural good will among them, that we sometimes fancy that the best type of true society we have is that of artists. On these delightful occasions, a thousand or more guests, a brilliant company, are admitted into all the studios in that cheerful and capacious hotel of Art, and meet the artist in the midst of his works. There seems to be endless riches and variety. Especially was it so on this last occasion. Such beautiful creations as you might see wherever you turned in with the tide; such old master-like portraits, "singing" and "listening" groups, "trumpeter," &c., in Hunt's room; such wealth of color, rivalling the profuse flowers there were there, in Ames's; such lovely crayon heads by Rowse and by Miss Cheney; such truthful, quiet, sincere beach views by Gay; such wondrous marine pictures by Bradford; such charming landscapes by Inness, Bricher, Champney, Gerry, Ordway, Williams, Hodgdon and others; such perfect lithographs by Fabronius; all, while they charm you separately, make up a bewitching and yet harmonious total impression, by which the mind feels its own inward wealth increased and its horizon widened. But most of all is one struck by the great progress which the painting art has made here in our town within a few years; the evidence thereof is noticeable in every studio, so that no aspirant need feel discouraged. It is a capital thing for Art and artists and art-lovers, this bringing them together in a Studio Building. Here mutual emulation goes with mutual good will; each is inspired to do his best; the general life keeps up the life in each. And these "Receptions" bring the right public into direct contact with the artists, educating the taste and creating a demand for works of Art. Would that we had room to describe and to appreciate all that we saw that evening!

Building. We have seen no such real mountains in any painting that we can recall, except in some by Calame, the great Swiss painter. The snow-capped, glacier-collared summits in the background; the grand sweep of the middle distance sloping from the side, with the perfect sunlight upon rock and tree and water; the rich, wide plain of the foreground so gloriously and comfortably encircled, with its picturesque details of Indian life, are all brought together without any poor and separate effect of detail, so that you feel the whole as if it were one great piece of sublime Nature, with real sky and atmosphere.—But go and see it.

LISZT'S "LIFE OF CHOPIN." The first complete English translation of this exquisite tribute of an artist to a brother artist is at length published by F. Leypoldt, Philadelphia. It is, indeed, a beautiful little volume; paper, type, binding, and the whole external style, are most inviting, and worthy of the precious contents. A fine photograph portrait of Chopin faces the title page.

Liszt has given us a most loving, subtle, just appreciation of the composer and his music. He has written the inner life of him as well as the outward. Especially has he illustrated the influence of his Polish nationality, which so pervades his music. More brilliantly imaginative chapters than those in which he describes the Polish dances (Polonaise, Mazurka, &c.) are hardly to be found in any novel. But we have no room now for extracts, nor to say the fitting word of such a book. For the present we will only say that the translation, by Mrs. MARTHA WALKER COOK, reads admirably well, being true to the sense, if somewhat free in style; in this "labor of love" she has entered into the spirit of the book. Every lover of Chopin's music should possess it. Some copies may be found at Ditson's.

We have received and shall soon print a glowing article about it from a contributor; its great length precludes it this week.

New Music.

(From Oliver Ditson & Co.)

FRANZ SCHUBERT. The Trout: "One May day in the Morning," pp. 7.

The well known "Forelle" (French, La Truite) of the great German song composer will of course be welcome to all who can sing it or get any one to sing it. It is one of his happiest and most characteristic things. The simple melody, to words describing the sly fish "shooting like an arrow" through the brook, and how he is angled for in vain so long as the water remains clear, but when it is troubled nibbles and is caught, is accompanied by a figure which well suggests the flashing, sportive freedom of the happy creature in his element: Well sung and well played it is charming. We only regret that the English words (borrowed from old Isaac Walton) leave the trout entirely out; they are singable, pretty verses in praise of the angler's life. But the German words are also given.

C. KRENS. The Heather Bell. (Blümlein auf der Haide.) pp. 7.

A very pretty song of its kind, which is not the highest or the most original. A somewhat Tyrolean vein of melody, with an easy flow and likely to be popular. Krebs, like Aht, Proch, Kücken, &c., belongs to the Dä minores of German song, who please the many, while the more exacting few turn to rarer geniuses like Schubert, Franz and Schumann. Both German and English words are here given.

L. ARDITI. Il Bacio (The Kiss): with English, German and Italian words. pp. 9.

A waltz for the voice! And why should not voices waltz, seeing that they revel in so many other daring intricacies of motion, such fantastical gymnastics, such flashing, dazzling pyrotechnics? Concert singers like to display their agile virtuosity in such things; and surely the waltz form is one of the most graceful and most loyal to some law amid its freakishness. So the Benzano and other waltzes vocalized, have become favorite show pieces with the bright sopranos. And here is another bright and graceful one, which is the most popular of all just now. It answers its purpose, which of course is not a very high one.

OTTO DRESEL. Die Forelle: Song by Fr. Schubert, transcribed for the Piano. pp. 5.

Our friend "the Trout" again, revelling in pure tones, are an element liquid and as sparkling as his native brook. This transcription is made by a true artist, and brings voice part and accompaniment together into a clear, beautiful, complete whole. So the pianist, though he be no singer, can tell the story of the trout quite satisfactorily. Its technical difficulty is not so great, but that it lies within the reach of many an amateur player.

MENDELSSOHN. Op. 16. Trois Fantaisies ou Caprices pour Piano. pp. 11.

These need no praise of ours. They are real Mendelssohnian little tone-poems. A fine fancy lies in each of them; and a fine feeling and artistic grace. They are not very difficult, and will form charming studies, such as one after study will not willingly forget. No. 1 opens with a pensive Volkslied-like Andante in A minor, and soon passes into an Allegro vivace in A major, 6-8 time, which tells of clear blue skies and sunny serenity and life tingling in every fibre, like the Allegro of the Italian Symphony; only it is a very little sketch compared to that. No. 2, Presto, a light, crisp, fairy-footed Scherzo in E minor, is more in the "Midsummer Night's Dream" vein. No. 3, an even flowing, beautiful Andante.

(From G. D. Russell & Co.)

C. MAYER. Transcriptions for the Piano. No. 1. Barcarolle by Schubert; No. 2. Zuleika, Mendelssohn; No. 3. Sunday Song, Do. pp. 7, 3, 3.

Who is C. Mayer? We have heard hints, but—one who can transcribe the gems of song so well, might, one would think, give us some gems of his own; for he treats these flowers as if he knew their inmost nature. But such transcriptions, like that of "The Trout" above mentioned, are a truer service to the cause of Art than nine-tenths of the so-called original compositions of the day. Schubert's exquisite Barcarolle is made to sing itself most perfectly, with the watery accompaniment and all the fine imaginative traits, the ever shifting play of light and shade, of smiles and tears. It is difficult, but worth the pains to master it.—The Zuleika is an excellent study in the art of playing a flowing arpeggio accompaniment between a deep bass and a treble melody. In his case it is poetry as well.—The Sunday Song is far easier, although the transcriber tells us in a note, that the main features of his arrangement are borrowed from Liszt's transcription of the same song.

LOUIS LIEBE. SONG: We'll meet above (Auf Wiedersehen). Arranged for Alto or Baritone by R. Wittmann. pp. 5.

A very pleasing, tender melody, simple and well accompanied. The German words are given with a good singable translation by C. J. Sprague. It is the first specimen of a collection of German songs, under the name of "Alemannia."

OTTO DRESEL. Army Hymn, by O. W. HOLMES, for solo and chorus ad libitum, with piano accompaniment for two or four hands.

The impression which this noble setting of a noble hymn produced at the Jubilee Concert on the First of January, made it imperative that it should be published. Mr. Dresel has improved it not a little in the meantime, especially in the chorus portion at the end. The simple, noble melody, the grand, broad, ringing harmony, the freedom from all humdrum, all maudlin sentiment, all empty glitter of effect, and the perfect fitting to the words, make it the most important patriotic offering of music during this great war. A "National Air" it cannot be, for much of its essential character lies in the accompaniment, the harmony.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, APRIL 7.—The Academy has never, within my recollection, presented such a series of brilliant assemblages as during the past month of the MARETZKE troupe performances. No matter what the weather, what the work announced, what substitution, the house has been overcrowded almost without exception. The general character of the troupe is fair. The leading artists, MEDORI, SULZER, MAZZOLENI, BELLINI and BIACHI, are very meritorious, and in some renditions as perfectly satisfactory to the public as could be desired. BRIGNOLI, MINETTI, SBRIGLIA, IPPOLITO and COLLETTI are also good in their special roles, and as a general thing have been very successful. My last letter included the announcement of the performance of Ernani. Since then we have had the following performances: Traviata, with Brignoli, Mazzoleni, Bellini; Un Ballo in Maschera with Guerrabella, Sulzer, Mazzoleni, Bellini; La Favorita, with Sulzer, Sbriglia, Bellini, Biachi; Norma, with Medori, Sulzer, Mazzoleni, Biachi; Linda di Chamounix, with Medori, Sulzer, Minetti, Biachi, Colletti; Semiramide, with Guerrabella, Sulzer, Minetti, Biachi; Lucia, with Brignoli, Mazzoleni, Ippolito; Ione, with Medori, Mazzoleni, Bellini, Biachi and Sulzer.

The great hit of the season has been Norma. Medori has in the Druid priestess a grand rôle, and she is eminently qualified to interpret it. Norma has had three performances, and to such houses! "Standing room only" is a very brief but indicative sentence, and one very rarely required at the opera, but it was brought out from its dusty resting place and hung upon the "outer wall" of the Academy three successive nights—and what for? Norma, that well-known, well-thumbed, well-whistled, well-ground opera, with its melodies and gems sung threadbare, brought that dusty placard into service again. The performance was certainly well worth the commendation it received at the hands of the public and the press. Medori was magnificent. All the adjectives of the English language were brought into service, and as to Mazzoleni, words were not found indicative enough. The Adalgisa of Sulzer, and Orovos of Biachi were in harmony with the successes of the other rôles, and Norma flourished with undiminished splendor for three nights.

Semiramide was produced for one performance, with a very creditable display of scenery and appointments. The cast embraced Guerrabella, Sulzer, Minetti, Biachi, all of whom looked very finely, but Biachi alone seemed to grasp at the requirements of the rôle. Guerrabella looked as royal and queenly as one could imagine the Babylonian queen herself, and Sulzer made quite a dangerous looking Commander-in-chief. Neither artist, however, has voice of sufficient power to cope with the difficult music of Rossini's master-work.

Minetti, one of Maretzke's reserve tenors, made his debut in Linda di Chamounix. He is a tenore di grazia of very good method, and was very acceptable. The performance of Linda was very fine. Medori, Sulzer, Bellini, Biachi, and Colletti were the principals of the cast and were eminently successful. Bellini, as the aged Antonio, was very grand, and in the third act won immense applause. Medori made a very charming Linda, and it was a performance meritorious enough to deserve a repetition. Last night Petrella's "Ione," or "The Last Days of Pompeii" was introduced with a magnificent cast and with very fine scenic effects. The plot and principal characters of the opera "were borrowed by Peruzzini from Bulwer's "Last Days of Pompeii," so says the libretto. The argument of the opera is highly dramatic. Details in my next.

To-night, Mr. Harrison, the enterprising manager of Irving Hall, introduced Ms. GOTTSCHALK to the public for a short series of concerts. He will be assisted by Mrs. MARIE ABBOTT, Miss EMILIE BOUGHTON—the lady who made the fiasco in Italian opera at the Academy—and several others of reputation.

Old Palmo, the first manager of opera in America, who is now a cook in a Broadway restaurant, is to have a benefit given him by the artists now in the city, as a token of their appreciation of his merits and sympathy for his misfortune. The old man has free entrée at the Academy and his hand is clasped by many who know him in his happier days.

Our mutual friend, "A. W. T.," the "Diarist," left on Saturday, in the Saxon, for Hamburg, en route for Vienna. He paid a hurried visit to his friends in this city, who would have liked to have seen more of him.

"Trovatore" is off again on one of his flying trips to Europe. He sails on Saturday next on a mission of importance, and I doubt not you will hear from him ere long from some distant resting-place in his journey.

Mr. CHAS. JEROME HOPKINS gave an exhibition of his "Free Chorister School" at a Brooklyn church yesterday afternoon. Those who were present give it the indorsement of a success.

The present season has wrought quite a revival in the musical world, which it is to be hoped will have a more enduring existence than heretofore.

T. W. M.

NEW YORK, APRIL 13.—The musical events of the past two weeks have not been altogether devoid of interest. Besides the repetition of well known and somewhat hacknied operas (Lucia di Lammermoor, Linda di Chamounix, and act of Masaniello), the Italian opera company has given us two comparative novelties; Rossini's Semiramide, and Petrella's Ione. The representation of "Semiramide" was a failure from an artistic point of view; neither the Semiramide (GUERRABELLA) nor the Arsace (SULZER) of the occasion, were able to give effect to the pompous, florid luxuriance of the music of their parts. In consequence of this, and from other causes the opera dragged heavily.

The name of PETRELLA, the composers of "Ione," is little or not at all known here. He is a man of more than fifty years of age, who has attained a certain celebrity in Italy as the composer of five or six tolerably successful operas. The book of this opera, written by Peruzzini, and partly founded on Bulwer's novel "The last days of Pompeii"—with the plot of which all who read are well acquainted—is highly dramatic, while some of the verses are written with considerable poetic feeling. As to the music—it is certainly not all of the stereotyped Italian cut, but often original in melody, (nevertheless, reminiscences abound), and some of the recitatives are truly expressive of the words and situation. The finales to the second and third acts are remarkably effective. The instrumentation is fine at rare intervals; and again, often below mediocrity. The opera is, throughout, of unequal merit; but its beauties counterbalance its defects; and, partly owing to its dramatic plot, the interest never flags. It strikes us as the work of a man, who, had his knowledge at all equalled his natural gifts, might have made a great composer. The reminiscences to be found in the work, go to support this conclusion. Was it not Lord Bacon who said, that the more a man knows, the more original he becomes (provided, of course, that the matter that makes the foundation of originality be already there)?

MME. MEDORI sang superbly as Ione, and MAZZOLENI sang and acted admirably the part of Glauco; his fine and distinct enunciation of the words being, as usual, one of the greatest charms of his singing; would we could say as much of Mlle. SULZER; but her pronunciation is so vague and imperfect, that the whole tone-coloring of her voice becomes monotonous and tame, principally from this cause. The opera was well put upon the stage; and, if we may trust to encores, recalls, applause, and three performances, has been extraordinarily successful.

PHILADELPHIA, APRIL 3.—Decidedly the worst performance of Don Giovanni, at which it has been my misfortune to be present, was given by the Anschütz troupe on Monday. I cannot specify a single particular in the performance that would justify me in referring to it in terms of praise. Everything was bad; orchestra, chorus and artists. Mr. Anschütz led as if he was suffering with an attack of nervous debility; and Mr. Noll played his solo in the second act, the pizzicati to the serenade, so feebly that one had to look to satisfy himself that it was not Mr. Anschütz performing it upon the beautiful specimen of the modern spinet that decorates the orchestra during the opera seasons. The ladies were beneath criticism; all three, JOHANNSEN, BERKEL, and ZIMMERMAN, wretched to a degree hitherto unknown. May we be spared in future from being unwilling witnesses to such terrible sacrilege! Mr. Anschütz, as manager and conductor, is obviously the guilty party, and as such deserves the severest censure for his presumption; and I regret to find no comment in any of our daily prints upon this performance except a reference to it in one of them as a "charming performance." (Heaven save the mark!)

This was the last night of the season. Among the German operas produced, I would note for the attention of the curious, Fra Diavolo, The Postillion of Lonjumeau, Joseph in Egypt, Mason and Locksmith, and Jean de Paris.

I fear that the German opera, at least as represented by the majority of the works produced by Mr. Anschütz, is slightly overrated. Of course it is almost superfluous to say that the greatest operas are the German operas; but all German operas are not great works. There are many of them that are characterized by a national respectability, but which create no enthusiasm in a musical soul; representatives of this class are the Night in Grenada, the Wildschütz, Stradella, Martha, and the Czar and Zimmermann. At each representation of these the opera house was respectably filled. Now, the Night in Grenada and Martha are well enough in their way, but William Tell and Ernani (I am not afraid of being called a heretic) are better; but people crowd to hear those, while these scarcely repay the labor and expense necessary for their production. However, we lay the flattering unction to our satisfied souls, that we are, indeed, a most musical municipality, and that the opera house is a great, practical success. The opera house is a success, inasmuch as all extravagance in these "tragic days" is successful. People go to the opera in winter as they go to the ocean in summer time, to spend money and to show how well they dress; because the music is there they honor it with their occasional attention: when they tire of it they talk; probably many prefer the band of the United States Hotel to Mr. Anschütz's association of talent. Let no one suppose that the music has any more attraction now for the crowd than had Fidelio in 1857, when a very select audience of "sympathizing admirers" enjoyed this great work in the same opera house, that is now crowded from pit to dome, with — passionate admirers of Beethoven, of course. Many hopeful enthusiasts, considering solely the mighty throngs at the "Academy," delude themselves with the belief that a taste for the best music has suddenly inoculated the popular mind; but a candid mind cannot take so cheerful a view of the subject.

The present season of German opera, considered as a financial operation, makes one envious of all who were directly interested in the management; them would I congratulate, but not especially the public who have, undoubtedly, spent a great deal of money, but who have by no means had a surfeit, and who are to be considered no better judges of good music than they were prior to the advent of Anschütz and company.

Mr. WOLFSOHN gave his fourth soirée on March 26th. He was assisted by Messrs. AHREND, STOLL, BIRGFELD, KELLNER, and MÜLLER. So many pleasant recollections are associated with this concert that I find it impossible to specify any particulars, without making an invidious distinction. Suffice it, that Mr. Wolfsohn and Mr. Ahrend, to whom the solos were entrusted, fairly divided the palm. Both did their very best, and those that are familiar with their performances, know this to be the greatest praise that can be accorded them.

Mr. JOSEPH CORTESI, one of our most popular and successful singing teachers, has had a complimentary concert tendered him by a number of his pupils, among whom are many of the most accomplished amateurs. The concert is to be given at the Musical Fund Hall within a fortnight. I have no doubt that the established fame of Mr. Cortesi, as well as the ability and efforts of the ladies and gentlemen who are to assist, will attract an audience large enough to make it in every particular, a success that will do much to encourage a very worthy and competent gentleman.

APRIL 10.—The resumption of operatic responsibilities upon the Academy stage by Mr. Manager GRAU, led one to hope, that, in view of the names upon the prospectus, that great desideratum, a good opera, faithfully rendered, was at last to be vouchsafed us. But, alas for the futility of earthly anticipations! I wish it might become a custom with managements, never to produce an opera, unless it can be done in a manner superior to its last performance. The adoption of such a rule by our various operatic entrepreneurs, would secure to the public respectable performances. It would save and would have saved us from many a painful experience; especially, from the recent dreadful fate of seeing Don Giovanni murdered in a manner that Mozart never meant, and from Wednesday night's performance of Robert le Diable. Regarding Meyerbeer, I am not a Schumannite; I think Robert le Diable considerably superior to the best of Hippodrome music, and, therefore, deserving of better treatment in the hands of operatic managers than it has received from Mr. Grau.

The "BRETT children,"—ostensibly brothers, though in reality, not,—have been giving performances here, recently. It is curious to see a child of seven play the French horn, but it is not pleasant, I think, to listen. These young musicians are not prodigies, though I have no doubt they will become respectable performers, excepting the youthful hornist, who, I very much fear, will blow himself out, brains, lungs, stomach and all, long before reaching his majority. It is not pleasant to contemplate this hot-bed cultivation of musical talent. If the child gives token of possessing the divine gift, let him be encouraged and directed in the proper way, and in time he will be fit for the public. The many evidences of a tremendous pressure in their training, apart from a knowledge of their youth, incline me to the conviction that these children have not been allowed to wait long enough for their talent to bud and blossom in the due and proper course of nature.

Gade's 2d Symphony was performed by the GERMANIA, last Saturday. The Andante of the Symphony is decidedly the best portion. It redeems the work from the charge of imitation and heaviness, to which it could justly be held, were this movement no better than the others. The Scherzo is trivial, and while in place in the overture to a comic opera, is out of place in a classical symphony. The finale, I think, cannot be better characterized, than as a funeral march played Allegro molto. The imitated portions of the work are the best, being decidedly Mendelssohnian; the original, I trust, will themselves, never be copied, excepting the exquisite Andante.—The Symphony is a composition possessing, in the language of geometry, "length without breadth."

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Dublin Jaunting Car. Song. C. M. Eroy. 35

A lively Irish song, with an illustrated title-page containing a fine view of the spruce driver in front of his handsome car, which stands in front of the Old Irish Parliament House. After appearing in the picture, according to the song, the driver takes you around to see all the curiosities, including Donnybrook and the "Devil's Glen."

Dear Bay of Dublin. Song. C. M. Eroy. 35

Describes the beautiful bay of Dublin, which the author's "heart is troubled", begirt as it is by the "sweet Wicklow mountains." Title-page has a view of the really fine bay.

Jessy Darling. Song. C. M. Eroy. 35

A simple and good Irish love song, accompanied with a fine picture of Dermot and Jessie, and a ship in the distance. These three songs have been and are sung at exhibitions of the Hibernicon, or Tour in Ireland, and are favorites.

Soldier's Home. Ballad. S. A. Munson. 25

A very easy song and chorus, with a familiar melody, and excellent words.

Instrumental Music.

Immer Heiterer Waltzes. Strauss. 40

These "always cheerful" waltzes are very sunny and bright in character, and are considered to be among the better sort of dances by the celebrated dance maker.

Thormen Waltzes. Strauss. 50

Strauss, with his multitude of compositions, is sometimes hard pushed for a name. The above queer one seems to have some connection with the dedication of the music to the teachers of a medical institute in Vienna. The waltzes are first-rate, and rank high with those who have tried them.

Fairy Land. Schottisch de Concert.

Seven Octaves. 50

"Seven Octaves," it is fair to conclude, is one who has the whole keyboard under perfect control. In the Schottisch under consideration, he has given us a wild and sweet melody, with considerable variety, while the piece is not at all difficult. It is dedicated to Gottschalk.

Fairy Wedding Waltz. (Tom Thumb and Wife.)

J. W. Turner. 25

A very delicate and tasteful piano piece. Much satisfaction may it give to the little Mr. and Mrs. General T!

Books.

THE NIGHTINGALE. A choice collection of Songs, Chants, and Hymns, for Juvenile Classes, Schools, and Seminaries. By W. O. and H. S. Perkins. 35

Good books cannot last forever, and the many thousands who have used the "Golden Wreath" for themselves or pupils, during the past two or three years, are by this time wishing for a new collection of songs. To such ones the Nightingale can be recommended with confidence.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being about one cent on each piece. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that it is double.

On Liszt's Chopin.*

Last week you were with me, and to-day, on this blessed Holy Saturday, I am chanting over to myself,—thinking of your short-winged visit the while,—the compositions of an artist friend, which we admired together one little week ago this very day.

These beautiful Musical Beatitudes of Faustina Haase Hodges—"Cloister Memories"—have made a fitting and meet service for this Holy-day to me. Look over again that first one, "Blessed are the poor in spirit," and notice in the middle the royal crowning.

A fierce wild storm is driving around me out doors, and white swirls of snow are dashing up like waves on the wind ocean, carrying along with them slender branches of trees and clouds of young bird sheaths. A rough greeting to the young April buds and May blossoms; and I should tremble for my pretty plants, whose pointed green spikes and tender young leaves I noticed yesterday were peeping out to catch the sweet warm sun and breathe the soft spring air;—but I know the soil has strange secrets, which it will not yield up to science; and these seemingly rude snow storms in spring, and dry, unkind midsummer droughts are, in very truth, blessings in disguise; like some dear friends who hide hearts overrunning with rich tenderness and strong help, under a harsh outside. In the thirsty drought, Nature is plunging deep into Earth's bosom, drawing up from her very heart some secret food for the soil to be found nowhere else; and the cold snow is bringing down from high heaven upon the young plant, or grain, or fruit bud, some subtle life essence, or antidote against worm sting, which the most learned man in all the world would not know how to find. Therefore, we will accept graciously this January greeting to Easter Eve, knowing that to-morrow's sun will cover with warm kisses the sparkling icedew, pouring down a flood of warm life into earth's bosom.

Easter Eve! Even though it would be taking you from your holy church duties, I would fain have you with me this evening. Here lies a pleasant letter from you, which, though a part of you, is not you; and here is Miss Mulock's impassioned poem, "A common story"; and beside the two on the library desk lies something still better,—I am sure you would say—than even a letter from me, or the beautiful poem; and this thing it is I wish to have you here to enjoy with me.

Solitude is sweet—very sweet; and at most times I like it best. Do not call me ungracious, for I like it best only when I have little to share, beyond routine and the small, still pleasures of a retired life such as mine is now; but sometimes there comes a wind-fall of rich fruit; then I would like to throw my heart and library door open wide, and call in some one of the many I love dearly, to share my feast with me.

And what is this feast of the present moment? You remember some weeks since I mentioned at the close of an article in "Dwight's Journal of Music" on Mr. Brook's translation of "Titan" the approaching publication of a very fine translation of Liszt's curious monograph, "Chopin", to-day's mail brought me the promised volume, and this charming little book is the feast.

Mr. Leypoldt has shown much taste as well as courage in getting up this beautiful little series of translations. The first was Andersen's "Ice Maiden"† and other tales, a delicious little Ophelia bouquet of wild flowers and willow slips. Liszt's "Chopin" is the second, and both are presented in a form and a style, which must gratify the translators, and make the artistic reading public very grateful to the enterprising publisher.

Ten years! A long while ago, is it not? To look forward to—yes; but not a long while when one at last arrives at the end, and finds waiting there that which was desired, and which had to be yielded up at the time, without hope of possession in the future.

Ten years ago I first read the MS. of this excellent translation,—I have told you of it often; and I knew of its being offered for publication, not for gain, but simply for Art's service and help, and it was refused, as being an unsaleable work.

Artists and art lovers in America should feel very much encouraged when they see what advance has been made in these past ten years.—Not only is such a book saleable now, but this very one has been asked for, because in this decade of years an audience has arisen for it. I wonder if this experience will teach any one patience? I fear not, for it is but a repetition of the experience of others, and it is so hard to learn to eat one's daily bread of slow gathering success, crumb by crumb; and yet it rarely comes any other way, indeed to some it never comes at all!

Now a few words for the Tone-poet this book commemorates, and then, my Chopin-loving friend, I shall leave you to lose yourself in its glowing pages. At this moment, when every one is straining a listening ear above the noise and din of our own wild rage of conflict, to hear across the ocean the sound of the present Polish uprising, this Life of Chopin possesses a double and treble interest.

Chopin was a child born in that period well called "le berceau sanglant de la Sainte Alliance," when that "European remorse," as De Mazade calls Poland's partition, was being confirmed; "le prélude des bouleversements Européens," as Talleyrand characterized it. The word prélude too, is best, and Chopin was one of Poland's children, who chanted divinely, a part in the music of this Nation-prélude.

For two-thirds of a century cold-blooded diplomatists have been naming Polish demands for independence, "diplomatic impossibilities," and her submission to Russia "a diplomatic necessity;" and we have listened to the melodies of her poets and singers and regarded them "as the saddest, sweetest, most awful notes one may ever hear,—the eloquence of an expiring Nation." But now we may hope and believe Talleyrand's word "prélude," and while we listen anew to Chopin, hear in his notes the song greeting of the new day, rather than the death of the old life.

A great American orator said of Kossuth, that his eloquence held all with a chain, as absolute as that with which the Ancient Mariner kept back the bridal guest, after the music of the marriage feast had begun. And so it is with Chopin; while listening to his music we hear the whole story too of "one family of man oppressed by another, contending for freedom; cloven down on the field, yet again erect; the body dead, her spirit incapable of dying; the victim of treachery; the victim of power; yet breathing, sighing, lingering, dying, hoping through all the pain, the bliss of an agony of glory."‡

There is a celebrated Pole, Comte André Zamoyski, who is so beloved in Poland every one speaks of him as "Monsieur André;" De Mazade calls him the living conscience of the nation; some years ago he caused to be placed at the entrance of the crypt of the Church of Sainte Croix at Warsaw, a sculptured effigy, the peculiar sense of which the Russians did not see at first.

It is a Christ bowing down under a cross, who, raising his head with a despairing effort, points to heaven. Above it is written: "sursum cor"!

De Mazade says, "It is an image as touching as new of struggling nations, and struggling men who having faith in works, keep up hope even when hope seems no longer left to them." And this hope we can hear in Chopin's music.

You will notice in this beautiful translation how skilfully, and yet tenderly, Liszt has analyzed the subtle, interwoven-character of this Polish tone-poet. Chopin possessed the traditional genius of his Nation; its dramatic nature and secret sadness; his sentiment and feeling were so profound they seemed like instinct; this is said to be peculiar to the Sclavic races;—all this we hear in his music, and while listening to his compositions we are thrown into a state of vague, sorrowful reverie, and a mystic, supernatural emotion thrills through us, as if we felt the movement of unseen spirits beside us.

In Chopin this instinct became exalted, as it were, owing to his social position and physical feebleness; touching society only on his wounded side, as the expatriated artist must necessarily, his existence was one of continued suffering. But this suffering demanded no humiliating pity; on the contrary his reserved and quiet, high-bred bearing gave it dignity and attraction. And this very suffering too, both mental and physical, threw force and color into his productions; there is in them the high ringing key-note of a "sublime despair," colored with the royal purple hue of courage.

The fond of his mystic pictures is sombre,—even black, like the touching unchanging garb of mourning forever worn by his countrymen; but on this ground work the weird melodies flash out, not in lines of gold, but of lightning and fire, as can be seen on a black sky in a midnight storm, the sharp cutting fantastical forms, traced by the electric strokes of an infinite Power!

You have noticed in my Escudier edition of Liszt's Chopin, some pencil passages at the end of several of the chapters, taken from Madame Sand's "Histoire de ma Vie." As one of them is a reply to a charge made by Liszt, and the others are valuable as the observations of a keen-sighted intimate friend of Chopin, who is herself so truly an artist in the highest sense of the word, I will re-copy them here, that you may read them in connection with this translation.

On page 188 of Mrs. Cook's translation, you will see that Liszt says Madame Sand drew "Prince Karol" in her novel, "Lucrezia Floriani", for Chopin. Here is what Mme. Sand says in reply to this charge.

I have been accused of having drawn the character of Chopin in one of my novels with great accuracy of analysis. This mistake has been caused thus: some of his traits of character have been recognized in it, and, proceeding on a system too easy to be certain, Liszt himself in a Life of Chopin, a little exuberant in style, but full however of good things and very fine passages, has been egregiously mistaken, and all in good faith too.

I sketched in Prince Karol the character of a man resolute in his nature, exclusive in his feelings, exclusive in his exactions.

Chopin was not this. Nature does not design like Art, however much of a realist it may make itself. She has caprices, inconsistencies not real, probable, but very mysterious. Art rectifies these inconsistencies only because it is too limited to represent them.

Chopin was a résumé of those magnificent inconsistencies, which God alone can create and which have their own peculiar logic. He was modest from principle and gentle from habit, but imperious by instinct and full of a genuine pride, of which he was ignorant. Hence his sufferings, which he never examined, nor fixed on a positive object.

Moreover Prince Karol was not an artist. He was a dreamer and nothing more; having no genius, he had not the rights of a genius. He was a character more true than amiable, and so little was he the portrait of a great artist, that Chopin himself, reading the MS. each day as it lay on my desk, never had the slightest thought of misunderstanding it—he too, so suspicious!

This is all I have copied from the many pages of reply Mme. Sand has written to Liszt's delicately veiled reproaches, and this is enough.—Why seek to explain this old story of two great geniuses of opposite sex meeting but to part in sorrow? As Liszt says:

Has not the force of genius its own exclusive and legitimate exactions, and does not the force of a woman consist in the abdication of all exactions? Can the royal purple and burning flames of genius ever float upon the immaculate azure of a woman's destiny?

And around Mme. Sand these "royal purple and burning flames of genius" blazed so fiercely as to burn up the poor Psyche of Love pitilessly. Therefore let us turn from these useless pages of exculpation to the valuable passages of observations on his method of composing and her curiously accurate analysis of his artist nature.

"His creation," she says, "was spontaneous—miraculous. It came to him sometimes on the piano, sudden, complete, sublime; or it sang in his head during a walk; and he hastened to hear it by throwing the idea on the instrument. But then commenced the most heart-breaking toil I have ever seen. It was a succession of efforts, irresolutions and impatient struggles to seize again certain details of the theme he had heard; that which he had conceived at once of a piece he analyzed too much when he wished to write it out, and his regret at not being able to find it clear and distinct threw him into a sort of despair. He would shut himself up in his room whole days weeping, walking, breaking his pens, repeating and changing a measure a hundred times; writing and effacing it again and again; recommencing the next day with a minute and despairing perseverance. He spent six weeks on one page in order to be able to write it as the first sketch had traced it."

How unlike is this painful labor to Goethe's "innocent, undisturbed somnambulatory producing"!

Yóu, who love so well Chopin's Preludes and play them with such shy, egotistic pleasure, will love to read her account of their creation. He went with Mme. Sand and her children to spend a winter at Majorca,* where they lodged in a deserted monastery. She says:

It was there he composed the most beautiful of those short pages he called modestly Preludes. They are master-pieces. Several present to the mind visions of dead monks and the sound of funeral chants which haunted him; others are melancholy and soothing; these came to him in hours of sunshine and health, with gay noise of childish laughter under his window, the distant sound of the guitar, the song of the birds under the wet leaves, and the sight of the little pale roses which opened under the snow.

Others again have a mournful sadness, charming your ear but breaking your heart. There is one which came to him one rainy evening, and which throws the soul into a frightful depression. Maurice and I had left him that day very well; we had gone into Palma to buy some things we needed for our encampment. The rain coming on caused the torrents to overflow; we travelled three leagues in six hours; and returned in the very height of the inundation. We arrived at midnight without shoes, deserted by our coachman, and had passed through unheard of dangers. We had made haste, thinking of the uneasiness of our invalid. This uneasiness was vivid enough but it had fixed itself into a sort of tranquil despair, and while weeping he played this admirable Prelude. On seeing us enter, he rose up, uttered a loud cry, and then said to us with a wandering look and strange voice, 'Ah I knew well you were dead!'

When he had recovered his wits, and he saw the state we were in, it made him sick to think of the dangers we had passed through, but he declared to me afterwards that while waiting for us he had seen the whole in a dream; and then no longer able to distinguish the dream from the reality, he grew calm and played the piano as if in sleep, and persuaded himself he was also dead. He saw himself plunged in a lake; heavy and frozen drops of water fell in measured beat on his breast, and when I made him hear the drops of water which were really falling in regular time on the roof, he denied having heard them. He even grew angry at my use of the phrase imitative harmony. He protested with all his strength, and he was right—against the puerility of these imitations for the ear. His genius was full of the mysterious harmonies of nature, and it translated them by sublime equivalents in his musical thoughts, not by a servile repetition of exterior sounds. His composition on this evening was indeed full of the rain drops which resounded on the sonorous tiles of the Chartreuse, but they were transformed in his imagination and in his song into tears falling from heaven on his heart.

And which Prelude was this, my friend? Mme. Sand does not tell us, but I say it was No. 15, in D flat major, with the middle movement in E sharp minor, where there are reiterated notes in the bass which used to sound to me, before I read this account by Mme. Sand, like "The old wound ever aching."

There was an artist, whose name I never knew and whose face I never saw, living in the same palazzo in Naples at the same time I lived there, a few years ago. He was a fine piano executant, and played this Prelude very, very often. The terrace on which his room opened was above mine, and on several sweet May moonlights, when he seemed to be alone as well as myself, I sat at my salon window listening to this

"Poet hidden

In the light of thought."

He would play it again and again, and the reiterated bass notes came falling down in melodic beat from his terrace above me upon my heart, as the raindrops on the tiled roof of the Spanish Chartreuse fell on Chopin's. And my heart too, like the composer's, was then filled to overflowing with many a sad prevision;

"It looked before and after,
And pined for what was not."

And after his music had ceased and midnight had spread its wide, full mantle of silence around and over the gay, noisy city, I would still sit leaning on the balustrade of my balcony and thinking of this Prelude, let its measured beats weld into my own sad imaginings, thinking they prefigured the tramping approach of some relentless, unknown destiny. And then would rise up the sad, clear note of the nightingale, which nestled in the orange grove of the palace garden beneath my balcony—it would come stealing on the night air, swelling louder and louder,

"Like a full moon raining out her beams,
And an overflowing heaven of melody."

M. F. H., of whose playing I have so often spoken to you, plays this Prelude with an expression of keen anguish, which illustrates well Mme. Sand's account.

And now one more passage from these fascinating memories of the artist, and then I will be through. Oh great Tone-poet, in all thy keen suffering, still doubly blessed, for on either side of thy heart walked one man and one woman with genius a-level with thine own; and after thy death they have each stood beside the grave of thy memory, throwing the gorgeous light of their own torches over thy fame!

The following analysis of Chopin's genius and keen cutting dissection of his high-strung nervous character you will find deeply interesting. The feelings of the woman make the outlines a little sharp, but not enough so to cause you to lose the real form. Chopin—Liszt's Chopin—while he is all the better understood, after seeing him from this standpoint, loses not one fold, nor line nor delicate tint given him by the loving hand of the brother artist. Mme. Sand continues:

The genius of Chopin was the deepest and the fullest of feeling and emotion that ever existed. He could make a single instrument speak the language of the infinite. He could put into ten lines, which a child could play, high, grand poems and dramas of unequalled strength. He never needed great material means to give the catch word to his genius. He could fill the soul with terror without saxophones and ophicleides, and with faith and enthusiasm without church organs and the human voice.

There must be a great progress in taste and a high art intelligence obtained before his works shall become universally popular. The day will come when his music shall be scored without changing anything in the piano partition, and then everybody will know that this genius, as vast, as complete, as learned as the greatest masters whom he resembled, preserved an individuality still more exquisite than that of Sebastian Bach, still more powerful than that of Beethoven, still more dramatic than that of Weber.

He is all three united, and he is still himself the while; that is to say, more delicate in taste, more austere in grandeur, more heart rending in grief.

Mozart alone is superior to him, because Mozart had more of the calmness of health, consequently more fullness of life. Chopin felt his power and his weakness. His weakness lay in the very excess of this power which he could not regulate. He could not produce like Mozart (besides Mozart alone could do it) a master-piece in one uniform tint. Chopin's music is full of shading and unexpected passages.—Sometimes, but rarely, he is bizarre, mysterious and restless. Although he had a horror of that which cannot be understood, his excessive emotions carried him off unconsciously, into regions known to himself alone.

I was a bad judge for him perhaps (for he consulted me as Moliere did his servant,) on account of knowing him so well. I could identify myself with the very fibres of his organization. During eight years, while being initiated each day into the secret of his inspiration or his musical meditation, his piano revealed to me the impulses, the difficulties, the victories or the tortures of his thought. I understood it then as he understood it, and a judge less intimate with him would have forced him to have made himself more intelligible to every one. In his youth he had sometimes laughing, free, easy thoughts. He composed some Polish songs and unpublished ballads of charming gayety and adorable sweetness. Some of his subsequent compositions are like crystal streams on which a clear sunlight is beaming. But how rare and short were these tranquil ecstasies of his contemplations!

The song of the sky-lark soaring in the heavens and the voluptuous floating of the swan on tranquil waters were as serene rays of beauty to him. But the plaintive and hungry cry of the eagle on the rocks of Majorca, the sharp whistling of the north wind and the mournful desolation of the ivy covered with snow saddened him for a long while; indeed the impression was keener than the gay, cheerful influence of the orange odors, the graceful beauty of the vine branches and the moresco melodies of the laborers.

It was thus with his character in all things.—Touched in an instant by the sweetness of affection and the smiles of good fortune, he was chilled for days, for whole weeks, by the awkwardness of an unconscious person or the little contradictions of real life. And it was a strange thing, too, that a real grief did not crush him as a slight one could; it seemed that he had not the strength to comprehend it first, or to suffer from it afterwards. The depth of his emotions thus was never in proportion to their causes. As to his deplorable health in moments of real danger, he accepted it heroically, but tormented himself miserably about insignificant changes. This however is the history and fate of all beings in whom the nervous system is developed to excess.

If you were here I should ask you to walk across the room with me and look again at the portrait of Georges Sand hanging on my library wall; for it is well to look at this "full-throated ease" of superb health and male force dwelling in woman's form, that could take the delicate, sensitive soul-flower of the tone-poet and so coolly dissect it petal by petal to the very throbbing heart core!

This portrait is one of the three celebrated ones of this marvellous

"Large-brained woman and large-hearted man."

Not the dashing, bold, masculine Delacroix picture, which represented the creator of Leila: nor the beautiful Spanish one of Charpentier, giving her in her second phase of La Petite Fadette and André; but the one sketched by her friend Calamatta, his own conception of the self-poised woman who had swept grandly over the rough, perilous breakers of youth's hot passions and anchored safely out in the deep waters of mid life; the writer of Spiridion, and Les Sept Cordes de la Lyre.

In this portrait, Jules Janin says, the woman, the poet, and the enchantress are united. The head is full front, a loose rolling collar is buttoned at the throat, there are no accessories, no ornaments, nothing to interfere with the superb lines of that fine head and well marked features. Everything in the face and full throat tells of a complete, self-sufficing nature of—as she says of Mozart—"the calmness of health and consequent fullness of life."

There we have looked at Mme. Sand; now we will leave her and this sorrowful heart history of Chopin, where she has placed it, "aux mains de la Providence et de l'avenir—jusque la mort de- chire les voiles pourt out." We will however be merciful and believe all things just to both.

The harp is hushed, the minstrel gone, but we have before us his undying works and his memory is embalmed in this precious amber of Liszt's friendship.

I will keep you no longer from your charming book, which I hope you will receive with this.—Enjoy its delicate, refined exterior, the rich hue of the leaf edges and the delicate tinting of the pages; the nice, clear type, the cold but sorrowful, sick face of the music poet gazing with proud level eyelids at you as you open the book; and then, taking your coziest corner, forget Senate, debate and every Washington temptation, both social, military and political, to read this through at once from beginning to end: from the beautiful dedication of the Translator to her gifted son-in-law, the artist Pychowski, on and on to the very last words of this "growing pyramid of homage."

English Singers. No. II.

MR. INCLEDON.

Charles Incledon was brought up in the choir of Exeter Cathedral, under the celebrated English composer, Wm. Jackson: for some indiscretions, it seems that Incledon was expelled the choir before his voice broke; he subsequently went to sea, and while there this magnificent organ displayed itself, to the astonishment of every man who heard it. A powerful, sweet, and flexible tenor, of compass up to B flat (with the use of a brilliant falsetto still higher,) and down to G; rich and slightly metallic in its tone, it was beautifully adapted to the class of songs by Dibdin, Shield, Davy, and other writers of their school, which Incledon made his own. Supplied by nature with strong feelings, which had never been either warped by a mis-directed education, or refined and chastened by intercourse with the best society, Incledon stood alone as the singer for the people.—"The Lads of the Village," "Poor Tom Bowling," "The Thorn," were in their several styles rendered impressive and just favorites. His performance of Macheath has been mentioned as reaching a perfection, both in acting and singing, that was owing to the fortunate circumstance of his appearance and habits of life corresponding so nearly with that of the character he represented. But perhaps the greatest thing he ever did was his singing the Storm ("Cease rude Boreas,") on the stage with merely a back scene, representing a vessel in distress, no accompaniment whatever. It is impossible to describe the effect of this man's singing, at the words, "She rights, she rights, boys, we're off shore." You had the vessel before you, the howling of the dreadful tempest, the sails flapping, the boatswain bawling, while every instant she is expected to go down, when the intense agony of joy excited by the pause and start, with the full power and passion of that wonderful voice was let loose upon the ear, producing an effect that can never be forgotten by many yet living who remember him. With all the pains that his friend Shield so constantly took to modify the singing of this child of nature, he never did succeed in rendering him a decent musician; nature in him was all, art nothing. He had no notion of moderation in anything; liberal and inconsiderate, of habits usually termed gay or convivial, and not remarkable for anything approaching to refinement in his language, it will readily be conceived how unlikely such a man was to sober down into the calm, sedate, or enthusiastic musician, who must know something of all styles; and as the Chinese philosopher, Chang, describes two of the necessary qualifications of a student—1st. "To conquer his passions, and render himself their master. 2d. To have a sweet, tractable, and complying temper." In neither of which acts of forbearance could the subject of this memoir be said to excel.

Incledon was the idol of the public for nearly twenty-five years. He visited almost every part of England, as "The Wandering Melodist," and realized a very large sum by these summer excursions. Latterly Sinclair was his companion, and contributed materially to enhance the profits of these trips. Of a generous and unenvious disposition, there was no English professor among his contemporaries of whom Incledon was ever heard to speak slightly, but Braham. The latter was at the zenith of his fame, a just and prodigious favorite, with a voice equal to his own in power and sweetness, artistically refined and instructed by a first-rate Italian master (Kauzini) and exciting public attention in the double capacity of singer and composer; we cannot wonder that Incledon's equanimity was occasionally disturbed at the success of the "little Jew," as he always called Braham. On one occasion a trial of strength took place between these two great English vocalists. When "The English Fleet" was brought out, the duet "All's well!" was the grand attraction, and at the rehearsal the effect of Braham's singing was such as completely to terrify Incledon's friends, who began to tremble for his reputation when the performance should take place; however, Charles Incledon roused himself, did study the points to be made in this duet; and a friend who was present tells us there was no comparison between the singing of the two, and especially at the cadence terminating the second verse, when Incledon, who took the second part, made a splendid division, ending with the low bass G (first line,) which completely settled the question of superiority in Charles's favor. It was of course vehemently encored, and they continued to sing it for many nights. And here we can but remark, that such is the march of vocal music, or the accomplishments, that the generality of singers are now expected to possess, that this very duet, esteemed such a trial of these two artists' powers, at this present writing* could hardly find two tenor singers who would condescend to sing it. What the next generation of singers will have to cope with, it baffles our mental perceptions to conceive. Already the works of Mozart, Spohr, Beethoven, Bellini, Rossini, cum multis aliis, of the foreign school, besides the whole immense range of the English style, including Handel, Purcell, Barnett, Balfe, Benedict, and many other talented living writers, it is expected shall be as familiar in their mouths as household words; while the systems of instruction, amid this confusion of style, have become much deteriorated, and assume a form technically known by the appellation of parrotting: that is, instead of the singer studying the words of his song, and rendering himself up to the sentiment of his author by long familiarity with his works, (as the manner was with Incledon and others of his day,) the plan is now to get up a song in ten minutes, with the garnish of a few misbegotten cadences; inappropriate as a passage from La Sonnambula would be in Spohr's Last Judgment, without a thought of looking into the intention, the mind of the composer previous to venturing on (literally) the execution of his works. Compass of voice must be shown, says the teacher to his female pupils. Very well; then you must go up to show how well you can touch B flat, and you must go down because, "heaven save the mark," it astonishes people so to hear a "lady sing like a man; and especially as Mrs. S. does it so beautifully, and so did Malibran; therefore cultivate your contr' alto by all means," in other words make yourself ridiculous by attempting what nature, excepting in a very few instances, denies the physical power of accomplishing. We must be excused this slight digression, arising entirely from reflection upon the great change in the cultivation of the vocal art since the days of Incledon, when the purely English style was sung by thoroughly English singers, and listened to, and admired by a truly English audience; when foreign artists were sought for in their legitimate sphere, the Italian opera; when, in short, fashion had not usurped the dominion of feeling to the desecration of the really vocal style, and the annoyance of hundreds who even now, if they dared speak, would prefer a good simple ballad, well sung, to all the roulades, caperings, and false ecstasies of the ultra modern Italian school.

As all the pseudo-critics look so very sharply after the faulty pronunciation of singers, it is necessary, in this instance, to deprive them of their lawful prey, by at once declaring that even the great Incledon was not free from defect in this particular. In the celebrated ballad "Black-eyed Susan," he pronounced the words of the line "when black-eyed Susan came on board," so also in the line beginning "and quick as lightning," &c., he rendered, "Aand queek as lightning on the deck he staands." But it must be remembered he pretended to no refinement; he sung as feeling, not as grammar prompted him, and, however erroneous such instances were, and annoying doubtless to persons who lived only upon finding out the faults of others; still it is an undecided point, whether they did not make, as it were, part and parcel of his bold, rough, sailor-like style, and had these angles of pronunciation been rounded and pared off, the songs might have been more worthy a modern concert scheme, but for the mass of the people (then unenlightened by the "diffusion of useful knowledge," to whom Incledon addressed himself, they would by such refinement have lost nearly half their charm. It has been declared, and with some justice, that if Incledon were alive again, his singing would not please as it did in his time; true, and for this reason: we are all so dreadfully refined, so enormously over educated, so fastidious upon points of minor consequence, that we are more anxious about correcting faults than zealously striving to create beauties, more solicitous not to lose cast by admiring what is excellent, merely for its intrinsic merit, rather than eager to hail every symptom of real talent, even should it arise in our own country, from which we are impudently told nothing musical is expected.—We could go on lecturing in this way for hours, but must not exceed due bounds in our brief sketch; a very inadequate but sincere tribute to the memory of the most genuine English singer we ever had.

Incledon was thrice married to very amiable women, the last survived him; and, together with two sons, we believe, are still living (1838). The eldest son inherits much of the sweetness of voice so characteristic of his father's peculiar organ, the only other reminiscence of which we have left in the celebrated imitation song of Charles Taylor, wherein he gives a verse of "The Storm," in Incledon's style, so nearly approaching in tone and manner to the original, that it is almost painful to hear it.

Signor Petrella's "Last Days of Pompeii."

(From the Tribune.)

The death, burial, and resurrection of Pompeii is the most startling event in human history. It is out of the range of epic grandeurs and terrors; war, pestilence, and famine are all cheap common-places in comparison with the arch-horror of the fate of the ancient city, overwhelmed in the hellish vomit of Vesuvius, and its grace, pride and glory extinguished in a moment; and then exhumed after an interment of two thousand years.

The lively talent of Mr. Bulwer has taken Pompeii for the scene of a novel. If he has failed to vitalize his characters, he has made a story of a certain merit, owing to the romance of the time and place. On this tale Signor Errigo Petrella of Naples has constructed a four-act Grand Opera. The composer is a new name, but not a young man. Some sixty winters have passed over his head; why he has not been before the public sooner, does not appear.

All his musico-academic work is artistic and intellectual. He evinces a complete training in lyrical rhetoric, and in the uses of the voices and instruments. The plot he has selected to treat tends all towards tragedy—both in the classic nature of the characters and their serious looks and statements; and yet there is no tragedy—for the death of Nidia is rather a sad incident than an element of the work. It might have been put off and no harm done to the business generally. We have accordingly, much tragic music, but leading to a happy conclusion;—that is, the lovers are finally set right and, as the children say, live in peace and die in Greece. We therefore experience a certain disappointment at the denouement. It would be highly gratifying to have all the people on the stage killed.

In regard to the music, there are two main things necessary for the opera: first ideas, which are clear cut and memorable, and next the setting of the melodic diamonds. We never venture an opinion on the premise of enduring popularity as to melodies; that can only be determined by the public and by time. But as regards the function of the artist, we are prepared to state that this composer has distinguished himself by his constant and conscientious efforts to give rich colorings to his orchestral work and to the form of his pieces. We have, accordingly, the modern resources of the orchestra in great sonority and dramatic emphasis, and a regard for the business of the scene in connection with the music.

The plot of the piece can be readily understood from the following Argument, contained in the published libretto:

The plot and principal characters of this Lyric Drama have been borrowed by Peruzzini from Bulwer's well-known novel "The Last Days of Pompeii."

Arbaces, the Egyptian Mage and High Priest of Isis, aiming at Ione's love, plots to divert her from Glauco, a young and noble Athenian with whom she is in love and who entertains for her a vivid passion. Glauco, inspired by the virtuous charms of Ione, throws aside the unworthy pleasures and dissipations of which he formerly had been so fond.

The High Priest, through one of his devoted followers, the tavern-keeper Burbo, obtains a philter from a witch, and induces Nidia, a slave bought by Glauco and secretly in love with him, to administer to Ione's lover the fatal beverage. Glauco, on taking it, becomes delirious; and on meeting Ione addresses her brutally. Arbaces triumphantly makes his coveted Ione feel the unworthiness of her choice, and advises her to go to his Palace, and consult there the Oracle of the Goddess Isis about her fate and the grief of her heart.

Ione yields to Arbaces's treacherous suggestion; visits his palace, and there the High Priest unveils to her his passion, making a villainous attempt to obtain her love. She seeks refuge by the statue of the Goddess. Arbaces is about to carry on his iniquitous desires, when suddenly Glauco, who has been notified by the repentant Nidia, of the danger of his beloved, rushes into the temple, and claims Ione from the High Priest. The audacious Egyptian calls forth his priests, and accuses Glauco before them of having forcibly attempted to seize Ione. He threatens her with death, rather than consent to her becoming Glauco's. The indignant lover, seeing Ione's life in peril, precipitates himself, with the dagger in his hand, upon the traitor Arbaces. The priests shudder at the sacrilegious outburst of the jealous lover, and condemn him to be thrown to the wild beasts.

Glauco is taken to the Amphitheatre; but Nidia, who becomes frightened at the dreadful fate of her beloved Glauco, dares reveal the crimes of Arbaces, and his infamous conspiracy against Ione, to the Roman Prætors. The people of Pompeii, apprized of the fact, obtain Glauco's pardon and claim the punishment and death of the sacrilegious Mage.

At that moment, the earth, as if refusing farther to support the iniquities of the sinful Temple, thunders, quakes, and opens itself under the doomed City of Pompeii. The terrified inhabitants rush to the sea for refuge.

Glauco, already freed from his chains, leaves the Circus, meets his faithful Ione, who swears to share his fate. They both fly from the city, endeavoring to find safety in some vessel which may take them to their native Greece. Nidia refuses to follow them, and being asked the cause of her refusal confesses her love for Glauco and throws herself into the depths of the ocean.

Meanwhile Vesuvius pours forth torrents of burning lava. The entire City of Pompeii crumbles, and in the midst of that awful scene of ruin and desolation, the two lovers embarking for happier lands, the curtain falls.

The heroine, Ione, was performed by Madame Medori. She displayed all her customary energy, and moreover, more vocal flexibility than in her previous efforts. The slave Nidia was intrusted to Mlle. Sulzer, who gave much pleasure by her delineation. The high priest was acted and sung by Signor Bellini in a commanding style. The tavern-keeper, Burbo, answering to the "gentlemanlike proprietor" of modern times, brought out the wonderful vocal training of Signor Biachi. Of Signor Mazzolini, it may be truly affirmed that he never more distinguished himself than he did in his mode of rendering the part of Glauco. We may particularly instance the scene where he is supposed to be under the influence of the witch's decoction.

The music which made the most impression on the house, was the large, well emphasized finale to the third act. The duet between the high priest and the soprano, received the next best applause. The Academy audiences are not distinguished for fervor, but on Monday night, marked cordiality was bestowed at certain points of the work, and the singers were loudly called before the curtain.

THE "LAMENTATIONS"—Our friend and travelling companion "Klauser" who contributes such agreeable "Reminiscences of Life in the Old World" to the New Jerusalem Messenger, says:

Of all the music to be heard during Holy Week at Rome, the most remarkable is, I think, that of the "Lamentations" which precede the Miserere. For its peculiarity, its utter unlikeness to every thing else in the whole realm of music, its simplicity, and yet its irresistible power, I regard it as one of the greatest achievements of the church musician. It combines all the touching sadness, the supernatural character of the Miserere in a single unaccompanied voice. It is a wail rather than a chant or song, and yet such a wail as might come from the heart of a fallen angel. Nothing filled me with a deeper sadness, yea, I may name it awe, than this "Lamentation" as I heard it in the Sistine. It seemed like no human voice, but rather to come from some ancient prophet or sybil, such as is there pictured in the ceiling by Michael Angelo, and who in the world of spirits looked down and lamented the fallen, lost Jerusalem. Yea, it lamented the utter desolation, the end of that church whose crowned head and purple robed priest sat and listened as the lights were one by one extinguished. Rome itself is the fallen city; the church of Rome sings in the words of the Prophet its own sad dirge!

Music Abroad.

VIENNA.—Adelina Patti was still the chief attraction of the opera. Norina and Rosina and been added to her other triumphs. "We will not say," writes one critic, "that the success of the enchantress keeps on increasing, for that were impossible; but the enthusiasm of the public maintains itself at the same level." The emperor and empress, archdukes and archduchesses "graciously assist" at her representations, and the imperial box often gives the signal for the most sympathetic plaudits. Patti's portrait, painted by Winterhalter, is exhibited in one of the foyers of the theatre; people pay a franc to see it, and the proceeds are given to the poor. Here is management, as well as art; in the Covent Garden Nursery Rhymes there is a strain after this fashion:

There was an old manager Gye,
Who thought himself wondrous sly,
Till he met with Strakosch,
When he cried out, "By gosh!
"Here's more than a match for old Gye."

Ginglini, the tenor, who has been singing with Patti, has returned to London.

Zellner's third historical concert was one of the most interesting and most varied. The vocal specimens presented were: two chansons by Thibaut, king of Navarre (13th century), sung by Herr Walter, with harp accompaniment; a Duo, Les Roses, by Rousseau; pieces for four voices, by Pierre Meier, D. Becker, and M. Siebenhaar (all three of the 17th century), and also by Robert Schumann, sung by Miles. Kraus and Prager, and Herren Walter and Meyerhofer. The instrumental pieces were: a Sonata by P. E. Bach; several compositions arranged or the harmonium and executed by Zellner; and finally some dance airs from Ferramor, an opera by Rubinstein.—During holy week a concert was given at the Carl theatre for the purpose of decorating the tomb of Beethoven; the Heroic Symphony was performed, illustrated by tableaux vivants.—On the 24th of March there was a brilliant performance of the Huguenots at the Court theatre. Ander, as Raoul, electrified the house; and Draxler has one of his best parts in Marcel; Mmes. Liebhart and Kraus took the parts of Valentine and Isabella.

STUTTGART.—Mr. Benedict's opera, La Rose d'Erin, or "The Lily of Killarney," composed for London, has been brought out with marked success in this his native town. The critics pronounce it an important work, likely to make the tour of Germany; and one of them says:

Benedict possesses the power, which not very many composers of the present day possess, of captivating the ear by admirable harmonies and happy melodies, while his mastery of the art of instrumentation does not surprise us in a pupil of Carl Maria von Weber. Thus Die Rose von Erin is rich in melodies which strike home at the very first hearing, and, moreover, —which especially pleased us—the music is free from all straining to produce new effects, at any price, by means of original and bizarre combinations. The capability of writing such music is a gift of God, which, it must be confessed, is denied to many of those who perorate every evening, the whole year through, about musical art: who have, perhaps, fundamentally studied counterpoint, but are not able to write one singable song. These persons will no more derive gratification from Benedict's music than they can pardon our good Mozart, or Papa Haydn, for having written with such perfect simplicity, intelligibility, and clearness as they have written.

Mme. ABEL, whose artistic piano performances are well remembered by true music lovers in New York and Boston, has been residing during the past year in Stuttgart, which is her husband's native city. One of the leading German critics speaks thus in the Strass-Anzeiger of her concerts:

"In our Art-loving city there is no lack of traveling artists and piano virtuosos; and in our concert annals we can show the names of the greatest and most famous, from Thalberg, Liszt, Doehler, Dreychock, Rubinstein, Litolff, Bülow, &c., to Clara Schumann, Wilhelmina Clausa, Mme. Pleyel, Arabella Goddard, besides the brilliant Countess Karlezgy and Rosa Kasterer.

"Mme. Abel therefore need not wonder if her arrival here excited little sensation, especially since she had despised the usual means of making herself known beforehand. These she had the more reason not to neglect, because she came here from America, a land which has with us the reputation of being the place of refuge for all sorts of mediocrity in Art. Nevertheless our public awaited the result of her first concert with some eagerness, since the report had spread in certain circles that Mme. Abel was no other than the little piano virtuoso once so famous under the name of Louise Scheibel, of whom the Paris journals said so much, calling her the Milanollo of the piano. In her eighth year she had made artistic tours through Germany and France. So curiosity on the one hand, and artistic interest on the other, filled the hall full to overflowing. The programme was remarkably choice. Our first opera singers, Herr Pischek, Sontheim, Mme. Marlow, as well as the world-famous violinist, Sivioli, lent their assistance. No wonder, therefore, if at the first appearance of the fair artist a peculiar feeling took possession of the public, as if on the eve of the utterance of an oracle upon an important occasion. But how quickly the decision followed, how soon curiosity gave way to highest admiration, when Mme. Abel began to play the Andante of the great Polonaise, op. 22, by Chopin, and then executed the difficult Polonaise itself with such masterly perfection as we had never heard in the rendering of that piece before! The impression, which her brilliant, soulful and deeply poetic playing made on us, can only be compared with that which Clara Schumann left behind her here two years ago, although the two artists have never met each other in their lives.

"What a melting tenderness, what a spiritual aroma Mme. Abel knows how to spread over the compositions of Chopin! This is not mere playing, it is a reproducing of the very spirit of the composer. A spiritual affinity streams forth from every tone she strikes; in the deeply penetrating Scherzo in B flat minor it is as if she struck the chords of her own heart. No, never have we heard the works of Chopin so rendered, and we may with justice maintain, that Mme. A. is one of the few, if not the only living female artist, who has truly preserved the traditions of this genial master. But not only did she play the works of Chopin with such perfection; Sebastian Bach, too, and Handel, Mozart, Beethoven, Weber, Hummel, Field, Mendelssohn, and, among the composers of the day, A. Reichel, C. Stamaty and Gottschalk took their turn in the two following soirées and matinées. The 'Kreutzer Sonata' of Beethoven became quite a new creation under the hands of Mme. A. and Sig. Sivioli; only Clara Schumann and Joachim together could afford us a similar enjoyment. In these times of piano-playing run mad, the appearance of an artist of such all-sided culture as Mme. Abel is a lesson, which outweighs a whole course of studies; for only through such an example is a living model held up to be emulated.

"We hope that Mme. Abel will make her permanent home among us, and that in no case she will return to America, where such pearls as she scatters would only fall upon unclean and unfruitful soil."

Complimentary this! Nevertheless we understand that Mme. Abel does intend to return and settle in America, and that it is not improbable that we shall have her here in Boston. She, it seems, has a much better opinion of this country than her enthusiastic German critic.

DUSSELDORF.—The programme of the Musical Festival of the Lower Rhine, this year, which is to be held at Dusseldorf, and at which Herr Otto Goldschmidt will conduct, and his wife Mad. Jenny Goldschmidt, take the soprano part, is already fixed as follows:—First day—Overture in C major, by Beethoven; Elijah (oratorio) by Mendelssohn (with organ); Second day—Orchestral Movements (D major), by J. S. Bach; Psalm by Marcello; "St. Cecilia's Ode," by Handel (with organ); Symphony, by Schubert; third part of the Creation, by Haydn; Third day—"Künstlerconcert," including scenes from Schumann's Faust, and a selection from Die Zerstörung Jerusalems, by Ferdinand Hiller.

Paris.

From the correspondents of the London Musical World, April 9, we take the following:

The contest for the direction of the Italian Theatre proved a regular Derby race, or more properly a handicap, in which the lightest weighted horse won easily—M. Bagier carrying less than all his competitors by the amount of the "subvention." With M. Bagier were entered MM. Bosselievre, Lumley, Del Peral, Gye, Penco, Giuliani, Mico and Calzado. The winner, I understand, was closely pressed by Mr. Lumley, notwithstanding the difference in the weight, and all the rest were distanced. The consequence of the administration is that all engagements are at an end, and M. Bagier is free to make an entirely new company. There is a glorious opportunity for reformation if the new director have only shrewdness and resolution. Many fear that the want of a subvention will prove fatal to the interests of the theatre. So no doubt it would with the majority of managers; but M. Bagier is opulent, and can afford to run risks. A sacred concert (concert spirituel) was given in the Théâtre Italien on Tuesday, the 31st ult., at which were performed Rossini's "Stabat Mater," with Mesdames Frezzolini and Penco, Mlle. Trebelli, Signors Tamberlick, Gardoni, Capponi, Bartolini and Monari; a "Trio Funebre," by Mercadante, in memory of Malibran (Madame Frezzolini, Signors Gardoni and Delle-Sedie); an ecclesiastical air of the sixteenth century, composed by Stradella (Signor Delle-Sedie); and the "Ave Maria" from Verdi's I Lombardi (Madame Frezzolini).

They are busy at the Opéra with the rehearsals of the Vêpres Siciliennes, Signor Verdi superintending. The cast will comprise Mdlle. Sax, MM. Villaret, Bonnehée and Obin.

The long-promised Peines d'Amour Perdus was brought out at the Théâtre-Lyrique on Tuesday, the 31st ultimo, only to baulk expectation. I have already informed you, and you have gathered from other sources, that the libretto of Mozart's Così fan tutte was deemed by M. Carvalho unworthy the classic boards of the Théâtre-Lyrique; whereupon the manager engaged MM. Jules Barbier and Michel Carré to adapt a new book to the music, and they selected Shakespeare's Love's Labour Lost. It was a pretty notion to marry Shakespeare with Mozart, but unfortunately its successful achievement required a little knowledge both of English and music. Never did two literary moles work deeper in the dark than Messieurs Barbier and Carré. Not a vestige of the poetry and romance of the original drama remains. The book Da Ponte compiled for Mozart—one of the silliest ever written for music—is a marvel of grace and gaiety compared to the concoction of the two popular French scribes (not "Scribes"). Need I say that the concoction was a failure? The execution, however, was good—at least for the most part—the principal support being given to it by Mesdames Cabel, Faure and Girard. M. Léon Duprez, who made his début as the Prince of Navarre, proved his father's son in everything but voice.

London.

THE ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—The season opened on Tuesday with Masaniello. The cast differed from that of last year in two particulars—Signor Naudin, who made his first appearance at this theatre, representing the hero in place of Signor Mario, and M. Faure, Pietro, in place of Signor Graziani. The Masaniello of Signor Naudin is worth reconsidering. M. Faure's Pietro was excellent. The execution was as good as ever, and the audience was unusually liberal in their applause. The overture, played brilliantly and fastly, and the "Liberty" duet between Masaniello and Pietro in act the second, were encored. In the divertissement two new artistes, Mdlles. Montero and Durles, appeared with success. Masaniello was repeated on Thursday, and will be performed for the third time on Monday. We shall speak at length of the performance in our next. Tonight Mdlle. Fioretti makes her début as Elvira in I Puritani. The lady has won considerable reputation as a singer of the Persiani school, at Vienna and St. Petersburg. Signor Ronconi will make his first appearance (first time these two years) as Giorgio, and M. Faure assume the part of Riccardo (first time). Signor Caffieri, the new tenor, of whom we have heard good reports from various quarters, is announced to make his début on Monday week, as Arnold in Guillaume Tell.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.—"The best performance of Mendelssohn's St. Paul ever given in England" took place March 20th. The "principals" were Mme. Rudersdorff (soprano), Mme. Sainton-Dolby (contralto), Messrs. George Perren (tenor), and Weiss (bass). The Messiah followed during Passion week.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.—The second concert of the season presented two Symphonies: Haydn's in E flat, No. 10, and Beethoven's in C minor; the overture to Preciosa; a violin Concerto by Spohr; Mendelssohn's Wedding March; and for vocal selections, Deh vieni, by Mozart, two Lieder by Beethoven, and a scene from Le Domino Noir, all of which were sung by Miss Louisa Pyne.

MUSICAL SOCIETY OF LONDON. The programme of the second concert embraced a Symphony in G (not of the Saloman "Twelve") by Haydn, and Mendelssohn's very early Symphony, written almost in his boyhood, in C minor. This our friend of the Musical World is ecstatic about, while he finds Schumann's Manfred overture, which figured in the same concert, "sombre, monotonous, tormenting, unsatisfying," &c., &c. Friend, you do well to own that you "cannot fathom him," and we "regret to be compelled to add that we (you) regret it not." Weber's overture to Abou Hassan closed the concert. Piatti played a violoncello Concerto of his own. The most interesting vocal piece was a scena, Andromeda, by Mozart (composed in 1777 at Salzburg), sung "with splendid energy" by Mme. Rudersdorff. Mr. Weiss sang the bass aria from Mozart's Seraglio.

MME. JENNY LIND GOLDSCHMIDT announces a series of concerts at St. James Hall, beginning on the 1st of May with Handel's L'Allegro and Il Penseroso. Mr. Otto Goldschmidt, conductor.

BOSTON, MAY 2, 1863.

The Great Organ and its Builder.

The Boston Music Hall is now, and will be through the summer months, the spacious, sunny and secluded workshop of Mr. Fritz Walcker, and his two assistants, who have come over from Wurtemberg, and are engaged in putting up the Organ, which has already occupied seven years since the first inception of the plan. Packed in a multitude of most substantial boxes, some of them from thirty to forty feet in length (containing each a giant pipe), the disjecta membra of the mighty instrument lie there piled up over a large portion of the floor. At the back of the stage the foundations are nearly completed, strong enough to sustain the weight of the organ, amounting to sixty or seventy tons. Any full description is necessarily reserved until the instrument is up and ready for use. We may give some idea, however, of its size, by stating that it will be 47 feet wide, 18 feet deep, and 70 feet high (striking its roots down far below the stage and reaching up above the cornice). The two great central towers of the structure (a superb architectural design by Billings), will stand forward fifteen feet upon the stage, the wings receding. These two towers will be composed of several great 32 feet pipes of tin, making a very imposing appearance; and lesser pipes, through all their graduated series, will in like manner be displayed. The wood work of the case is of black walnut, richly carved, and bristling with artistic figures, flowers, angels, musical instruments, &c. The organ has 4 manuals, besides an extensive range of pedals; it contains 86 sounding stops or registers, all running through, making an aggregate of 6500 pipes, some thirty of which are of the largest species, or 32 feet pipes, of pure tin. The workmanship is known to be of the most thorough and beautiful description. The organ, before it left the maker's factory, was set up and submitted to a thorough trial by a commission of distinguished organists from England, Germany and France, whose very satisfactory report will doubtless in due time appear; the Directors of the Hall are not anxious to have the report appear before the flash. The cost of the organ proper is about $20,000; the case will cost some $12,000 and; transportation, insurance, cost of erection, &c., will swell the sum to a considerably higher figure.

A friend has kindly translated for us, from Schilling's Universal-Lexicon der Tonkunst, a brief notice of the builder of our Organ, which, although by no means complete, will interest our readers. It must be borne in mind that the article was written in 1838, and therefore does not include the period of Walcker's greatest works—the organ at Ulm, for instance, which has 100 speaking stops.

One of the most distinguished and skilful organ builders of the present time, is E. FRIEDRICH WALCKER. He was born in Cannstadt, near Stuttgart, and learned his art from his father, Eberhard Friedrich Walcker, who was himself a reputable organ builder. Aided by the manifold experiences of his father, he sought always to enlarge his learning and knowledge through his own studies, attempts, and personal intimacy or correspondence with the most celebrated artists and builders; and in the year 1820 he established himself as organ builder in Ludwigsburg in Wurtemberg. He began, it is true, at first, in a very modest way; simply for the want of pecuniary means. Meanwhile he found opportunity to repair and build several organs, which proved to be very successful works. Especially, the new organ in the Garrison church in Stuttgart, of 20 stops, 2 keyboards and pedals of 30 keys compass. This soon recommended him to the world, and he had the good fortune to be chosen as the builder of the great organ in the Paul's Church, at Frankfort am Main, which, by his proposition, was made to consist of 76 sounding stops, 3 keyboards, and 2 pedal organs of 27 keys. The success of this work decided that of his whole life, and gave him, almost at once, a European name. So that since then, not less than 28 new organs, without reckoning many extensive repairs of old organs, have been given to him to build. All these organs, without exception, have been found entirely satisfactory by the best judges.

Some of the instruments built by Walcker are: in Tübingen, a 16 foot toned organ, with 35 stops, and 3 keyboards; a similar one in Reutlingen, and with the exception of the case, a new and powerful instrument; the organ in the Michael's Church at Halle, having 38 sounding stops, 3 keyboards and pedal, also a 16 foot diapason in the great organ; the organ in the Hof Church at Stuttgart, of 24 stops; and he is now (1838) building two great instruments, one for the St. Peter's Church in St. Petersburg, having 65 stops, and the other for the St. Olai Church in Revel, on the North Sea, having 68 stops, with a 32 foot diapason—in the front of the case,—3 keyboards and two sets of pedals.

With such a wide and well-earned reputation, it is natural that his manufactory should have become more and more extensive. It is excellently well arranged, with every improvement, so that the largest organs can be conveniently built, set up, and tried in his workshop.

We are indebted to Walcker for many improvements in the art of organ building. He has, namely, simplified the action of the instrument, even in such a manner and so thoroughly, that, wherever friction cannot be avoided, as for instance in the rollers, he has made the steel pins work in a buckskin covering. His wind chests are not stopped up in the usual manner, but are closed as well at the bottom as at the top by indented sounding boards; the valves open sideways; and the wires move in perfect fitting brass plates—an arrangement which makes the action easy and pleasant to the player, even in the largest organs. And besides many improvements in the various kinds of pipe he has—particularly in his great organs—invented and constructed improved single stops, such as for example: the traverse flute, clarinet, hautboy, a quite soft-toned harmonica of wood, and a 32 foot bass, whose tone is clear, strong and effective to the lowest C. The intonation of all the completed organs of Walcker, is the most excellent that the writer has ever known.

Paradise and the Peri.

Mr. J. C. D. PARKER and his Club of amateurs gave their friends a rare musical treat last Saturday evening, at Chickering's, by a performance of the Cantata in which Robert Schumann has illustrated Moore's beautiful poem with some of the finest inspirations of his musical genius. The music is as finely imaginative as the poem, and in perfect keeping with it.

There could not be a better subject for a large vocal and orchestral composition, than such a poem, nor one better suited to the best vein of such a genius as Schumann's. He has sometimes failed, is sometimes forced, obscure and sickly; but here he has been throughout happy, throughout original, blessed with interesting and most apposite ideas; melody and harmony and instrumental coloring have all worked together, mutually enriched and fused together in the warm atmosphere of his imagination, rendered Oriental by his meditation of the poem. We do not say that all parts of the composition are equally inspiring, but all are good, too good to make it possible to turn away until you have heard the whole. To show how perfectly he has treated his subject, we should have to take up the poem and the music piece by piece, which is impossible here, but we may yet attempt it at some length. To no new work which we have heard here for some years, in any form, is such an exposition of its beauties so well due.

It was our good fortune once, in Berlin, to hear "Paradise and the Peri," with the orchestral accompaniments, a large chorus, and the best solo singers; and it was a memorable experience. Not the less, but all the more have we enjoyed this nearer reminder of it, although on a small scale and with only a piano accompaniment. But the piano arrangement, made we presume by Schumann himself, is excellent, and all the rare, rich harmonies, the delicate, fine figures, the descriptive bits, or rather suggestions of crystal heavenly heights, angelic harmonies, sky, waters, winds, wings, "sandal groves and bowers of spice," the battle field, the heavy, drowsy atmosphere of plague, &c., &c., were clearly, nicely hinted in Mr. Parker's tasteful playing. Mrs. HARWOOD sang the opening verse: "One morn a Peri at the gate of Eden stood," with her highly cultivated soprano, most expressively, and also a more important solo near the close. All the other narrative portions are given to the tenor voice; they are finely conceived recitatives for the most part, and Mr. LANGMAID had studied their expression well. The part of the Peri was not badly suited to the clear and soaring soprano of Miss HUNTLEY, who was at home in her music, sounding out the high C in the ecstatic final song and chorus unmistakably. And what exquisite songs the Peri has to sing! That first one especially, in which she thinks of the happiness of the spirits in Paradise; and that strangely beautiful one: "I know the wealth of every urn," &c. There are fine alto and bass solos, too, which received good treatment.

The choruses and quartets are remarkable, each entirely individual and original. First the quartet, admiring the beauty of the "sweet Indian land", where the Peri makes her first search for the gift that shall open the gate of Eden to her; then the series of choruses describing the ravages of war, the vain resistance to the tyrant, the death of the young hero, the lament, and the grand finale of this first part, in which the Peri and chorus sing of the holiness of blood shed for liberty. This is the grandest chorus in the whole work, and this whole passage is in the highest degree dramatic. Then how marvellously beautiful, both voices and accompaniment, the chorus of Genii of the Nile, near the beginning, and the song of the Peri and chorus, "Sleep on," at the end of the second part! Happiest of all perhaps, and most original, the chorus of Houris opening the third part; then the religious chorale, which hails the tear of the penitent sinner; and then the uncontainable rapture of the Peri song and chorus at the end!—These were generally sung in fine style by the assemblage of refined, fresh, young voices, and made a most agreeable impression.

Nor ought we to omit to mention the singular ingenuity, or rather genius, which Schumann has shown in all the little connecting phrases and modulations leading from one piece into another.

MUSICAL FESTIVAL AT ST. PAUL'S.—Under the direction of Dr. S. P. TUCKERMAN an interesting series of specimens of church music, partly historical, were performed on Thursday evening, April 16th, and again (with a slight change of programme) on the following Thursday, for the benefit of sick and wounded soldiers. The selections were mainly the same as those given in the same place last year by Dr. Tuckerman. First a portion of that old choral service by Tallis, with its monotonous intoning, varied only by response between choir and priest, until a blessed relief comes in the shape of the commonest chord cadence:—not without its impressiveness however. This ended with the Venite, to the 8th Gregorian Tune.

In Part II. we had, as last year, an Ambrosian chant in unison, a Plain Chant (unison) by Guido Aretinus; his Diaphonia, setting the teeth on edge by consecutive fifths and fourths; and a more palatable bit of two-part harmony by Franco (11th century).

Part III. opened with the famous Miserere by Allegri, which sounded better than last year and which certainly has a strange beauty, even thus severed from its traditional surroundings. The first choir was composed of Mrs. FOWLE, Miss GILSON, Mrs. SHATTUCK, Mr. SANGIER and Mr. RYDER; the second choir of Mrs. FISK, Mrs. CARY, Miss CARY, and Mr. POWERS:—a very rich and powerful ensemble. Mrs. Fowle sang Cherubini's Ave Maria. Then came an Anthem by Mendelssohn, consisting of a choral: "In deep distress I cry to Thee", a fine aria by Miss HOUSTON, and a quartet. Then a Lamentation and Sanctus by Palestrina, large and grand. Then, in extreme contrast with the last, the Benedictus from Weber's Mass in G, warm, romantic, sentimental, Freyshütz-like. Then a beautiful quartet for female voices by Dr. Tuckerman, which was much enjoyed. Then Gratias agimus from Haydn's 16th Mass; Bass Solo from Elijah: "Draw near, all my people", grandly sung by Mr. Powers; and the sublime Choral by Bach, in four and five parts, from the 5th Motet.

Part IV. contained the air: "Jerusalem" from St. Paul, effectively sung by Miss Houston; the Angel Trio: "Lift thine eyes"; a strangely interesting Trio for male voices from Cherubini's Requiem; Terzetto (soprano and alto): "Not unto us", by Mendelssohn; "O rest in the Lord", from Elijah, beautifully rendered by Miss Cary; Quando Corpus, which is the best thing in Rossini's Stabat Mater; Eia Mater, from the same; and finally Luther's Choral: Ein feste Burg, as harmonized by Bach:—truly a glorious and solemn close.

We congratulate Dr. Tuckerman and his singers on their great success, and wish such exhibitions could be more frequent.

ORCHESTRAL UNION.—The 16th Afternoon Concert took place in the Tremont Temple. The programme was rich enough in classical good things for an evening (Philharmonic) concert.

1. Overture to "Faust".....Lindpaintner
2. Concert Waltz—"Termin".....Strauss
[First time in Boston].
3. Symphony—No. 4. (Italian).....Mendelssohn
4. Turkish March—from "The Ruins of Athens".....Beethoven
5. Aelpler's Fenchlings Jubel.....Gungl
[First time in this country].
6. Overture to "Semiramide".....Rossini

Here was a Symphony such as the most exacting taste finds evermore refreshing; and here were two fine overtures; that to Semiramide, an enduring favorite, and that to Faust, less familiar, but full of interest; a splendid piece of instrumentation, and not a bad introduction to Goethe's drama, which it commonly preludes in the best German theatres. Then for a piquant little entremet, the "Turkish March." Matter enough, therefore, alike appetizing to the many and the few. Strauss and Gungl were cheerful accessories.

On Wednesday, April 22, the last of these pleasant entertainments took place at the Academy of Music, which was crowded from parquet to upper gallery. The pieces were the Freyshütz overture; a Fantasia for violoncello, played by WULF FRIES; the C minor Symphony of Beethoven; a Concert waltz by Strauss, called "Dividenden," which certainly ought to draw; a rather clap-trap Fantasia, describing Swiss life, with horns, cow-bells, real lightning, &c., by Reinhold; and a chorus and finale (orchestral arrangement) from Ferdinand Hiller's opera "Conradin," a musician-like and interesting piece of course. It is greatly to be regretted that, owing to the closing of the Music Hall, and the pre-occupation of the other large halls, these concerts are thus brought to an untimely end. The Orchestral Union have done much for the entertainment and musical culture of a large class of our population.

BOSTON MOZART CLUB.—The amateurs gave the fifth and last of their Social Orchestral Entertainments to a crowded hall full of guests, last Monday evening. Mr. ZERBAHN, as usual, conducted, and the general impression was that they had never played so well. The programme was as follows:

- Part I.
Grand Symphony, No. 9, D major.....Mozart Allegro assai.—Andante cantabile—Finale: Allegro.
- Part II.
1. Overture. "Jean de Paris".....Bolidieu
2. Romance, for English Horn and Flute from "L'Eclair".....Halevy
3. Minuetto from Symphony No. 3 in E♭.....Mozart
4. Funeral March, from Symphony Eroica, No. 3.....Beethoven
5. Overture. "Don Giovanni".....Mozart

We hurry to press this week on account of the National Fast. We are obliged also, by the number of older letters already in type, to omit a new letter from Philadelphia, and even to curtail our New York correspondent,—from whom, by the way, we differ with regard to Franz, feeling that his songs show genius quite as much as Schumann's.

NEW YORK, APRIL 27.—Madame MEDORI left for Europe last week, to the regret of those who admire her impassioned acting, and, in many respects, fine vocalization. The operas given by the Italian company during the past two weeks, have been Verdi's noisy "I due Foscari," and repetitions of "Tone," "Norma," "Il Ballo," and "La Favorita." MARETZEK promises Verdi's "Aroldo," and other novelties, for the short Summer season, to commence on May 4th.

ANSCHUTZ' German company has given "Fidelio" and "Don Giovanni" at the Academy, with much less effect and success than at the small theatre, where the little troupe had no disadvantageous comparisons to fear—of course leaving the character of the music they perform and their excellent orchestra out of the question. Nicolai's "Merry Wives of Windsor" will be given, for the first time here, to-night.

A concert was given at Irving Hall, on the evening of Sunday, April 19th, under Mr. ANSCHUTZ' direction, at which, besides Mozart's G Minor Symphony, arias sung by Mdme. Johannsen, Weber's music to "Preeiosa" was performed, by a good chorus and orchestra. In order to give the meaning of the detached pieces, the melo-drama was declaimed (adapted and condensed) by Mr. Rose, and Mdme. Scheller, a German actress of agreeable manner and appearance, and who sang the one song of the drama very pleasingly. Weber's music, so fresh, romantic, and full of melody, was as enjoyable in the concert room as on the stage.

The last Philharmonic concert of the season took place, under CARL BERGMANN's conductorship, on Saturday evening. The Symphony was Beethoven's No. 7. This noble creation—perhaps, after the Pastoral, the most generally popular of all the Symphonies, and which seems to have flowed from the soul of the composer in an hour of "peace and good will to all mankind," so full it is of joyous feeling and inspiration—was admirably played by the Society; indeed, we never heard them play with more finish and effectiveness. The other orchestral numbers were, Gade's "Reminiscences of Ossian," in a certain sense a faithful Scotch—or Scandinavian—picture, which, however, will not stand the test of frequent hearings; and Berlioz' overture, "Les freres jumes," noisy and unpleasant. Mr. Hoffman played Mendelssohn's second piano forte concerto with much execution; the Keller study and Chopin's polonaise, were less effective in Mr. Hoffmann's very agile hands. Mr. Schreiber played a solo, arranged from Beethoven, on that favorite, but, we think, vulgarized instrument, the cornet-a-piston, with great facility.

Messrs. MASON and THOMAS gave their last soirée on Thursday evening, April 21st; the programme (which attracted an over-crowded audience) commenced with Bach's concerto for two pianos and string quartet, in which Mr. TIMM assisted the usual executive firm. Perhaps more fire, more light and shade in the performances would have been an improvement, for Bach is the last composer to be put off with ever so fine a merely mechanical execution. The old quartet of Haydn, on the hymn "God preserve the Emperor Francis" was given, and the concert fitly concluded with Beethoven's immense quartet in C sharp minor, No. 14, one of his latest and greatest. A novelty was the singing of Mr. KREISSMANN—intelligent and agreeable, if not faultless; but it will not do to be hypercritical as to his singing, for we were only too glad to hear the songs he gave us. Why cannot such be heard oftener, at these, and similar concerts? Why do the orchestra concert directors disdain the fine voices, as such, forgetful that even in musical sound, "a thing of beauty is a joy forever," and why will not fine singers give us fine songs? Is "no compromise" the motto of these belligerent powers? The songs selected by Mr. Kreissmann, were some of Franz, and a portion of that series by Schumann "Dichterliche." This hearing of Franz and Schumann recalled a comparison we have often made. Franz is the great talent; perfected, and in a certain measure, made; Schumann is the genius; God-appointed. Even in their different treatment of Heine's lyric "Im wandschöwan Monat Mai" (Mr. Kreissmann sang each) we see this; one is a thought; the other an inspiration. Looking back to our old musical impressions we remember how Franz has touched us with quick pleasure, haunting melancholy, a sense of wonder, as at something odd and mediæval, tempered with regret for a musician that has increased in his last works; but has not Schumann thrilled us from the first, in spite of his great faults, with that astonishment, that painful joy, which is only awakened by works of the first order of genius, such as, in lyric poetry; Shelley's "Sky-lark", in painting the Cartoons of Raphael, or York Minster in architecture? (And seen by moonlight, as we first saw that Cathedral, it is a Symphony in stone). And yet, all honor to the living song writer, the sincere disciple of Bach!

BROOKLYN, N. Y., APRIL 9.—The Extra Concert of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, the programme of which you will find enclosed, took place last night and was a decided success as regards the musical part of the performance. The house was, in spite of the dreadful weather, comfortably filled, although the treasurer of the society would, perhaps, have liked to see a more numerous audience.

- Part II.
The Easter Morning—A Sacred Cantata, by Chevalier Sigismund Neukomm, for Soprano, Tenor, and Bass solo, and Chorus.

As your regular correspondent will undoubtedly furnish you his report about the musical part of the performance, I would request you to permit me to give you the following statement of facts connected with the same.

The Directors of our Philharmonic Society, it is but just to acknowledge, have long since, in true appreciation of their mission, favored the idea of taking some initiatory step toward the promotion of Vocal music in connection with their flourishing institution. Judge Greenwood, indeed, had sometime ago laid before the Board of Directors the outlines of a plan for the purpose, which met with a very favorable reception. Subsequent to that, our townsman, Prof. Edw. Wiebé, privately made a proposal to some gentlemen of the board of Directors of the Philharmonic to organize an efficient chorus from among the many professional and amateur singers of this city for the purpose of performing a Cantata or Oratorio, if the Directors of the Philharmonic Society would lend their influence and co-operation in the matter. It was proposed also as part of the plan, that the net proceeds should be devoted to creating a fund for the promotion of Choral music in connection with and under the auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society. These suggestions were accepted, and, after some sixty singers had been secured, the rehearsals began. Of these sixty singers, the majority belonged to the "Bedford Vocal Union," so that this society deserves the credit of having formed the nucleus of the whole chorus.

From the very beginning of the enterprise, the Philharmonic have shown the deepest interest in it, and this alone could secure the success so happily achieved. It was done not only creditably to the society under whose auspices it was performed, but also acceptably to the refined musical taste of our Brooklyn community.

The Cantata of the "Easter Morning" was selected for the occasion, for reasons which explain themselves. First, it was exactly fit for the occasion, the concert taking place in Easter week. Secondly, it is one of the most beautiful works in the department of sacred music and well adapted to the popular taste. The words are peculiarly tender and impressive, in some portions of the composition, whilst they rise to a high sublimity in other parts. The German poetry was written by Tiedge, an ardent worshipper of religion, not by Tieck, as erroneously stated in Novello's London edition of Neukomm's famous work. The English version which was sung last night, is a much more literal and more singable one and is prepared by Edw. Wiebé, who, assisted by his friend Wm. Cutter, has made many a fine German composition accessible to the lovers of music who speak English. A new edition of the "Easter Morning" with German and English words is now in press, in Germany, and will soon be out.

In conclusion I would mention that to Mr. Theodore Thomas, who led the performance, much credit is due for the amiable manner in which he helped Mr. Wiebé to mature a plan, which, if successfully carried through, cannot fail to prove beneficial in the development of taste for choral music in this community.

PHILADELPHIA, APRIL 12.—It was a pleasant surprise, strolling into the Musical Fund Hall last Saturday, to find our young friend, Mr. CHARLES SCHMITZ at the conductor's desk; and had it been any one else, I might have looked upon his first appearance as an orchestral leader with fear lest some untoward accident might deprive him of success. Mr. Schmitz, however, always does well what he attempts, and, knowing this, I banished all fears for his safety, found a seat in the quietest corner of the room, and lay back, considering whether Mendelssohn's overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" would have sounded equally well without the obligato accompaniments furnished by the voluble misses on either side of me.

Mr. Grau's company has, thus far, given Linda, Robert le Diable, Les Noces de Jeannette, La Sonnambula, La Juive and Dinorah.

Dinorah differs essentially from Meyerbeer's greater works: Robert, Les Huguenots, and Le Prophète, which we are accustomed to regard as types of his style. While the works named seem to possess more of the French or German character, leaning now to the one and now to the other, Dinorah suggests very little of the German, but seems a Franco-Italian mixture, in which the individuality of the author is less conspicuous than in previous works. In one thing Meyerbeer remains true to himself. He gives but few unbroken melodies, but changes key and rhythm frequently, even in solos, in order that music and words should be perfectly in keeping. There is also the same elaborate treatment in the orchestral parts.

In Meyerbeer's operas so much depends upon the perfect interweaving of musical and dramatic thought, that to hear them in an unintelligible language is to remain unconscious of many of their great beauties. In lighter operas this want is felt even more readily, because so much depends upon the action of the play, while in tragic works one may be carried along by the wilder measures and more massive harmonies, and need no explanation of what were, otherwise, mere pantomime.

There are several beautiful strains in Dinorah. I was especially pleased with the matter and the manner of MORENO's solo in the second act, and was surprised at the ease with which Mlle. CORDIER accomplished the difficult shadow aria. She deserved the applause, but the audience did not deserve a repetition of the most difficult part of her aria. The Italians, including MUZZO, performed in the left-handed way in which the Italians usually render French or German music. The goat left out considerable portions of its rôle, and was very capricious, which made me conclude it must be a tenor goat. Orchestra and chorus were poor enough. The "real water" for the inundation scene had been procured "at great expense" and was announced in large type, on flaming posters. It overdid its part and, running over the stage into the orchestra, threatened to drown out the musicians.

When I hear of Don Giovanni (it is announced for Mr. Grau's benefit, to-morrow) I am reminded of the performance of the same opera by the Anschütz Company, and shudder at the thought of it.

PITTSFIELD MASS., APRIL 8.—The winter with us has been unenlightened by musical sun or stars, and during its long months, nothing, save performers in the "minstrel" line, has risen above our horizon. But spring, with its first blue-bird and robin, has brought us also an artistic feast, in a call from the "Mendelssohn Quintette Club," as they passed on their way West. The Programme comprised the best and most pleasing selections from their rural repertoire. May we hear them often, and may our wealthy citizens bestir themselves so that, on their next visit, their music may fill a larger and more commodious Hall, worthy of such music, and of so intelligent and appreciative an audience.

On the following evening, April 7th, the "Mendelssohn Musical Institute," a sister companion of the "Club," in its aims and high standard, closed their seventh year by a musical Soirée, at which the following Programme was performed by the pupils.

Part I.

1. Jubel Overture.....Weber
Misses Anna W. Shaw and Mary W. Bassett.
2. Aria—"Don Giovanni".....Mozart
Miss Lillian H. Bly.
3. Grand Sonata in D.....Schubert
Miss Mary Chapman.
4. Song for three voices.....Richard Hol
Misses Bly, Bailey and Gardner.
5. Lied ohne Worte.....Mendelssohn
A. F. Bohlmann.
6. Cavatina from "Noli Me Tangere".....Mercadante
Miss C. E. Gardner.
7. Grand Sonata in F.....Haydn
Miss L. E. Bly.

Part II.

8. Grand Symphony No. 5, in C minor.....Beethoven
Misses Chapman and Bly.

The pieces are some of them too well known to your readers, to need comment. The Sonata by Schubert is a wonderful example of his fruitful and peculiar genius, sparkling with originality and beauty. The Haydn Sonata was also exceedingly brilliant. The Lied ohne Worte by Mendelssohn was a favorite one, and well performed by a young German, who, as I learn, in the space of a year and a half has made wonderful progress in theoretical study, and has also acquired a good degree of skill in execution. During the first year of his study, being a weaver by trade, and obliged to labor, he occupied his mind with his lessons while at the loom, committing to memory the chords, which were thus thought out, and practising them diligently after release from mechanical toil from eight o'clock to ten in the evening, which was his only opportunity for practice. During the last few months he has forsaken the loom for the Organ and Piano Forte, and with determined energy and perseverance is pursuing the studies for which his quickness of thought, application and talents, are adapted.

Did time and your space permit, we could speak at length in praise of the performance of the well known and ever wonderful C minor Symphony, and of the vocal part of the programme. "Dove sono" from "Don Giovanni" was sung in a manner that would do honor to a professional vocalist.

The performances of all the pupils at this concert were highly creditable to their instructors, who must be encouraged by their improvement and skill to pursue the same undeviating course in presenting to them for study such noble works, and in endeavoring to create a love for them. We are not sufficiently acquainted with Mr. Oliver's method of teaching to know how it differs from others, but we see from its results that his pupils, even after the study of but one year, share his disrepute for musical trash and become imbued with a deep love and respect for the great masters and for all that is high in musical art. We wish that more of our teachers were moved to labor earnestly for the cultivation of good taste, and we should soon see the result in a general appreciation of classical concerts, and our artists would not so often be obliged to present a sugared pill by offering to the public "light, popular music," Waltzes and "Opera re-hash," as an inducement to listen to a Symphony or Quartet.

Persistent and earnest effort in the right way will accomplish wonders, and a teacher's influence is enduring, for right or wrong. Let each and every one see to it that his effort and influence is for improvement and elevation in music, as well as in mind and morals. Man in his natural state is degraded and unintellectual. The natural and uncultivated "taste for music" is also low and unrefined, only requiring in its primitive development the measured beat of the dance in its various forms, to give pleasure and delight. A slight degree of cultivation introduces melody and song, mingled with the love of rhythmic measure; but it is only after study and devotion to the Art that mingled harmony and melody overcome and banish from thought the still ever ruling and prevailing rhythm, and give that excellent joy and delight which is a foretaste of Heaven.

[DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE

LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Away Goes Coffee, or Hooray for '63. Words and Music by L. B. Starkweather. 25

A first-rate negro song, which is saying a great deal, for very few indeed can "catch Coffee as he flies," and impress the true image of his humor on paper. The song tells us how "Abram Lincoln" warned the South, that if they did not give up at a certain date, then, "Away goes Coffee!" Music very good.

The Sleep of Sorrow. Song. W. V. Wallace. 25

A song in Wallace's best style, simple and elegant, and showing the master in the easy and powerful handling of his subject.

The Name of Him I Love. René Favarger. 25

A delicate, and yet brilliant song, of which the words are by Geo. Linley. Not difficult.

Morning and Evening. Sacred Song. W. Castle. 25

A very pretty sacred song.

Hour of Parting. Duet for Guitar. Curtis. 25

Adds a favorite opera duet to the limited list of such pieces for the guitar.

Instrumental Music.

Princess of Wales Quadrille. Leoni. 35

An unusually pretty set of pieces, with the very spirit of the dances in them. They are not hard, and will afford satisfaction both to students and amateur players.

L' 'Avalanche. Galop. Leon Leoni. 35

Embellished with a pretty title page, in which the name, L' 'Avalanche, appears to be sliding off a most romantic assemblage of Alpine peaks. Emblematic, no doubt, of the concourse of sweet chords within, bright, sparkling, and gilding as easily as snow on the mountains. Not difficult.

Village Bells. Polka. Cha's Coots, Jr. 35

An excellent piece, full of recollections of sweet bell chimes of old England, as they ring on wedding or Christmas mornings. Quite fluent, and easily adapted to the fingers.

Cricket Polka. Wm. Withers, Jr. 25

A bright, chirping little thing, introducing the notes of the Cricket at intervals. Likely to be a favorite.

Farewell Lachl. By Winterle, arr. for piano by F. Ritz. 35

Musicians should not forget this truly valuable and standard work, by a man who seems to have been born to be a prominent American musical historian and antiquary. All of the brotherhood who do anything worthy of note, are sure of a short immortality, at least, for Mr. Moore keeps their names and deeds filed away in his desk, at Bellows Falls.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being about one cent on each piece. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. ## Open Table.

(From GOMMA.)

Many guests I hope to-day
For a dinner dainty;
Fish and fowl are ready all,
Wines and venison plenty.
All are bidden—all accept:
Eagerly I wait them.
John, run out and look about;
See if you can meet them.

Charming children I shall have,
Sweet and simple misses,
Such as truly nothing know,
Not so much as kisses;
And they've promised all to come:
Eagerly I wait them.
John, run out and look about;
See if you can meet them.

Ladies, too, I hope to see,
Patterns of devotion,— Constant to their fretful lords
In each look and motion.
They have been invited all:
Eagerly I wait them.
John, run out and look about;
See if you can meet them,

Noble youths, too, never vain,
Though they might be proudest,
Such as wear their purses full,
Yet are always modest—
Pressing notes to these I sent:
Eagerly I wait them.
John, run out and look about;
See if you can meet them.

Men I've asked, with great respect,
Who have wives, and fear them;
Keep their eyes at home, nor look
At the fair ones near them.
They've returned my compliments:
Eagerly I wait them.
John, run out and look about;
See if you can meet them.

Poets, too, a chosen few,
Feast for fancy bringing,
Such as love another's song
More than their own singing;
And they've all agreed to come:
Eagerly I wait them.
John, run out and look about;
See if you can meet them.

But I do not see a soul
Eager this way turning!
And the soup will boil away,
And the roast meat's burning.
Ah! I fear me, we have been Too select and dainty.
John! what—will there no one come?
None of all the twenty?

John, run out, and tarry not;
Call me in some new ones,
Every guest as suits him best;
Then they'll all be true ones.
Through the town the news has flown;
Everybody's willing.
John, throw open wide the doors:
Look now, how we're filling!

Translated for this Journal.

Hector Berlioz.

From Fliegende Blätter für Musik.

"Tous les genres sont bons hors l'ennuyeux."—Voltaire.
"Berlioz is sufficiently well known in Germany by his writings, and no one will refuse respect to his great and truly artistic efforts; delight is ever produced by his compositions, although they are very diverse in style and method."—Ferdinand Hiller.

In the south of France at the Côte Saint André, a little city of the Isère department, on the 11th December, 1808, Hector Berlioz was born. His father, a distinguished physician, took much pains in the youths' education, and at its completion allowed him to take lessons in music.—Therein he made great progress, but he took a great aversion to the study of medicine, for which his father designed him. Berlioz however yielded after a few struggles and, for two years, reluctantly followed his studies under his father's direction.

But what so many others in similar situations have done, that did the young Berlioz. He provided himself secretly with works on music, and studied during the night. He was soon seized with an insatiable desire to compose, but his first attempts naturally had a very singular appearance. He now became acquainted with a Quartet of Haydn; the impression this made upon him was decisive; he studied it with ardor, and learned from it far more than books were capable of telling him. A quintet which he now composed had already a different aspect from his first attempts, and as it turned out, it enhanced his pleasure and his determination, but at the same time almost alarmed his father, who sent him to Paris to finish his medical studies.—Still, however, Berlioz pursued his music zealously, and, after a year of inward struggle, he made known to his family his firm resolution to dismiss the study of medicine forever, and devote himself wholly to a musical career. In consequence his father cast him off, but Berlioz was now free, and could patiently labor for his art.

The next thing he discovered was, that a young man wholly unknown was deprived of all means of support in Paris; but he had received from Nature a character which taught him to despise fatigue, a strong force of will, and in order to support himself, the student of medicine became a chorus singer in the "Theatre des Nouveautés."

After three months he sang every evening in Vaudevilles, until he obtained a few pupils in singing. The pecuniary compensation sufficing for his small wants, he abandoned the stage, retired into solitude and composed an opera, "Les Francs Juges"—of which only the overture became known. After this his appeased father again contributed to his support, and he was now in a position to finish his studies at the Conservatoire, under Reicha and Lefevre.

While a pupil here, Berlioz gained the prize for the composition of a Cantata "Sardanapalus," and was sent for his further improvement for a few years to Italy. He there fell in love with a young English actress, and he sought to depict his passion in his first Symphony, an "Episode in the life of an Artist." When he returned after several years of absence, his steady perseverance succeeded in prevailing on the shy beauty to become his wife.

In 1832 his Symphony was produced at the Conservatoire. After the close of the concert a man pressed through the crowd which surrounded Berlioz, embraced him with glistening eyes, crying out: "You begin where all the others have left off." That man was Paganini.

A multitude of compositions by degrees flowed from Berlioz's pen—The "Harold Symphony"—"Romeo and Juliet"—a "Funeral Symphony" for the fallen heroes of July—"Faust's descent into Hell"—the overtures to "Waverley," "King Lear," "Rob Roy," "Carnaval of Venice";—a Mass;—a Requiem;—the opera "Benvenuto Cellini." He also instrumented Weber's Invitation à la Valse; arranged Der Freischütz, with the recitatives, and edited many smaller compositions for singing, part of them with piano, others with orchestral accompaniment.

In Weimar at this time the music director Götze conducted the overture to "Les Francs Juges," and the effect upon the orchestra and audience was electric.

Afterwards Berlioz made, at various times, journeys through Germany, England, and Russia, giving concerts in the principal cities, in which he conducted his own compositions. Many marks of honor, orders, and musical memberships were showered upon him, and success was not wanting wherever his works appeared.

The Polonaise.

(From Liszt's Life of Chopin, translated by MARTHA WALKER COOK.)

... His (Chopin's) Polonaises, which are less studied than they merit, on account of the difficulties presented by their perfect execution, are to be classed among his highest inspirations. They never remind us of the mincing and affected "Polonaises à la Pompadour," which our orchestras have introduced into ball-rooms, our virtuosi in concerts, or of those to be found in our "Parlor Repertories," filled, as they invariably are, with hacknied collections of music, marked by insipidity and mannerism.

His Polonaises, characterized by an energetic rhythm, galvanize and electrify the torpor of indifference. The most noble traditional feelings of ancient Poland are embodied in them. The firm resolve and calm gravity of its men of other days breathe through these compositions. Generally of a martial character, courage and daring are rendered with that simplicity of expression, said to be a distinctive trait of this warlike people. They bring vividly before the imagination, the ancient Poles, as we find them described in their chronicles; gifted with powerful organizations, subtle intellects, indomitable courage and earnest piety, mingled with high-born courtesy and a gallantry which never deserted them, whether on the eve of battle, during its exciting course, in the triumph of victory, or amidst the gloom of defeat.

Their chivalric heroism was sanctioned by their grave and haughty dignity; an intelligent and premeditated conviction added the force of reason to the energy of impulsive virtue; thus they have succeeded in winning the admiration of all ages, of all minds, even that of their most determined adversaries. They were characterized by qualities rarely found together, the description of which would appear almost paradoxical: reckless wisdom, daring prudence, and fanatic fatalism. . .

While listening to some of the Polonaises of Chopin, we can almost catch the firm, nay, the more than firm, the heavy, resolute tread of men bravely facing all the bitter injustice which the most cruel and relentless destiny can offer, with the manly pride of unblenching courage. The progress of the music suggests to our imagination such magnificent groups as were designed by Paul Veronese, robed in the rich costume of days long past; we see passing at intervals before us, brocades of gold, velvets, damasked satins, silvery soft and flexible sables, hanging sleeves gracefully thrown back upon the shoulders, embossed sabres, boots yellow as gold or red with trampled blood, sashes with long and undulating fringes, close chemisettes, rustling trains, stomachers embroidered with pearls, head dresses glittering with rubies or leafy with emeralds, light slippers rich with amber, gloves perfumed with the luxurious attar from the harems. From the faded background of times long passed these vivid groups start forth; gorgeous carpets from Persia lie at their feet, filigreed furniture from Constantinople stands around; all is marked by the sumptuous prodigality of the Magnates who drew, in ruby goblets embossed with medallions, wine from the fountains of Tokay, and showed their fleet Arabian steeds with silver, who surmounted all their escutcheons with the same crown which the fate of an election might render a royal one, and which, causing them to despise all other titles, was alone worn as insignium of their glorious equality.

Those who have seen the Polonaise dance even as late as the beginning of the present century, declare that its style has changed so much, that it is now almost impossible to divine its primitive character. As very few national dances have succeeded in preserving their racy originality, we may imagine, when we take into consideration the changes which have occurred, to what a degree this has degenerated. The Polonaise is without rapid movements, without any true steps in the artistic sense of the world, intended rather for display than for the exhibition of seductive grace; so we may readily conceive it must lose all its haughty importance, its pompous self-sufficiency, when the dancers are deprived of the accessories necessary to enable them to animate its simple form by dignified, yet vivid gestures, by appropriate and expressive pantomime, and when the costume peculiarly fitted for it is no longer worn. It has indeed become decidedly monotonous, a mere circulating promenade, exciting but little interest. Unless we could see it danced by some of the old regime who still wear the ancient costume, or listen to their animated descriptions of it, we can form no conception of the numerous incidents, the scenic pantomime, which once rendered it so effective. By a rare exception this dance was designed to exhibit the men, to display manly beauty, to set off noble and dignified deportment, martial yet courtly bearing. "Martial yet courtly" do not these two epithets almost define the Polish character? In the original the very name of the dance is masculine; it is only in consequence of a misconception that it has been translated in other tongues into the feminine gender.

Those who have never seen the Kontusz worn, (it is a kind of Occidental kaftan, as is the robe of the Orientals, modified to suit the customs of an active life, unfettered by the stagnant resignation taught by fatalism,) a sort of Feredgi, often trimmed with fur, forcing the wearer to make frequent movements susceptible of grace and coquetry, by which the flowing sleeves are thrown backward, can scarcely imagine the bearing, the blow bending, the quick rising, the fineness of the delicate pantomime displayed by the Ancients, as they defied in a Polonaise, as though in a military parade, not suffering their fingers to remain idle, but sometimes occupying them in playing with the long moustache, sometimes with the handle of the sword. Both moustache and sword were essential parts of the costume, and were indeed objects of vanity with all ages. Diamonds and sapphires frequently sparkled upon the arms, worn suspended from belts of cashmere, or from sashes of silk embroidered with gold, displaying to advantage forms always slightly corpulent; the moustache often veiled, without quite hiding, some scar, far more effective than the most brilliant array of jewels. The dress of the men rivaled that of the women in the luxury of the material worn, in the value of the precious stones, and in the variety of vivid colors. This love of adornment is also found among the Hungarians, as may be seen in their buttons made of jewels, the ring forming a necessary part of their dress, the wrought clasps for the neck, the aigrettes and plumes adorning the cap made of velvet of some brilliant hue. To know how to take off, to put on, to manœuvre the cap with all possible grace, constituted almost an art. During the progress of a Polonaise, this became an object of especial remark, because the cavalier of the leading pair, as commandant of the file, gave the mute word of command, which was immediately obeyed and imitated by the rest of the train.

The master of the house, in which the ball was given, always opened it himself by leading off in this dance. His partner was selected neither for her beauty, nor youth; the most highly honored lady present was always chosen. This phalanx, by whose evolutions every fête was commenced, was not formed only of the young; it was composed of the most distinguished, as well as of the most beautiful. A grand review, a dazzling exhibition of all the distinction present, was offered as the highest pleasure of the festival. After the host, came next in order the guests of the greatest consideration, who, choosing their partners, some from friendship, some from policy or from desire of advancement, some from love,—followed closely his steps. His task was a far more complicated one than it is at present. He was expected to conduct the files under his guidance through a thousand capricious meanderings through long suites of apartments lined by guests, who were to take a later part in this brilliant cortege. They liked to be conducted through distant galleries, through the parterres of illuminated gardens, through the groves of shrubbery, where distant echoes of the music alone reached the ear, which, as if in revenge, greeted them with redoubled sound and blowing of trumpets upon their return to the principal saloon. As the spectators, ranged like rows of hedges along the route, were continually changing, and never ceased for a moment to observe all their movements, the dancers never forgot that dignity of bearing and address which won for them the admiration of women, and excited the jealousy of men. Vain and joyous, the host would have deemed himself wanting in courtesy to his guests, had he not evinced to them, which he did sometimes with a piquant naivete, the pride he felt in seeing himself surrounded by persons so illustrious, and partisans so noble, all striving through the splendor of the attire chosen to visit him, to show their high sense of the honor in which they held him.

Guided by him in their first circuit, they were led through long windings, where unexpected turns, views, and openings had been arranged beforehand to cause surprise; where architectural deceptions, decorations and shifting scenes had been studiously adapted to increase the pleasure of the festival. If any monument or inscription, fitted for the occasion, lay upon the long line of route, from which some complimentary homage might be drawn to the "most valiant or the most beautiful," the honors were gracefully done by the host. The more unexpected the surprises arranged for these excursions, the more imagination evinced in their invention, the louder were the applauses from the younger part of the society, the more ardent the exclamations of delight; and silvery sounds of merry laughter greeted pleasantly the ears of the conductor-in-chief, who, having thus succeeded in achieving his reputation, became a privileged Coryphæus, a leader par excellence. If he had already attained a certain age, he was greeted on his return from such circuits by frequent deputations of young ladies, who came, in the name of all present, to thank and congratulate him. Through their vivid descriptions, these pretty wanderers excited the curiosity of the guests, and increased the eagerness for the formation of the succeeding Polonaises among those who, though they did not make part of the procession, still watched its passage in motionless attention, as if gazing upon the flashing line of light of some brilliant meteor.

In this land of aristocratic democracy, the numerous dependents of the great seigniorial houses, (too poor, indeed, to take part in the fête, yet only excluded from it by their own volition, all however noble, some even more noble than their lords,) being all present, it was considered highly desirable to dazzle them; and this flowing chain of rainbow-hued and gorgeous light, like an immense serpent with its glittering rings, sometimes wreathed its linked folds, sometimes uncoiled its entire length, to display its brilliancy through the whole line of its undulating animated surface, in the most vivid scintillations; accompanying the shifting hues with the silvery sound of chains of gold, ringing like muffled bells, with the rustling of the heavy sweep of gorgeous damasks and with the dragging of jewelled swords upon the floor. The murmuring sound of many voices announced the approach of this animated, varied, and glittering life-stream.

But the genius of hospitality, never deficient in high-born courtesy, and which, even while preserving the touching simplicity of primitive manners, inspired in Poland all the refinements of the most advanced state of civilization,—how could it be exiled from the details of a dance so eminently Polish? After the host had, by inaugurating the fête, rendered due homage to all who were present, any one of his guests had the right to claim his place with the lady whom he had honored by his choice. The new claimant, clapping his hands, to arrest for a moment the ever moving cortege, bowed before the partner of the host, begging her graciously to accept the change; while the host, from whom she had been taken, made the same appeal to the lady next in course. This example was followed by the whole train. Constantly changing partners, whenever a new cavalier claimed the honor of leading the one first chosen by the host, the ladies remained in the same succession during the whole course; while, on the contrary, as the gentlemen continually replaced each other, he who had commenced the dance, would, in its progress, become the last, if not indeed entirely excluded before its close.

Each cavalier, who placed himself in turn at the head of the column, tried to surpass his predecessors in the novelty of the combinations of his opening, in the complications of the windings through which he led the expectant cortege; and this course, even when restricted to a single saloon, might be made remarkable by the designing of graceful arabesques, or the involved tracing of enigmatical ciphers. He made good his claim to the place he had solicited, and displayed his skill, by inventing close, complicated and inextricable figures; by describing them with so much certainty and accuracy, that the living ribbon, turned and twisted as it might be, was never broken in the loosing of its wreathed knots; and by so leading, that no confusion or graceless jostling should result from the complicated torsion. The succeeding couples, who had only to follow the figures already given, and thus continue the impulsion, were not permitted to drag themselves lazily and listlessly along the parquet. The step was rhythmic, cadenced, and undulating; the whole form swayed by graceful wavings and harmonious balancings. They were careful never to advance with too much haste, nor to replace each other as if driven on by some urgent necessity. On they glided, like swans descending a tranquil stream, their flexible forms swayed by the ebb and swell of unseen and gentle waves. Sometimes, the gentleman offered the right, sometimes, the left hand to his partner; touching only the points of her fingers, or clasping the slight hand within his own, he passed now to her right, now to her left, without yielding the snowy treasure. These complicated movements, being instantaneously imitated by every pair, ran, like an electric shiver, through the whole length of this gigantic serpent.

Although apparently occupied and absorbed by these multiplied manœuvres, the cavalier yet found time to bend to his lady and whisper sweet flatteries in her ear, if she were young; if young no longer, to repose confidence, to urge requests, or to repeat to her the news of the hour. Then, haughtily raising himself, he would make the metal of his arms ring, caress his thick moustache, giving to all his features an expression so vivid, that the lady was forced to respond by the animation of her countenance.

Thus, it was no hacknied and senseless promenade which they executed; it was, rather, a parade in which the whole splendor of the society was exhibited, gratified with its own admiration, conscious of its elegance, brilliancy, nobility and courtesy. It was a constant display of its lustre, its glory, its renown. Men grown gray in camps, or in the strife of courtly eloquence; generals more often seen in the cuirass than in the robes of peace; prelates and persons high in the Church; dignitaries of State; aged senators; warlike palatins; ambitious castellans:—were the partners who were expected, welcomed, disputed and sought for, by the youngest, gayest, and most brilliant women present. Honor and glory rendered ages equal, and caused years to be forgotten in this dance; nay, more, they gave an advantage even over love. It was while listening to the animated descriptions of the almost forgotten evolutions and dignified capabilities of this truly national dance, from the lips of those who would never abandon the ancient Zupan and Kontusz, and who still wore their hair closely cut round their temples, as it had been worn by their ancestors, that we first fully understood in what a high degree this haughty nation possessed the innate instinct of its own exhibition, and how entirely it had succeeded, through its natural grace and genius, in poetizing its love of ostentation by draping it in the charms of noble emotions, and wrapping round it the glittering robes of martial glory.

When we visited the country of Chopin, whose memory always accompanied us like a faithful guide who constantly keeps our interest excited, we were fortunate enough to meet with some of the peculiar characters, daily growing more rare, because European civilization, even where it does not modify the basis of character, effaces asperities, and moulds exterior forms. We there encountered some of those men gifted with superior intellect, cultivated and strongly developed by a life of incessant action, yet whose horizon does not extend beyond the limits of their own country, their own society, their own traditions.—During our intercourse, facilitated by an interpreter, with these men of past days, we were able to study them and to understand the secret of their greatness. It was really curious to observe the inimitable originality caused by the utter exclusiveness of the view taken by them. This limited cultivation, while it greatly diminishes the value of their ideas upon many subjects, at the same time gifts the mind with a peculiar force, almost resembling the keen scent and the acute perceptions of the savage, for all the things near and dear to it. Only from a mind of this peculiar training, marked by a concentrative energy that nothing can distract from its course, every thing beyond the circle of its own nationality remaining alien to it, can we hope to obtain an exact picture of the past; for it alone, like a faithful mirror, reflects it in its primal coloring, preserves its proper lights and shades, and gives it with its varied and picturesque accompaniments. From such minds alone can we obtain, with the ritual of customs which are rapidly becoming extinct, the spirit from which they emanated.—Chopin was born too late, and left the domestic hearth too early, to be himself in possession of this spirit; but he had known many examples of it, and, through the memories which surrounded his childhood, even more fully than through the literature and history of his country, he found by induction the secrets of its ancient prestige, which he evoked from the dim and dark land of forgetfulness, and, through the magic of his poetic art, endowed with immortal youth. Poets are better comprehended and appreciated by those who have made themselves familiar with the countries which inspired their songs. Pindar is more fully understood by those who have seen the Parthenon bathed in the radiance of its limpid atmosphere; Ossian, by those familiar with the mountains of Scotland, with their heavy veils and long wreaths of mist. The feelings which inspired the creations of Chopin can only be fully appreciated by those who have visited his country. They must have seen the giant shadows of past centuries gradually increasing, and veiling the ground as the gloomy night of despair rolled on; they must have felt the electric and mystic influence of that strange "phantom of glory" forever haunting martyred Poland. Even in the gayest hours of festival, it appalls and saddens all hearts. Whenever a tale of past renown, a commemoration of slaughtered heroes is given, an allusion to national prowess is made, its resurrection from the grave is instantaneous; it takes its place in the banquet-hall, spreading an electric terror mingled with intense admiration; a shudder, wild and mystic as that which seizes upon the peasants of Ukraine, when the "Beautiful Virgin," white as Death, with her girdle of crimson, is suddenly seen gliding through their tranquil village, while her shadowy hand marks with blood the door of each cottage doomed to destruction.

An Operatic Eclogue.

(From Punch).

Damotas, Mr. Gye. Menalcas, Mr. Mapleson. Palamon, Mr. Punch.

Punch. Sing, Gye, and thou, O Mapleson, rehearse

Thy singers' fame in smooth Virgilian verse;
While I at ease enjoy my morning smoke,
And weigh the merits of each vocal bloke.

Gye. That word sounds masculine, but place aux dames:

My prime donne sure must bear the palm.
Say who can match my charming Adelina,
As fair Amina, or as sweet Zerlina?
All other songsters must to her give place,
For vocal sweetness and for girlish grace.
My little Patti all the world must own
The nicest little party ever known.

Map. For me great Tietjens deigns this year to sing,

And countless myriads to my doors will bring.
Now Gries' gone, who is there that will dare
As Norma with my Tietjens to compare?
Who in Les Huguenots is half so fine
As she who comes to be my Valentine?

Gye. Tietjens to thee reluctantly I yield,
But there are other charmers in the field.
Say, hast thou e'er my sweet Carvalho heard,
My Fricci too, who warbles like a bird?
Then for contralto parts who is there, pray,
That can compete with deep-toned Didiee.

Map. Vain boaster, cease! I'll bet an even pony,
She ne'er will hold a candle to Alboni.

Alboni's voice must drive all rivals crazy.—

Gye. Yes, but you must allow she's sadly lazy.

Map. Then whom with my Trebelli can you match?

And my Lemaire?

Gye. I'm sure she's no great catch.

Map. You're very rude; but I de Ruda boast.

Gye. I've Rudersdorff, who's ever at her post.

And if you come to debutantes, my buck,

My Pauline Lucca ought to bring me luck.

Demi, I've Demi too.

Map. My Gye, don't swear.

Gye. Demi, I don't; I'm merely naming her.

Map. Leave we the ladies now, and say, O Gye,

With my Giuglini who of yours can vie?

Which of your tenors sing so sweet, so high?

Gye. As is the rose than buttercups more sweet,

So doth my Mario your Giuglini beat;

As doth the lark outsoar the humble bee,

So lifts my Tamberlik his high chest C.

He, when he tries a high-pitched note to sing,
Fills the pleased house and makes the rafters ring.

Map. My Delle Sedie as a bass is known.

Gye. He's not a bass: he's but a baritone.

Map. My Santley is a finished singer now;

Gye. Yes, but his name is English, you'll allow.

Map. Baragli, Bossi, Bertacchi, Bettini, Bagagiolo, Gassier, Zucchini,
Gambetti, Fricca, Soldi, Casaboni—

Gye. Not one of them can equal my Ronconi.

Besides I've Formes, Fellar, Ferenesi,
Capponi, Zelger, Obin, and Lucchesi, Ciampi, Naudin, Graziani, Rossi,
Neri-Baraldi, Faure, and Patriossi.

Map. My brave Rovere I have yet to name:

Gye. My Tagliafico is more known to fame.

Map. My Violetti too—

Gye. He's getting old:

Map. And my Fagotti—

Gye. He's a stick, I'm told.

Map. The skilled Arditì will conduct my band,
Who are well practised to obey his hand,
Start at his nod, and cease at his command.

Gye. As doth the column in Trafalgar Square
O'er top the fountains feebly squirting there,
So Costa doth all rivals far excel,
Costa, whose praise no pen can fairly tell;
Costa, on whom I ever have relied,
Costa, my friend, my hope, my joy, my pride!

Punch. Contend no more, who can the loudest squall,

But send me every night a box or stall;

Thus I the palm of merit may award.

Meanwhile, let's liquor. Both I look toward!

The English Opera Experiment in London.

(To the Editor of the Musical World).

Sir,—A well known theatrical paper in its remarks on the English Opera at Covent Garden, states that the past season has not been successful in a pecuniary sense; and further, attributes this want of success to the unreadiness of the English public to support English Opera.

Will you allow me as one of the public, no musician as you will discover, and not in any way connected with any member of the profession, to state my impressions in regard to the past season, believing as I do that the managers have to thank themselves for whatever want of success has attended their no doubt strenuous exertions to make English Opera pay. Let me analyze the company to begin with, and beginning with the end. Bases: Messrs. Weiss, Santley, Corri, Patey, John Rouse, &c.; these with one exception are all good names, more efficient could not be found. Mr. John Rouse, however, was a sorry substitute for Mr. George Honey, and altogether unqualified for his position. Contraltos: Miss Susan Pyne and Madame Laura Baxter; no one would say a word against this provision of Contraltos, except that Madame Laura Baxter, like her predecessors each season, was a novice to the stage, and that there is no advantage whatever as an attraction to the public in introducing novices.

Tenors—Here's the rub—Mr. W. Harrison and Mr. George Perren. Mr. Harrison has been on the stage, I believe, a great many years, has a capital stage presence, and used to sing first tenor parts with very great success, notwithstanding the fact that his voice, I should suppose, could not be termed a legitimate tenor, and his singing not half so remarkable for musical propriety and correctness, as for an amount of expression, and energy that even now, that his voice is a wreck of its former self, bears him up wonderfully. In such characters as Corentin, Miles na Coppaleen, Rochester, and even Don Caesar de Bazan, I do not think he could be equalled by any English tenor; but in such parts as Ruy Blas, or the Armorer in Balfe's last opera, or in short in any part in which the music is not exactly fitted to his powers, he is most unsatisfactory. I believe that the imperfect success of Ruy Blas and the Armorer of Nantes may be attributed to Mr. Harrison's inability to give the tenor music the important place it should fill in a musical banquet. Why does not this clever artist confine himself to comic parts, which his undeniable talent in that line enables him to fill so well—leaving the sentimental to—Mr. George Perren? No! This gentleman has a pleasing voice, and sings admirably.

I have heard no English tenor after Mr Sims Reeves who satisfies my ear so well, but he is entirely wanting in the superior physique and histrionic ability which stand Mr. Harrison in such good stead. Who that saw Mr. George Perren steal upon the stage during the finale of the first act of Love's Triumph, to have his clothes brushed, could have fancied him to be the hero who had just rescued a Princess from the jaws of a wolf? Sopranos: Miss Louisa Pyne and Miss Parepa, both first-rate vocalists, and had they sung on alternate nights throughout the season, I for one would have cried content, but Miss Pyne sang four nights, sometimes five, and even six nights a week, to the manifest injury of her beautiful voice. Miss Parepa was too seldom heard, her place being frequently filled by one of two debutants, who, whatever promise of future excellence they may give, are not at present qualified to replace that lady. It is, however, due to the fair manageress to acknowledge that exclusiveness was much less strictly the rule in her department than in the tenor.

The following composers were to be heard during the season, viz., Balfé in five operas, Wallace in three operas, Howard Glover one, Benedict one, Anber three, Meyerbeer one. Macfarren, Loder, Mellon, Barnett, F. Mori and J. L. Hatton, Leslie, &c., &c., showed no sign.

Of Mr. Balfé's five operas, four had been played in London upwards of 100 nights each. It was not likely, therefore, that they would draw very large audiences. Yet the Bohemian Girl, the oldest and most hackneyed of all of them, was played some twenty nights; and so with Wallace's operas. The puzzle is, why, if these operas did not pay, they were kept on the stage so long. I heard a musical professor remark the other day that one successful ballad paid the whole expense of an opera. Can you tell me, Sir, if Coveat Garden Theatre is kept open for the sale of "When other lips" and "Scenes that are brightest?"

The ballads are said to attract the million. As a unit of the million, I protest against this. At the very least, the million goes to the opera because the feelings and motives of the actors in a tale are made more apparent by music, which should thus, of course as well as the singers, be appropriate and fitted to the situation.

When these ballads are necessary to the story, are well written and well sung, they are not unacceptable: but when they take the form of such unwelcome interruptions as "These withered flowers" (Love's Triumph) or "Not till Time her glass shall shiver" (Armorer of Nantes), to name two amongst two hundred, they contribute merely to the success of the singer, and interfere with the success of the opera by attracting attention from what is more genuine and important.

The public will not listen night after night, week after week, and year after year, to the same opera unless it be something rare; if therefore the management would make the Royal English Opera attractive to those who care for music, they must not exclude all composers but the one or two who are famous for writing taking ballads, nor shut their eyes to the fact that there are other singers whom their audiences would like to hear besides themselves. If on the other hand they are content merely to keep the doors of Covent Garden Theatre open, they may give two acts of the Bohemian Girl and the pantomime all the year round. Only no one of musical tastes will visit the house twice or three times a week, as he probably would if his tastes were always gratified.

8th April, 1863.

ROBIN HOOD.

Wild Flowers.

(From the Independent).

The one who would find the earliest wild flowers of the season must look for them betimes, for they follow the snow so closely that they are likely to be gone before we have suspected their coming.

While snow-banks are upon one side of the hill, liverwort, spring beauties, yellow violets, and trailing arbutus are beginning to bloom upon the other. The woods is the place to find them; for these are the spring-beds of God's garden. In the southern edge of any mixed grove we shall find some if not all the above-mentioned varieties, nearly, if not quite, as early as the first crocuses of the garden.

Earliest of all are the liverworts; an impatient flower; it does not wait for its own leaves to grow, but while these are slowly unfolding, loitering in their leafy bed, they have sprung up fully dressed in white, lilac, violet, and pink, and are already enjoying the sun, and bending and bowing in constant coquettings to the frolicking spring winds.

Spring beauties come next, and but little behind; a cluster of small, starlike flowers, white, veined with pink; rightly named.

It will surprise you to find the yellow violet at this season, but here it is among the first, hanging its head as do all of the name, asking pardon as it would seem for appearing so early; the very picture of modesty and beauty.

Rake over the leaves of the open chesnut woods, and find if you can the arbutus. If not on one hill, look for it on another; find it, if possible, it is already in bloom. And it gives your collection what, without it, with all your spring flowers, it would lack, an exquisite fragrance. There, take these; they are all the flowers you can find now, for the anemones and blood-root are not out yet. Carry them home carefully, but first pull a few shoots of the pigeon-berry, with its dark, fresh green leaves and bright red fruit. Get a clear glass, or better, a pure white vase, let the vine hang down the sides, and put the flowers in the centre. And as they lift their heads from the refreshment of the water about their broken stems, clear white, delicate pink, lilac, violet, yellow; star-shaped, cup-shaped, rose-shaped, single, double—tell me if you are not a thousand times paid for your rambles and search, even if the clear air, the smell of the forest, the landscape with the shadows of clouds coursing over it, and the song of the birds, had not already paid you an hundred-fold?

House and garden flowers are certainly more gorgeously tinted, more fragrant, the arbutus being excepted, than are these wild sisters of the wood; but they are not so delicate in their tints, nor so exquisite in their structure. Neither does the finding of them give us such sweet surprise from contrast. What a rough mother for such delicate offspring is this wild wood! What a foster father for such frail and tender beauty is the scraggy old oak and ragged chestnut under which they grow!

Are all woods like this, and wherefore are they so bedecked? Whose hand planted the seed here, and buried the delicate bulb? Who guided the winds, that in their fierceness made the very trees creak and groan, that they harmed not the germs of these delicate flowers, but became their very servants instead, covering with leaf after leaf tenderly as a mother would wrap her child for slumber?

Who made the tempests and storms of winter serve the same purpose of protecting these tender and helpless plants, making the howling winds bear the snow and drop it over this bed, flake by flake, so softly that you could not hear the sound—so gently that not a single protecting leaf was disturbed? This is our God who so protects the helpless ones of the wood, and of all the earth. These simple wild flowers are in his garden—pluck them reverently, for his hand was upon them last before yours.

Music Abroad.

LEIPZIG.—The programme of the 19th Gewandhaus concert was made up entirely of French compositions, ancient and modern. First Part: Overture to Semiramide, by Catel, written in a simple and grand style; two popular Chansons of the 17th century; Arietta and ballet chorus from La Mascarade de Versailles, by Lulli; Rode's violin variations, executed by concert-master David; air and chorus from Hippolyte et Aricie, by Rameau; Overture to Jean de Paris, Boieldieu. Second Part: Symphony by Méhul (author of "Joseph"), which was received with marked favor; chorus from Les deux Azares, by Grétry; La Fée Mab, Scherzo from the Roman and Juliet Symphony by Berlioz; and finally a march and chorus of the Magi, from Lesueur's Alexandre à Babylone. All this must have been in strange contrast with the usual Gewandhaus programmes: that of the 20th and last, for instance, which consisted of Mendelssohn's Walpurgis-Nacht and the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven.—A new opera, "The Abbot of St. Gall," by Herther, was produced for the first time on the 29th of March.

As a farther specimen of the adventurous spirit which has prevailed of late in Leipzig programmes, we copy the following:

The programme of the Eighteenth Subscription Concert, on the 19th of February, was a peculiar one. First Part:—Symphony in C major, by the Abbé Vogler; air from Hercules by Handel, sung by Madlle. Amalie Weiss, of the Royal Opera House, Hanover; D minor Concerto, by Mozart, executed by Herr Reinecke, Capellmeister; recitative and aria from Gluck's Orfeo, sung by Madlle. Weiss.—Second Part:—Overture (No. 3) to Leonore, by Beethoven; Clarinet Concerto in E flat by C. M. von Weber, played by Herr Landgraf (member of the orchestra): songs with pianoforte ("An die Leier," by Schubert; "Frühlingslied," by Mendelssohn, and, additional, "Reiselied"), sung by Madlle. Weiss. The great feature of the concert was the young vocalist, who was fortunate enough to achieve an unusual and well merited success. Indeed, a fair artist, possessing a powerful and pleasing organ, and free from the bad habits indulged in by vocalists of the present day, while, at the same time, she boasts of an excellent method, a plain and beautiful pronunciation, and a most intelligent style, noble and delicate, but full of warm feeling—such a person is a phenomenon sufficiently rare for us to congratulate ourselves most heartily on. When, in addition to this, the lady, as yet so very young, displays such good taste in the selection of her songs, singing Handel, Gluck, Schubert and Mendelssohn, whose compositions she really can sing, and sing, too, in the most entrancingly beautiful style (some few exceptions which we might take to her reading of the songs are too trifling for us to speak of them to-day), we feel ourselves transported to the palmy days of genuine singing, which, unfortunately, have almost completely faded from our recollection. In a word, Germany possesses a treasure which we cannot sufficiently prize.

VIENNA.—On the 3d of April, a Stabat Mater by Franz Schubert was executed in one of the largest churches. It is said to contain fine passages, while as a whole the music is too secular, and lacks unity of style.

At the Italian Opera Don Giovanni had been poorly given. Mme. Lafon was Donna Anna, an eminent singer, with impaired vocal powers. Adelina Patti saved the opera, and was presented with a golden laurel crown. The diva, as the French enthusiasts already call her, was next to sing in La Sonnambula and L'Elisir d'Amore.

On the 27th March, the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde gave an evening concert, at which they executed a chorus by Schumann (Hebbel's "Nachtlied"), an "Adoramus" by Palestrina, and a newly discovered fragment of an oratorio, Lazarus, by Franz Schubert. The first piece has considerable pretensions to grandeur, to which, however, the general result does not attain. The "Adoramus" is a fine specimen of church music. Both pieces had been carefully rehearsed. They went with precision, the second being executed, moreover, with much delicacy. The greatest stress was laid, very justly, in the programme, on the fragment by Schubert, which was listened to with anxious attention, and partially received with lively applause.

We cannot, however, agree with the hymns of praise struck up on this occasion, as they always are when anything left by Schubert is to be brought into notice. It is true that in Der hässliche Krieg an incomparable gem was brought to light, but such is not the case with Lazarus. The former was something perfect of its kind. The Lazarus fragment, on the contrary, presents us with an attempt made by the prince of song-composers in a sphere very foreign to his natural bent; an attempt of a most peculiar kind, from which we may obtain many useful hints, but not artistic satisfaction of the highest order.

To judge by the fragment performed, from the outset Schubert did not plan his oratorio in the style justified by history, and suggested by experience for the treatment of Biblical subjects. He has rather unconditionally chosen decidedly romantic ground; his oratorio pursues its course exclusively within the sphere of that sweetly unsteady frame of mind, that magical narcotic perfume, and that half-dark system of mystery, which afterwards found their culminating point partly in Wagner and partly in Schumann; so that, in a certain sense, Lazarus struck us, so to speak, as a presentiment of the forms in Paradies und Peri, Der Rose Pilgerfahrt, and Wagner's "Elizabeth" and "Elsa." This would not be a fault were the subject a romantic one; but how an episode from Holy Writ—even though it be one which by its nature is purely lyrical—can justly be subjected to this romantic treatment, vacillating between the mysticism of the East and that of the West, is something we cannot comprehend.

Having stated this fundamental difference existing between what we are historically entitled to expect from an oratorio, and the purely subjective course pursued by the composer, we must proceed to point out in the fragment performed a certain monotony, springing partly from the text, naturally in the highest degree uninteresting, and partly from the recitative arioso-like treatment to which Schubert at the commencement gives the pre-eminence, whence the real melodic beauties contained in the work are often not fully perceived, and, therefore, not appreciated by the hearer. That there are more such treasures in this fragment than in the entire "opus catalogue" of many a popular composer of modern times is beyond a doubt; as is, also, the fact that the various beauties contained in the work would have been more easily perceived, and more highly appreciated, had the style of performance placed them in a more favorable light. The chorus and orchestra were, it is true, energetically kept together by Herr Herbeck, but the soloists, on the contrary, did only scant justice to that which was entrusted to them. Madame Wilt, as Jemina, was the best. She sang her part with perfect correctness, and her emphasis was invariably good. Madlle. Tellheim is deficient in delicacy of intelligence, and sings everything with equal force. Her voice is a fine one and her seal indisputable; but, in the development of her voice, in vocal art, and in the power to conceive anything, she is far, very far behind-hand, and has much, very much to learn. In his Lasarus, Herr Olshbauer portrayed scarcely anything but the lassitude of the part, while Herr Mayerhofer thundered forth over much. Finally, Madlle. Kling and Herr Schultze can scarcely be regarded as singers. Both possess more seal than voice.

Of the intrinsic importance of Bach's Matthaus-Passion, and of the value of its introduction into the concert-repertoire of Vienna, so much was said by us on the occasion of its first performance by the Singakademie, now nearly a year ago, that we should only be repeating what we then said were we to go into a detailed account of its second performance, also by the Singakademie, on the 31st March. We will content ourselves, therefore, with mentioning the sympathetic earnestness and almost humble admiration with which the public listened to this miraculous work.—Recensionen.

COLOGNE.—On Palm Sunday, the 29th March, the managers of the Gesellschafts-Concerts gave, as usual, a performance of sacred music, selecting Johann Sebastian Bach's Passion nach dem Evangelium des Matthaus, which was executed for the fourth time in Cologne, under the admirable direction of Ferdinand Hiller, and according to his arrangement of the score. The united performers constituted four different choruses; the members of the Concert-Gesellschaft and of the Gesang-Verein took the first and second principal chorus; the female pupils of the Conservatory, supported by a few dilettanti, the smaller chorus of youths and of the congregation of Jerusalem; and a select number of the pupils of the Friedrich-Wilhelm-Gymnasium, the boys' chorus for the cantus firmus of the figured chorales and choruses. Then there were two separate orchestras, in which the stringed instruments were strongly represented, and, lastly, to crown the whole, the organ,—admirably played and registered in the true church style by Herr Franz Weber—which, in the chorales and grand choruses, united, if we may so express it, like the mother of the holy art, all the varieties of song and instrumentation under its wide-spread tone-wings, and gathered them up into one lofty whole. The co-operation of the organ raised this performance far above the performances of former years, for, after all, every performance of sacred music without an organ is something incomplete. The audience was most numerous and brilliant; the seats in the hall, which had been increased until they numbered more than fourteen hundred, were all occupied. The galleries, also were quite full, many professionals and non-professionals from the neighboring towns being present. This immense assembly followed the performance with a degree of anxious attention and devotion which even restrained, until the conclusion of the first part and then until the termination of the entire work, the expression of applause, despite the evident effect produced by the music; the audience gave themselves up to the influence of the oratorio, which portrays the elevated character of its subject by means of music, with incomparable richness of melodic invention, touching truth of expression, and a depth of religious feeling, equaled only by the profundity of musical knowledge thanks to which the composer has left for his successors a never to be rivalled model in the fashioning of its tone forms, the floods of polyphony of its songs, and the coloring imparted to the essential instrumental accompaniment. The solo parts were thus distributed: Soprano, Madlle. Buchner of Cologne; contralto, Madlle. Weis, from the Theatre Royal, Hanover; tenor (the Evangelist), Dr. Guns, from the same place; Bass (Christ), Herr Hill, from Frankfort-on-the-Maine; second bass (Peter, etc.), Herr Bergstein from Aix-la-Chapelle.

BERLIN. Gluck's Armida was performed at the Royal Opera on the King's birthday. Fran Köster rendered the part of Armida with a dramatic power that recalled her best days. Wowersky, the tenor, and Fri. de Ahna also won applause. Mlle. Artot surpassed herself in the part of Angèle in Le Domino noir, which she sang in German, with only some slight French inflexions. Formes was equally good in the part of Horace.

NEW PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS. The twelfth season began about the middle of April, with a "magnificent orchestra of 85 picked players," Dr. Wylde, as heretofore, conducting. Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, Gluck's first Iphigenia overture and Spohr's Faust overture were finely played. Also a clarinet Concerto of Mozart, played by Mr. Lazarus, and an early piano Concerto in C, by Weber, played by Arabella Goddard. Mme. Sherrington and Sims Reeves sang several pieces. There were 1850 hearers.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS. The Musical World (April 18) says:

A word must record that the 124th concert (Monday last) was for the benefit of Mr. Hallé; that M. Vieuxtemps made his first appearance; that the quartets were, Haydn in E, and Beethoven in C (Rasounoffsky); the solo sonata, Beethoven in G (Op. 31), to which Mr. Hallé added some gavottes and musettes from J. S. Bach; that the concert ended with Beethoven's grand trio in B flat (Op. 97); that the singers were Misses Banks and Eyles; that M. Vieuxtemps was warmly received, and created a "sensation" in the Beethoven quartet; that Mr. Hallé played his best, and was, very naturally, in high favor; that the hall was very full; and lastly, that it was one of the best concerts Mr. Arthur Chappell has provided.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA. April 18.—On Thursday Masaniello was repeated. Signor Naudin does not impress us greatly, but he has decided qualifications and may be found more than useful in parts of less importance than the King-Fisherman. On Saturday I Puritani was given for the introduction of Madlle. Fioretti as Elvira. Madlle. Fioretti comes with a good name from Vienna and St. Petersburg, and has not belied her reputation.

I Puritani was repeated on Tuesday. On Thursday there was an opera, followed by a concert. Madlle. Antonietta Fricci made her first appearance this season, and her first essay as Norma; and Madlle. Carlotta Patti sang for the first time to a European audience. Both ladies were successful—Madlle. Fricci being recalled after each act, and Madlle. Carlotta Patti greatly applauded in three songs and a duet. The songs were "O luce di quest' amica," from Linda, one of the grand airs of the Queen of Night from the Flauto Magico ("Gli angeli inferni"), and Eckert's "Echo Song;" the duet, "Quanto Amore," from the Elisir d'Amore. The voice of Madlle. Carlotta Patti somewhat resembles that of her sister Adelina in quality, but has a still higher range. It is indeed an exceptional soprano, reaching to F in alissimo with apparent ease, as was shown in Mozart's air, the staccato passages in which we have never heard surpassed in clearness, crispness, and purity of intonation.

April 25th.—On Saturday and Monday—Norma—followed by the concert, and Madlle. Carlotta Patti was repeated.

On Tuesday, Masaniello.

On Thursday, Guillaume Tell, for the first time this year, with two changes in the cast—Signor Caffieri for Signor Tamberlik (Arnold), and Madlle. Dottini for Madame Rudersdorff (Jemmy). The new tenor did not come up to expectations. He was, however, nervous, and may improve. The general performance was good. The overture and chorus of the canton of Uri were encored.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE. April 18.—The season opened on Saturday with Il Trovatore, the cast embracing the names of Madlle. Titiens, Madame Alboni, Signor Giuglini and Mr. Santley. Of the opera and the singers not one word need be said. A splendid performance—the usual encores for "Il balen," "Ah! si ben mio," and the "Miserere"—the house crowded in every part—voilà tout. On Tuesday the Puritani was given, with Madlle. Titiens, Signors Giuglini, Gassier and Vialletti.

April 25.—On Saturday the Trovatore was repeated.

On Tuesday, Lucia di Lammermoor was performed for the first time this season, with Madlle. Titiens, Signors Giuglini and Gassier, followed by La Fafalletta.

On Thursday, Lucrezia Borgia, first time this season, introducing Madlle. Ellinger in the character of Maffeo Orsini—her first appearance on the English stage. The débütante was encored in the Brindisi.—Madlle. Titiens, Signors Giuglini and Gassier sustained the principal parts.—Musical World.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, MAY 11.—Otto Nicolai's comic and fantastic opera "The Merry Wives of Windsor," text very closely after Shakespeare, was given by Anschütz's German company at the Academy, April 27th. It is to be regretted that this opera was not given earlier; such charming music would have borne frequent repetitions, although, being of a finer grade of comicality than that of Lortzing, for instance, (the broad German comic, is to our thinking, heavy) it would perhaps have been less generally enjoyable to the German audiences, that form the majority of Anschütz's patrons. "Die lustige Weiber," abounds with beauties, and those of no common order, sparkling melodies, effective concerted pieces, and the instrumentation is most admirable. The fairy music in the last act is very fairy-like, and there is a dust between "Sweet Anne Page" and Fenton, in the second act, remarkable for its charming treatment. The overture, much better known in America than the opera itself, which, we believe, Anschütz's company has been the first to produce, is very brilliant. It is needless to say anything of the plot, save that it gives abundant opportunity for dramatic-comic musical situations, while the variety of character in the dramatic personæ is most favorable to the composer. The performance was tolerably good.

On the 29th, a benefit performance was given, at the Academy, to PALMO, the veteran manager, which realized the sum of fifteen hundred dollars, or more, to him. Although many of the Italian artists now in New York assisted, the performance, consisting of "Il Trovatore," a concert, and ballet, was very indifferent. On Monday and Wednesday evenings, and at the usual Saturday's matinee, Verdi's unsuccessful opera "Aroldo" was produced. Did Mr. Maretzek think that an opera that had failed in Europe, would still do for New York? If so, he was mistaken—just for once. The opera fell flatly even on the ears of the Academy audience. Except the finale to the first act, we cannot recall any portion of it that possesses Verdi's merit—that of striking dramatic effect. There is a churchyard scene—almost as common with Verdi as his two horsemen with James, the late novelist; also a Miserere heard outside, after the Trovatore pattern. A (scenic) storm on Loch Lomond, with aerial counter currents driving banks of clouds in different directions, and waves leaping up in spasmodic jerks, and clinging with tired pertinacity to the rocks, reminded us of Hugo's and Berlioz's stories of the gambols of the little beggar boys, who, for a cent an hour, simulate, on Parisian stages, the effects of violent winds. "Il Trovatore" will be given again at the Academy on Monday night; a Miss LIZZIE PARKER will débüt as Leonora.

The most attractive concerts of the past two weeks have been those of Mr. CASTLE and Madame URZO, at Irving Hall, and especially that of Mr. THEODORE THOMAS, which took place on Saturday night last. There was a fine selection of orchestral works:—Beethoven's C minor Symphony, Mozart's Zauberflöte overture, and Berlioz's Symphony, "Harold in Italy" (first time in America). The programme of the Symphony—for it belongs essentially to programme music—is as follows: Harold, tired, disappointed, and spoiled by a too early and unenviable acquaintance with the bad side of humanity, finds himself amid the rich nature of Italy, too worn out to feel moved by its beauty, or by the emotions which he witnesses in other men; he finally throws himself into a wild brigand orgy, where he perishes. This is by no means Byron's Harold, with all deference to Berlioz, and to Liszt, whose long article on Berlioz's music in general, and this Symphony in particular, may be read with some interest in the 43d volume of the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik; the noble Childe, with his Anglo-Saxon energies, had his destiny called him from among us before he had fully felt the certainty that truth, no matter how melancholy, is at the bottom fairer than illusion, might have perished, if by his own choice (as we poor mortals say!) in a noble cause—but would not have died of total exhaustion of moral and intellectual stamina. No:—Berlioz's Harold, as we gather from the music, is a Childe of weak heart and head, (and those French, to boot,) who gives way in the struggle between his good and evil nature. How is it that Berlioz so often selects repulsive subjects for musical illustration? This work is no exception; for a blasé man is the type of all weak, despicable, pitiable, (and alas! now vulgarly common) littleness.

The first movement of the Symphony is entitled: "Harold in the mountains; scenes of melancholy, happiness, and joy." The second: "March and evening prayer of the pilgrims." The third: "Serenade of a mountaineer of the Abruzzi to his beloved."—Fourth: "Orgy of brigands, with reminiscences of the preceding scenes." Berlioz represents Harold by the tones of the viola (often solo, or with harp accompaniment), "whose sonority better expresses the melancholy and extinguished hue of departed illusion, than the violin, which has too much color for these peculiar feelings," (says Liszt!) The first movement, although grandiose in parts, by no means places us in the mood which the view of a beautiful nature creates; rather in that produced by the sight of a savage, barren landscape (we do not allude to Harold's voice, the viola monody, but to the orchestral ensemble). The second and third parts are truer to their plan, and more beautiful; the second of poetic effect, the third very characteristic. The fourth is noisy, lengthy, and the "monody" of the viola here sounds childish and inexpressive. Berlioz has used every orchestral resource, with his well-known ability, in order to heighten the effect of the Symphony. The viola solo (the rôle of Harold!) was taken by Mr. E. Mollenhauer; the harp was in the hands of Mr. Toulmin.

What can we say of the Zauberflöte overture?—Who does not know that it is a lovely marriage of musical beauty and science? Here, indeed, is rich nature, art, beauty,—and how it satisfies the ideal desire within us! Beethoven's Fifth was finely played by the admirable orchestra Mr. Thomas had gathered together—and a glorious masterpiece it sounded! Such exuberance of musical idea, such purity of form, can dispense with orchestral embodiment, and yet remain a thing for love and wonder.—Mme. D'Angri sang the fine scena "Oh patria," from Tancredi, and an aria from "Romeo e Giulietta" with her accustomed breadth of style, and finished vocalization. Mr. Mills played the Chopin Polonaise in E flat, opus 22. We were glad to see a numerous and appreciative audience at this fine concert.

M. CARL BERGMANN promises, among things new and good, to be performed at his concert next Saturday week, Liszt's "Faust" Symphony, the introduction to Wagner's "Lohengrin," &c.

PHILADELPHIA, APRIL 25.—The fourth and last soirée of Messrs. CROSS and JARVIS was given on the 15th. Messrs. Cross and Schmitz played Beethoven's Sonata in A major, for piano and cello; Mr. Gaertner played Spohr's "Gesang-scene," and led in a Haydn quartet; Mr. Jarvis played Chopin's second Concerto, in F minor, following it with Henselt's arrangement of a Polacca of Weber's, as an encore.

The Larghetto of the second Concerto is exquisitely beautiful, and is one of those creations, the proper effect of which is lost amidst the glare of lights and the many distracting features of a crowded concert saloon. One wishes to be alone when listening to such music, and feels that if the performer were, at the same time, invisible and unknown, the effect would be heightened. You may think that the accessories I desire are rather romantic. To this I reply in advance, that those who are never guilty of romantic inspirations (or vagaries) are not apt to feel in fulness the beauties of Chopin's Nocturnes, Ballades, &c. Trust me, I would as lief give my days and nights to the study of Gyrowitz and Krommer, as to play any of those tone-poems to some of the peripatetic counting rooms that are so plentifully distributed in our best circles.

GOTTSCHALK gave a concert here, last Friday evening, with the assistance of Messrs. Charles Schmitz and Geo. Simpson, and a Mlle. Vivier. Whenever I think of Gottschalk, I am moved to pity. Not that I compassionate him, for that were impertinent. It is those who would hear better music at the hands of him, whom they justly designate as our best pianist—that I pity. There surely has been some improvement in the taste of the concert-going public since Mr. G. first played here, and yet his selections are what they always were; his own compositions. Were we malicious in our chagrin, we might say that it is well that he plays them, for other artists will not. If he would, in each concert, give only one composition of a purer school than his own, he would increase his audiences by those who prefer hearing worse performers play good music, to Mr. Gottschalk's playing of morceaux that seem better adapted for the "pieces de resistance" of a boarding school exhibition than any other purpose. Even as I would rather endure Forrest's gory Hamlet than (just think of it!) Edwin Booth as Metamora.

To finish the week, there were two concerts. One was that given to Mr. CORTESE by his pupils. The other, Mr. WOLFSOHN's fifth soirée, with the following attractive programme:

Moonlight Sonata.....	Beethoven
Trio: "Fantasie-Stücke".....	Schumann
Piano Solo: "Schlummerlied".....	Weber
Quartet: Piano and Strings, op. 8.....	Mendelssohn NIEMAND.

Concert Review.

MR. HERMANN DAUM'S Soirée Musicale, at Chickering's Hall, Wednesday evening, May 6th, was very fully attended. Clearly an eager, sympathetic audience. Mr. Daum has won many friends, as well as the general good opinion as a conscientious artist of no mean ability, during his residence among us. He was assisted by Miss ADDIE S. RYAN and the Mendelssohn Quintette Club. The programme was as follows:

1. Grand Trio in E flat, op. 14, for Piano, Clarinet and Viola.....Mozart Andante—Minuetto—Rondo Allegro.
Messrs. H. Daum, T. Ryan and C. Meisel.
2. Canzonetta: "My mother bids me bind my hair." Haydn
Miss Addie S. Ryan.
3. Funeral March for Piano. (MS.).....H. Daum
(By particular request.)
4. Trio in F op. 80, for Piano, Violin and Violoncello. Schumann Allegro: Adagio: Scherzo: Finale.
Messrs. H. Daum, Wm. Schultze and Wm. Fries.
5. German Ballad, "In the eye there lies the heart." Kücken
Miss Addie S. Ryan.
6. Andante Cantabile from Quintet No. 20, in D minor, op. 45.....Onslow
7. Grande Polonaise Brillante for Piano, op. 22.....Chopin

With the Mozart Trio Mr. Daum had favored us once before at a concert of the Quintette Club. Both for its curious combination of instruments, and its fresh, genial, Mozart-like qualities, it was very welcome again. In the great Thematic Catalogue it is numbered op. 498, instead of op. 14. Jahn tells us that Mozart wrote it for one of his fair pupils, who was a good pianist, in 1786, (five years before his death—it belongs therefore to his riper period), and that it goes by the name of the "Nine-pin alley Trio", because he is supposed to have written it while engaged in playing nine-pins. The combination of instruments is certainly interesting. He seems to have treated the viola with especial fondness, giving it characteristic and important passages. The Andante has two broad motives, treated in a facile, charming manner. The Minuet is full of life and positiveness, and reminds one a little of a movement in Beethoven's Septuor; the Trio to it is very beautiful. The Rondo, which is the longest movement, is also very interesting. Mr. Daum's rendering of the piano part was neat, clear, graceful and unaffected, and clarinet and viola did their duty well.

The great Trio by Schumann was the most important novelty of the evening. We can only say that we listened with great interest to all its movements, which are full of meaning, the Scherzo being particularly charming, and that we desire to know it better. Mr. Daum's most effective exhibition of his skill as an executive pianist was in the very brilliant and poetic Polonaise by Chopin; in this he covered himself with applause, and it made an excellent finale to the concert. His own Funeral March—a thing in which of course it is not easy to be original—was really solemn and impressive, moving in broad, rich chords, which showed a refined feeling, removed alike from common-place or clap-trap. The sweeter episodic part, commonly called Trio, has much beauty.

The Quintette Club had selected one of the most euphonious passages from the Quintets of Onslow, who always puts the tones upon the strings where they will sound well; and the Andante Cantabile was much enjoyed. Miss RYAN did herself more than usual justice in her singing; all that we could have wished modified or rather mitigated, was a certain stiff uniformity of full power of tone; the simplicity of style was good, but in Haydn's Canzonet there was room for finer shading which would have made the whole thing more light and graceful.

Mr. J. C. D. PARKER'S CLUB gratified their friends by a second performance of "Paradise and the Peri" on the evening of the 6th instant. The Chickering Hall has seldom, if ever, been the scene of a more delightful occasion. Making all the allowances for amateurs, for absences, for the substitution of a piano-forte for an orchestral accompaniment, for the need of first-rate solo singers in some pieces, the Cantata left an impression of beauty, variety, originality, poetic truthfulness and completeness, which every listener will cherish gratefully. It was a new sensation, and an exquisite one. A few passages may have cloyed the sense somewhat, drooping with sweetness and with heavy fragrance; but even in this the musical picture was the truer to the drowsy luxury of Eastern scenery and atmosphere; while certainly such traits are continually relieved by others of dramatic energy and fairy-like imaginativeness. Schumann has even improved upon Moore's poem to ensure these very contrasts, interpolating his own thoughts and verses here and there, as in the chorus of the Houris, which has a freshness of immortal youth, and that delectable fancy of the quartet "of Peris fair," who meet their sister, singing: "Peri is't true? Dost thou to Heaven's gate aspire?"

which breaks so happily the monotony of the long and somewhat drowsy, but yet exceedingly beautiful bass solo, describing "Syria's land, where blooms the rose." (Unfortunately, in this second performance this had to be omitted).

In general the whole thing went better the second time than it did the first; and there was much to praise on both occasions. The gain was chiefly in point of animation and expression, the natural result of more familiarity and freedom. The illness of Miss HUNTLEY made it necessary for Miss HOUSTON to assume the principal part, that of the Peri, which she did most kindly at a few days' warning; and though her voice is not so well adapted to it, she put so much true feeling and expression into nearly all of it, that she had the warmest sympathies of an intent audience. At certain important crises, too, the phrase was launched forth with a startling eloquence and brilliancy, which lit up all that went before and after; for instance, the high trumpet tones, where she catches the last life drops of the young hero: "For blood like this, for Liberty shed," &c., ushering in that magnificent chorus and finale of the first part.

The choruses in general were beautifully sung, especially those for female voices; and the accompaniments were firmly, clearly outlined. With an orchestra, of course, certain figuration would have come in to relieve the monotony of the long bass solo, to which we have alluded, and which Mr. RYDER, of the voluminous great voice, rendered remarkably well for an amateur. Mr. LANGMAID delivered the tenor recitatives and airs with the same careful, true expression as before. The finished charm of Mrs. HARWOOD's singing only lacked more opportunities to manifest itself. Nor must "the angel" contralto, nor the fine little childlike soprano of "the Maiden" (what tenderness there is in this music, and indeed pervading the Cantata!), pass unnoticed. In our next number we propose to attempt a description somewhat in detail of "Paradise and the Peri."

GOTTSCALK.—During the past fortnight, the brilliant piano virtuoso has again been feasting his admirers here, who find his nectar and ambrosia much the same as ever. He has given, as nearly as we can keep the run of them, four concerts in the city (besides many round about it): two in the Tremont Temple, one (a Sacred one!) in the Academy of Music, and yesterday a Matinée at Chickering's. To describe one is to describe them all, except in the accessories. Of these the most novel appeared in the first, and we believe in the second and the "Sacred" concert: the "wonderful BRETTO Brothers," as they are called. They are said to be children of one of the MOLLENHAUERS in New York; handsome, hearty looking boys, both of them. We heard Master Bernard, aged 11, play a well known Fantasia of De Beriot on the violin, which he handles skilfully, with good intonation, neat execution and a good deal of it for a boy, although we can hardly call it "wonderful," since wonders have become so common. There is reason to hope that he may grow up a very accomplished artist, if not too much exhibited and thereby kept under a forcing process to make him excel in shallow showy things. All due praise to the clever and industrious boy, but what privilege is it to hear done by a boy what is every day done quite as well or better by the "old boys" in every city that is musical?—The little fellow, Master Richard, aged 7, made indeed a fairy droll appearance, handling a cornet nearly as big as himself, and indeed producing a pure tone, master alike of its heights and depths, as well as sentimental strains, in a manner truly astonishing. Yet most unnatural; for why should such an infant blow himself bodily through such an instrument? Why be trained to monkey tricks (pretty as they may be, but costing fearfully) of imitating sentiment which he of course cannot feel?

Artistically the most dignified and edifying feature of this first concert was the singing, by Mr. RYDER, of the two noble bass airs of the Priest in Mozart's "Magic Flute"; they were written for a large, deep bass like his, and his voice made the music tell. The first one, though, (In diesen heil'gen Hallen) would have told better, had he sung it in Italian or German, instead of in English.

Of Mr. Gottschalk's own performances there is nothing new to be said. In the first concert he played:

first (in place of the "Tell overture, for which a second piano was wanting) a very noisy, extravagant and to our ear unmusical sounding Fantasia, Impromptu, or what not, which charmed by its difficulty and physical display of energy, "plucking chords up by the roots," and all that sort of thing; then a Funeral March and his Murmures Eoliennes, more acceptable, though rather an old story; then his Ojos Creoles, with Mr. S. BEHRENS, in which he undertakes the part of a Chopin for the Creoles (see programmes passim); and finally Le Barde and a burlesque on "Malbrook". All compositions of his own. When a real genius, a Chopin, comes along, we certainly wish to hear him play his own compositions; first because we may suppose them to be worth hearing, and secondly, because others can play us Beethoven and the older classics.

A SACRED CONCERT, for the relief of the suffering poor of Ireland, was given at Tremont Temple last Sunday evening, by the Choir of the Cathedral of the Holy Cross, under the direction of Mr. WERNER.—Master Julius D. Werner presided at the Organ. We are sorry we are only able to mention the good things which formed the first part of the Programme (the second part was lighter):

Fugue on the Organ for Four Hands. . . . . S. Bach
Gloria, from the Mass in C, (Solos & Chorus). . . . . Beethoven
Ave Maria, (Soprano Solo and Chorus). . . . . Donizetti
Benedictus: from the Mass in C. . . . . Beethoven
Prayer from Moses in Egypt, (Orchestra). . . . . Rossini
O Salutaris, (Duet for Soprano and Tenor). . . . . Cherubini
The Heavens are Telling: from the Creation. . . . . Haydn.

ERRATA.—In the hurry of going to press a day earlier than usual, on account of the National Fast, we did not see a proof of our New York correspondent's last letter, and the types played the mischief with it. Thus Robert Franz is said to have "touched us with quick pleasure," instead of quiet; and "regret for a musician" should read "regret for a mannerism, that has increased in his last works," &c.

CONCERTS THIS EVENING.—There are three announced.

1. CAMILLA URSO, the admirable lady violinist, gives a Farewell Concert at Chickering's, on the eve of her departure for Europe. It will certainly be an occasion of great interest, being the last chance we shall have to hear her for at least several years. She will have the assistance of Miss ADDIE RYAN, Mr. B. J. LANG, Mr. CARL MAYER, and the Mendelssohn Quintette Club.

2. Mr. P. S. GILMORE, whose noble and wholehearted exertions to raise a fund of $3,000 for the Massachusetts regiments at Newbern, by means of a whole week of concerts, were crowned with such signal success, richly merits a benefit, and is to receive that compliment at the hands of the Committee, who took his offering in charge, to-night, at the Boston Theatre. Full orchestra and band, and Mme. ANNA BISHOP will make the entertainment rich.

3. Mr. B. A. BURDITT, who has labored so faithfully for many years in connection with the Brigade Band, is also to have a benefit at the Tremont Temple.

FRENCH COMEDY.—We regret that the exquisite performances of M. PAUL JUIGNET's company, in the New Tremont Theatre (Studio Building), are limited to this present week; else we should most certainly use all our eloquence to persuade those of our readers, who know even a little French, and who would witness the most natural, easy, elegant, delightful acting, 't that we ever had here, to go just as often as they can. It is something too good, too rare to lose.

CAMILLA URSO was to play on Fast evening at Mr. L. MARSHALL'S second concert in the Tremont Temple.—Mr. GILMORE'S patriotic concerts succeeded to the full mark of his expectation; $3,000 was the solid result, which he has handed over to the committee for the benefit of our six regiments in North Carolina. Mme. BISHOP entered heart and voice into his plan, presented him a baton at the end and had a fine Sacred Concert complimentary to her, self afterward.

An event of artistic significance is promised in New York. For the first time an opera by GLUCK, the "Orfeo," is to be produced on the 25th of this month at the Winter Garden. It is to be done under the management of the popular contralto, Mme. VESTRALI, who has recently returned to this country and has engaged that theatre for a few nights of English opera. Whether the loves of Orpheus and Eurydice are to be sung in English, or not, we do not learn. But we are assured that Mme. Vestrali, emulating Johanna Wagner and Viardot, has made a special study of the part of Orpheus, and that the noble work will be brought out with new scenery and costumes and with all possible completeness. This would be a treat for Boston also; may we not hope to have it? Of all our lyrical remembrances of a rich year in Europe, not one remains more whole and pure and beautiful than this. But then such things are not so easily done in the true style here, as they are in Berlin.

NEW YORK AND BROOKLYN have certainly no lack of music to complain of. Among other things announced are:

A concert by CARL BERGMANN, of which the principal instrumental features will be: Liszt's "Faust" Symphony in three parts (1. Faust, Allegro. 2. Gretchen, Andante. 3. Mephistopheles, Scherzo and Finale); Concerto in A minor by Schumann, played by Mr. MILLS; the introduction to Wagner's Lohengrin; and the Overture Carnival Roman, by Berlioz. Also Mr. Mills will play a Fantasia by Liszt, and Mme. JOHANSEN will sing songs by Schubert and Schumann. "Music of the Future" enough to please our friend of the London Times and Musical World!

Mr. R. GOLDBECK is to give a grand concert on the 19th, at which his new Symphony "Victoria" will be performed for the second time.—The last series of GOTTSCALK concerts commences at Irving Hall to-night. Gottschalk is everywhere—Boston, Salem, Lawrence, Dover, New York—and everywhere the same. Miss DINGLEY, the singer, and CAMILLA URSO, the violinist, have given concerts at Irving Hall; and Signor BARILI has had an exhibition of his singing pupils, at which twenty pieces (choruses, arias, duets, &c.), all commonplaces of the current Italian Opera repertoire, were sung.

In Brooklyn, a concert for the benefit of the German Evangelical Sunday School took place at the Polytechnic Institute, with the following programme:

1. Overture, Iphigenia in Aulis, Gluck; 2. Pianos, 8 hands. 3. Requiem, Mozart, (No. 3, Solo Quartet, Tuba mirum. No. 6. Confutatis, and No. 7. Lacrymosa.) 3. Trio, (in C minor, Op. 1, No. 3) L. v. Beethoven: For Piano, Violin and Violoncello.—4. Two Songs, for Chorus. a) "Wanderer's Nachtlied," Hauptmann. b) "Jayedlied," Mendelssohn. 5. Die Glocke, von Schiller (Schiller's Lay of the Bell,) for Solos and Chorus, Andreas Romberg.

Mr. WILLIAM SCHARFENBERG, of the well known firm of Music-dealers, Scharfenberg and Louis, has been elected President of the New York Philharmonic Society.

Mr. F. Leyboldt, in Philadelphia, has already followed up the good work of publishing Liszt's Life of Chopin, by giving us the "Travelling Letters" of the young MENDELSSOHN, which need no recommendation to the readers of this Journal. He has reprinted, in the same beautiful style and form with the "Chopin", the translation of the "Letters from Italy and Switzerland" made in England by Lady WALLACE. The translator has done her work very conscientiously and carefully, rendering the exact meaning of the author, so far as we could perceive, in every instance. To our taste, however, she has been somewhat over anxious to convert every thing into conventional pure English, as if the letters had been originally written in English. By this process somewhat of the individual and German flavor of the expression is lost. Even at some expense to the king's English we prefer such a close-fitting English counterpart as Mr. Brooks has given us in his almost perfect rendering of Jean Paul's "Titan." It is the surest way to keep in all the real juice and poetry of the original thing, and the process may be just as truly reproduction, just as far from merely mechanical (witness Mr. Brooks's wonderful success), as the most free re-casting of the thoughts into our own English moulds.

But we do not mean to say that the "Letters" suffer much in this respect in Lady Wallace's translation. It is on the whole a remarkably satisfactory performance. We are glad to see, too, that Mr. Leyboldt's edition is enriched by Mendelssohn's charming little pen and ink sketches of Swiss scenery.

Our excellent singer of Mozart, Schubert, Franz and Schumann, Mr. AUGUST KREISSMANN, seems to have almost turned the heads of the best music-lovers in New York, by his performance at Mason and Thomas's last Soirée. All the first musicians and amateurs were present, and he was so warmly appreciated, that we feel really uneasy lest they steal him away from us. The German papers particularly are most glowing in his praise; the Abend-Zeitung says: "New York must envy Boston the possession of the best Lied singer in America, who has indeed few equals in Germany."

Mr. B. J. LANG gave recently a concert in Salem, his old home, with so excellent a programme, that, even at this late hour, we wish to record it.

1. Grand Sonata, Op. 22.....Beethoven
2. "Jerusalem," from "St. Paul".....Mendelssohn
3. Scherzo, Op. 81.....Chopin
4. Andante for 2 Pianos.....Schumann
5. Song of Spring.....Mendelssohn
6. Rondo Capp. Op. 14.....Mendelssohn
7. { a. Prelude in E. minor.....Mendelssohn
- { b. Fugue.....Handel
8. The Mother's Song.....Kucklen
9. Concerto, acc't by 2d Piano.....Hummel
10. { a. Mazurka, F sharp minor.....Chopin
- { b. Impromptu.....Mason

Mr. G. W. STREELE played the second piano, and Miss J. E. HOUSTON was the vocalist. The Salem people do not often have so fine a treat.

A letter from New York says: "Our practical musicians are not exactly on a 'strike', but they are dissatisfied with the prices paid for playing at theatres and balls, and intend to arrange a new tariff. I understand that $8 or $9 per week is all that members of the orchestra in a theatre receive, and $5 per night for playing at a ball, which is little enough in all conscience. The new rates have not yet been agreed upon."

The Chicago Musical Union sang Mendelssohn's "Elijah" on the 14th of April, under the direction of Mr. BALATKA. The performance is said to have been the best of the kind ever given in the West, and much praise is accorded to the contralto, Mrs. Mattison, and to the raw material for a great baritone in Mr. Jules Lombard.—The Philharmonic Society, in the same city, gives every Saturday afternoon an instrumental concert, or "Matinée."

PHILADELPHIA.—The "Creation" was announced for performance on Thursday evening, in Musical Fund Hall, by the Handel and Haydn Society, numbering over two hundred singers, with the aid of some of the best artists and the Germania orchestra.—The Germania Afternoon Rehearsals still continue on Saturdays. This was the last programme (they have not yet reached the point of giving an entire symphony):

1. Overture—Le Colporteur.....Onslow
2. Introduction and Variations for two Clarinets (Stoll and Schubert).....Mueller
3. Eulogy of Tears.....Schubert
4. Waltz—Kroll's Ball Sounds.....Lumbye
5. Andante of Symphony No. 1.....Beethoven
6. Overture—In the Highlands.....Gade
7. Barcarole and Prayer—North Star.....Meyerbeer
8. Finale—Jewess.....Halévy

We clip a very pretty compliment from the London Musical World of April 25: "DWIGHT'S BOSTON JOURNAL OF MUSIC, the best Art Journal in America, one of the best, most independent, and most honorable in Europe, is henceforth to appear once a week, instead of once a fortnight." This is the kindest cut of all!

WORCESTER, MASS.—"Stella" writes:

The musical soirée recently given by the pupils of Mr. B. D. Allen was repeated at Brinley Hall on Friday evening, drawing high encomiums from the large audience present. The young amateurs acquitted themselves well, as on the previous occasion, and the programme was varied by singing, by Mrs. A. S. Allen and Messrs. Metcalf and Hammond, the former singing Schubert's "Praise of Tears," and a pretty barcarole by Stigelli. The Beethoven Trio Club played a romance by Gade, and a favorite Scherzo by Fesca.

An organ for the Mechanics Hall is now talked of, and there is a probability of something besides talking being the result. It is to be hoped that the instrument will be worthy of its place, and of the uses to which it will be given. A good organ in the hall, and none other should be admitted, our citizens will wonder that they have allowed the organ-case to stand empty thus long. The time may come when the painter and the sculptor shall adorn the empty panels and niches with the beauties of their respective arts. But that time will not come in a day. When it does may these walls, now white and cold, glow with the story of the nation's struggle for life, its earnest effort, and its final victory!

Mr. EDWARD DANNREUTHER, the young Cincinnati-an, whose success at the Leipzig Conservatoire has been so marked, has recently appeared in London as pianist. The Athenaeum bestows extraordinary praise on his performance:

Unless we are mistaken, Saturday last showed a remarkable first appearance in a world where first appearances become, year by year, more and more difficult, the world of pianoforte players. Mr. Dannreuther is a player requiring small consideration on the score of youth; less allowance for inevitable inexperience; least of all, no silly sympathy such as those melancholy creatures called prodigies easily manage to engage, to the destruction of their future progress. He is simply an artist who enters his profession with an armament of means, powers, and intellectual endowments, regarding the future issue of which there can be no doubt, life and health permitting: His success, from first to last, was remarkable, we repeat. Chopin's first Concerto, the one in F minor, is no piece of pleasantery, but a difficult, dreamy, elaborate composition, in places weak—the beauty of which (and the beauty is great) can only be developed by one who commands rare powers of execution and an innate delicacy of sentiment not to be assumed nor counterfeited—the true musician's sentiment. This difficult Concerto was delivered with so much command of the instrument, so much energy (when energy was wanted) and poetical grace, as not merely to hold fast a large and miscellaneous audience, to whom it was strange, but to assert, to all those who have ears to hear, the arrival of a great new player. A feat much more difficult has not often been accomplished. After this, Mr. Dannreuther played Prof. Moscheles graceful Serenade, (Op. 103), a charming, real and sound single movement, and then Dr. Liszt's brilliant transcript of M. Gounod's brilliant and natural Faust Waltz. The themes seize the ear, and the treatment of them is most effective for every purpose of display. Better played the piece could have hardly been, save, perhaps, by Dr. Liszt himself.

Books.

OPERATIO BOUQUET. By Ed. Bruce. Cloth, $2.00
Boards, 1.75
Paper, 1.50

Every choir should be able to sing chorus music. At least, in every village, there should be a musical association able to do it. For such bodies of singers the Bouquet is very valuable, containing, as it does, the music arranged by Mr. Bruce, which has contributed not a little to the profit and interest of his choir rehearsals for years.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being about one cent on each piece. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that it is double.

Hector Berlioz.

Opinions in regard to Berlioz are even to-day very diverse, and oftentimes diametrically opposed. Thus briefly, writes Richard Wagner:—"Berlioz has, it is true, continued Beethoven, but in a direction which he (Beethoven) had very rightly abandoned. The often bold and carelessly thrown off pen-strokes in which Beethoven, hastily and without examination, wrote down his attempts to discover new means of expression, fell into the hands of the eager scholar, as almost the only heritage of the great artist; and it is certain that Berlioz produced artistic effects out of the adored marvels of those strange pen-strokes. Amazement and transport filled the heart of Berlioz at the sight of those strange characters, in which the master had endeavored to make known the mystery which he believed Music alone to be capable of expressing, but which he vainly tried to express by music. Berlioz's inspirations, however, were only artistic tumult and feverish agitation. When, as in the relaxation of one stupified by opium, he beheld but a dreamy blank around him, he tried to arouse himself by recalling the feverish excitement of his dreams, which he accomplished only by the most painful and laborious employment of his musical faculties."

Now how may Berlioz be considered? Is he, according to Paganini's opinion, a true musical genius, or, after Wagner's view, a man without imagination, who is merely noisy? Does he indeed overstep the utmost limits of musical art, or only those of petty custom? His compositions give to this a candid answer.

Berlioz shows, first of all, in his works, originality of conception. Not one single borrowed idea can be authenticated. This is of not much importance, since it is easy to be original if one neither minds law, nor aims at beauty; and indeed he has been charged with this, by many people, who also reproach him with having no melody. Melody, say they, is the soul of music, and where that is lacking, there can be no true music. With this I entirely agree; but what do they mean to express by the term melody? There appear no melodies like those in the Strauss Waltzes; but there are musical thoughts which touch the heart, and delight the ear, by their simple design, by their instrumental euphony, and by their expression of emotions, and therein no judicious hearer will deny the existence of genuine music. I maintain this kind of ideas to be above mere melody, and as regards expression they are surely not unwisely formed. In this respect (of melody) the majority of Berlioz's ideas are as good as those of Haydn, Mozart, or Beethoven.*

Of course, sometimes, a thought runs under, which, more or less, lacks this character, either in the graceful harmony, the unity of construction, or in the rigorous, precise, rhythm. But as in him these are often found wanting, so they are likewise in the works of all the great musicians.

I recollect, for instance, a fugued passage in the trio of the C minor Symphony of Beethoven which the basses commenced, and the beginning of the Allegro of the Overture "Calm at Sea, and happy Voyage," of Mendelssohn.

Besides the above mentioned kinds of genuine musical ideas, there are the popular melodies, appearing in dances, marches, people's, and other simple songs. They are universal, and immediately interesting, they spread quickly far and wide, and are to be found especially in the old operas. They are heard, like home-tunes, in the instrumental compositions of our great masters, although rarely—in their Symphonies, Overtures, Quartets, &c.

The overture to Coriolanus contains but one single melody. The first movement of the C minor Symphony, but one.

Berlioz has many gleams of popular melodies in his compositions; as in the Francs Juges, for instance; and at the same time he is very skilled in the knowledge of instrumentation. He is reproached with lavishness and extravagance, especially in the immoderate use of brass instruments. Many of his works contain few of these, and a great number are instrumented in the softest and faintest manner. Where the charge seems established in many places in Germany, when his compositions were performed, they compared the orchestra, which they heard, with the one his score demanded, and for which he had estimated his effects. He sets down for the string quartet: at least fifteen first violins, fifteen second, do: violas at the least ten, 'celli twelve, contra-bassi, nine, at least. With only four or five, or even eight first violins, eight second violins, two or three weak violas, and just as many 'celli and bassi, put in the orchestra, certainly effects come to light which he never intended, but by which every one criticizes him. It is the same as if one should give a Symphony of Beethoven with two or three first violins, and the other stringed instruments in proportion. Then, without doubt, half the sound of the strings would be lost, among the horns, trumpets and kettle drums!

One might inquire, why he calculated his effects for a string-quartet thus powerfully constituted; the reply is: precisely therein lies his prodigality of means. But who censures Gluck for employing a more powerful orchestra than Lully and Rameau, and introducing clarinets and trombones? Who blames Beethoven for using bassoons in the last part of the C minor Symphony? or Mendelssohn, because, in his overture to the "Midsummer Night's Dream," he has introduced ophicleids?

Berlioz makes use of new means to produce new, and truly artistic effects, and never employs them otherwise than artistically. If he used brass instruments in the delineation of tender sentiments, or soft emotions, the censure would be well grounded, but we seek in vain, in his score, for such absurdities. Mighty feelings are expressed, wherever a mighty sound is heard. Some new composers wrongly urge the objection of over-loaded instrumentation, because they do not observe the disproportion arising, in later times, between string-quartets, and brass instruments, in music, but they unjustly accuse Berlioz, since, by means of his large experience in instrumentation, he has removed this disproportion in his orchestra, by merely increasing the number of the stringed instruments.

His figures are magnificent, bold, soaring, diversified—here brief, there extended, but always in spirit suitable to the object, in such unity and correctness technically, as if Beethoven himself had constructed them.

Berlioz is oftentimes more clear in his phrasing, than many new composers who come after Beethoven. Mendelssohn himself has at times ideas well formed on the whole, which approach more nearly perplexity and confusion than any one of our masters. I cite only the beginning of the Allegro of the "Calm at Sea and Happy Voyage." I do not say all Berlioz's phrases are models in this respect, but in general they need not shun comparison with the best of the great masters.

The preeminence of his music consists in the very original way of working up the theme of the principal idea; but since by reason of its novelty it cannot immediately be perceived as such, therefore what is only a subject is oftentimes taken for a new idea and by this means the opinion arises that he strings together ideas on ideas, without any real relation to each other and that his compositions lack fluency and coherence in their structure.

Scribe.

(From "Spiridon's" Letters to the Evening Gazette.)

I am at the door of the French Academy. Enter. You will hear Mons. Feuillet deliver an eulogy upon Mons. Scribe, his predecessor—an eulogy which reads much better than it was heard, for Mons. Feuillet was monotonous to fatigue while reading a speech (like some pied pigeon's neck which loses all its beauty unless the sun plays upon its feathers) whose beauties were unseen until placed in light by all the coquettish arts the voice possesses. Mons. Feuillet began his speech by eulogizing modern French novelists, not one of whom, by the way, except Mons. Jules Sandeau, was or is a member of the French Academy. Mme. de Stael was excluded by her sex, de Balzac and Alex. Dumas by their private character, Mme. George Sand has no place there in the first place because she is a woman. It was therefore not without some good ground of reason that Mons. Feuillet said: "It seems to me that I gather here the prize of their efforts rather than of my own, and I should look upon myself for ungrateful were I not at this moment to associate their souvenir with my appearance here and their merit to my fortune." He then proceeded to sketch Mons. Scribe's character. Let me quote the more salient passages of this portrait:—

"Eugene Scribe was born at Paris in 1791, of an honorable family of tradesmen under the shadow of those Halles even then haunted by an illustrious shade. There the Muse elected him—not that Muse who a century before sought Molière in that neighborhood and whose hearty, large and profound laugh reminded us of the bronze laughter of antique comedy—but a younger, lighter, gentler sister, whom we may call the Muse of Smiles. She seemed to accompany him to the celebrated college where he studied and where she bestowed on him a great deal of success and a great many friends. Everybody knows how Scribe's memory remained faithful to college and to friends during the whole course of his life and of his labors. Those fervent college friendships, which are one of the favorite fictions and one of the graces of his plays, that affectionate solicitude which he constantly felt in the welfare of the institution where he found his intellectual family, do honor both to the delicacy of his heart and of his memory. He left Sainte Barbe College in his eighteenth year. He was an orphan, he was not wealthy, he was still uncertain what career to pursue. It seems that even then uncertainty like this in the mind of them who were embarrassed for themselves or for others had, as it has now, an inevitable solution: the toga of the advocate. Scribe's worthy guardian, and estimable advocate of that day (Mons. Bonnet, who was more than "an estimable advocate;" he was the head of the French bar then) and who had connected his name with a generous action, with the defence of Gen. Moreau, neglected nothing to assure the progress of his pupil in the career whither he attracted him. While he made him follow a course of Roman law, he selected for young Scribe's private tutor, with a reach of foresight which honors him, a young lawyer who was to be, who is one of the most eminent orators of the French tribune and of the French Academy (Mons. Dupin aîné). At the same time Scribe studied practice in an attorney's office where he was supposed to be engaged as clerk. But Scribe's zeal was not equal in degree to all those ardent efforts to advance his legal career. If we may credit an anecdote preserved in his guardian's family, he did not shine by assiduity as a clerk. He had one morning the ill fortune to meet in a street of Paris the attorney, his master, and who appears to have been an excellent man, for he contented himself with making no reproach to his clerk, who blushed up to the eyes, except to say: 'Ah! Monsieur Scribe, I am delighted to see you. I have been long anxious to speak to you. I wish to say that if ever, by some good fortune, you should happen to be passing any where in the vicinity of our neighborhood, I shall be very glad if you will call at my office.' Scribe stammered: 'Monsieur, I am on my way there.' He did that day go to the office; but this day had few successors, and the intelligent attorney did not even dream of again complaining of it, since he discovered, as he himself said, that Scribe's presence in the office was equivalent to the absence of two clerks. Nevertheless the explanation of the young clerk's lack of zeal was soon given. In 1811 his name was heard for the first time in one of those halls whose familiar and glorious echo he was so long to be. The Theatre de la Rue des Chartres had just played a short piece entitled Les Dervis, a lively and spirited work of the pen which was essaying its powers. All the details of this delightful evening remained present to Scribe's memory, who delighted to recall them. He was associated in this first campaign with a literary partner, young as himself, and both were enjoying with delicious intoxication the applause of success, when an old author, like the antique slave, entered the smiling group that surrounded the triumphant authors, and said to them: 'Young men, that will do for once; but do not try it again, or at least prepare yourselves for less complaisance and especially for fewer friends.' The prediction of this forgotten sage was entirely fulfilled. Scribe's efforts were repeated in different sorts of dramatic productions during the following years; although they were equal, and sometimes superior in merit to the promises of his first work, success was denied them. It seems that there is in real life as well as in enchanted countries a sort of jealous guardian at the entrance of every career and of all the paths which lead to fame; a guardian who longs for prey, who is sometimes surprised, but who always avenges the surprises put upon him.—Scribe was not one of them who are enervated and disheartened in these inevitable and doubtless salutary combats. He had confidence in his talents, his powers were strengthened by the struggle, and he soon forgot the trials of his early career except to avert their bitterness from his younger literary brethren. At last he quitted that 'Artists' Garret' (the title of one of Scribe's pieces) whose fleeting pains and permanent hopes he, a few years afterwards, took pleasure in painting, or rather in singing, and when he placed in the mouth of one of his heroes these words, 'twas Scribe himself who spoke with the sincere eloquence of his heart: 'My friend's fortune henceforth is ours. We have only to push on; but when we become rich and celebrated let us always remember the difficulties of our first steps—and when a young painter brings you his first sketch, when a young musician shows you his first score, when a young literary brother comes to consult us, let us encourage their weak efforts, let us aid them with our advice, our purse, our friendship, and let us never forget that the most difficult thing in the world to them is the first step in their career.' I may say that in writing these lines Mons. Scribe traced the noble principles of his life.

"From this moment and for many a year, if a dramatic production was recommended by singular merits, by the fascinating invention of the subject, by the unrivalled suppleness of the intrigue, by the sparkling vivacity of the dialogue, by a marvellous art of precipitating or of suspending interest, of mingling gaiety and emotion, tears and smiles, grace and good common sense, the public did not wait to acclaim Scribe for the prompter to name him. Never, perhaps, was a master of the stage more completely master of the public of his day, and never was master so beloved. This constant and warm favor, marked with a sort of especial cordiality by audiences, Mons. Scribe pretended to explain to his young literary brethren by revealing to them with his sprightly good nature the great mystery of his art: 'The public likes me, he used to say, because I always take care to put it in my confidence; it is in the secret of the comedy; it has in hand the wires which move my personages; it knows the surprises I have in store and it believes it has them itself in store; in fine I take the public for my literary partner; it imagines it writes the piece with me and naturally it applauds the play.' This explanation, despite the delicate information it conveys, I confess is not sufficient for me. I find a better explanation to account satisfactorily—not for Scribe's success, since his talents commanded them—for that profound and almost cordial sympathy which united Scribe to the public, and which has survived him. One of the most difficult arts in the domain of literary invention is to charm the imagination without troubling it, to amuse men without corrupting them. This was Scribe's great art. To what a genial, sunny, consolatory world his familiar poetics transported the spectator! The curtain scarcely rises and discloses the opening scene, when this gentle magic takes possession of you! You see a vine-covered arbor before some inn-door and a soldier passes singing as he goes; or some lane in a park where a young girl all in white is seen walking; a summer drawing-room where a widow of twenty indulges in reverie; sometimes a grand-mother who has not seen thirty springs—for in this fairy-land it seems there is but one season, which is summer, but one age, which is youth! Nevertheless, to discover the whole secret of this incomparable popularity I must enter upon a delicate portion of my subject; I must not be afraid to utter in Scribe's praise a word which has often been thrown at him as a bitter criticism, the word 'middle-class writer,' which it is astonishing to find, with the accent of disdain and railery in the mouths of children of modern France. Ay, unquestionably the intimate, cordial agreement of this delightful genius with the principles, sentiments and impressions of that middle-class from which he issued, and which form the immense majority and body of the public of our day, was one of his most powerful means of action; but never was means of action more lawful, since Scribe drew all of it from the sincerest vein of his talents and the healthiest inspections of his conscience. And most assuredly he never would have repudiated this title of 'writer of the middle-classes;' he would rather have claimed it proudly in his father's and in his own name, in the name of his modest origin and brilliant fortune, the pure work of his own hands, in the name of his labors, of his own dependence, of his probity, of his spotless life and of all his middle-class virtues which he could openly profess, for he constantly practised them. I shall not glance at a considerable portion of Scribe's labors, that delightful series of lyrical dramas on which he succeeded in throwing an interest which this class of works seemed scarcely to admit before his day. Without wishing to exaggerate in these difficult compositions the share of the poet at the expense of the composer's labors, it is proper to notice that among all the fairy tales which have been told on our lyric stages these thirty years gone, those which still live in greatest glory are, with few exceptions, Scribe's pieces. Doubtless there is some good fortune in this; there is the good fortune of being selected by the most illustrious composers; but why was Scribe chosen? Because they knew that Scribe alone possessed the art of throwing into a 'book' that action and dramatic life without which the most potent charms of melody are scarcely tasted by a French audience.

It seems there is a symbolical meaning in the proverbial action of a theatrical manager, who, having no singers and yet anxious to initiate his patrons to the beauties of an opera in vogue, boldly suppressed the music. The audacious stroke was successful, for the 'book' was by Scribe.

The alliance—so rare among men!—of the fascinations of talents and the virtues of the soul reigned in Mons. Scribe with a seductive harmony which his very appearance, which his first glance, seemed to reveal. In his glance full of fire and gentleness, marked with ardent sympathy and a sort of timidity which was touching in a man of his fame, one seemed to discover the effulgence of all the distinctions of this rare life wholly dedicated to labor, to glory and to good deeds. With Mons. Scribe the man was so equal to the writer that in studying his works I have been unable to separate this double character in him. In recalling what he wrote I have told you what he was. His fortunate literary copartners, some of whom were his worthy rivals and his worthy colleagues, all remained his friends, to prove that his thoughtful kindness, his integrity, his delicacy to his literary brethren were not relegated as dead letters to the fictions of the stage. He liked, in the world as well as upon the stage, to invest the realities of life with all the poetical coloring that reason and truth would warrant. So far as one may penetrate the secret of his private life—one of whose merits and good fortune it was to be obscure—this delicate turn of his thought was visible in all his tastes and all his habits, in the freshness of his youthful souvenirs, in the graceful arrangement of that beloved retreat to which his souvenirs had guided him, and especially in the choice of her whom he associated with his destiny by one of his most disinterested and happiest inspirations, of her who now honors his memory as much as she charmed his life. The same romantic grace garlanded the combinations and the mysteries of his inexhaustible benefactions. This wealth so often reproached to him—for it was allowed Scribe, ignorant as he was of envy, to be spared by it—this wealth so lawfully acquired would have embarrassed him had his hand, always filled by labors, not been open to charity. It was not enough to him to throw all his heart into his benefactions, he threw all his talents into them too. He delighted to play in real life the part of that fictive providence which in the enchantments of his theatre suddenly brings to misfortune its unexpected consolation and to merit its unlooked for reward. Some of the most touching instances of this ingenuous charity are now familiar to everybody. The greater number remain the secret of them who received it; I know, an ill-kept secret by many of them. I shall not betray it. 'Tis to pay pious homage to Scribe's memory to respect the generous veils with which he always covered his beneficence."

Chopin's Polonaises.

(From LESTER'S Life of CHOPIN, translated by MARTHA WALKER COOK.)

The primitive music of the Polonaise, of which we have no example of greater age than a century, possesses but little value for art. Those Polonaises which do not bear the names of their authors, but are frequently marked with the name of some hero, thus indicating their date, are generally grave and sweet. The Polonaise styled "de Kosciuszko," is the most universally known, and is so closely linked with the memories of his epoch, that we have known ladies who could not hear it without breaking into sobs. The Princess F. L., who had been loved by Kosciuszko, in her last days, when age had enfeebled all her faculties, was only sensible to the chords of this piece, which her trembling hands could still find upon the key-board, though the dim and aged eye could no longer see the keys. Some contemporary Polonaises are of a character so sad, that they might almost be supposed to accompany a funeral train.

The Polonaises of Count Oginski, which next appeared, soon attained great popularity through the introduction of an air of seductive languor into the melancholy strains. Full of bloom as they still are, they soothe by their delicious tenderness, by their naïve and mournful grace. The martial rhythm grows more feeble; the march of the stately train, no longer rustling in its pride of state, is hushed in reverential silence, in solemn thought, as if its course wound through graves, whose sad swells extinguish smiles and humiliate pride. Love alone survives, as the mourners wander among the mounds of earth so freshly heaped that the grass has not yet grown upon them, repeating the sad refrain which the Bard of Erin caught from the wild breezes of the sea:

"Love born of sorrow, like sorrow is true!"

In the well known pages of Oginski may be found the sighing of analogous thoughts: the very breath of love is sad, and only revealed through the melancholy lustre of eyes bathed in tears.

At a somewhat later state, the graves and grassy mounds were all passed, they are seen only in the distance of the shadowy background. The living cannot always weep; and animation again appears, mournful thoughts, changed into soothing memories, return on the ear, sweet as distant echoes. The saddened train of the living no longer hush their breath as they glide on with noiseless precaution, as if not to disturb the sleep of those who have just departed, over whose graves the turf is not yet green; the imagination no longer evokes only the gloomy shadows of the past. In the Polonaises of Lipinski we hear the music of the pleasure-loving heart once more beating joyously, giddily, happily, as it had done before the days of disaster and defeat. The melodies breathe more and more the perfume of happy youth; love, young love, sighs around. Expanding into expressive songs of vague and dreamy character, they speak but to youthful hearts, cradling them in poetic fictions, in soft illusions. No longer destined to cadence the steps of the high and grave personages who ceased to bear their part in these dances,* they are addressed to romantic imaginations, dreaming rather of rapture than renown. Mayseider advanced upon this descending path; his dances, full of lively coquetry, reflect only the magic charms of youth and beauty. His numerous imitations have inundated us with pieces of music, called Polonaises, but which have no characteristics to justify the name.

The pristine and vigorous brilliancy of the Polonaise was again suddenly given to it by a composer of true genius. Weber made of it a Dithyrambic, in which the glittering display of vanished magnificence again appeared in its ancient glory. He united all the resources of his art to ennoble the formula which had been so misrepresented and debased, to fill it with the spirit of the past; not seeking to recall the character of ancient music, he transported into music the characteristics of ancient Poland. Using the melody as a recital, he accentuated the rhythm, he colored his composition, through his modulations, with a profusion of hues not only suitable to his subject, but imperiously demanded by it. Life, warmth, and passion again circulated in his Polonaises, yet he did not deprive them of the haughty charm, the ceremonious and magisterial dignity, the natural yet elaborate majesty, which are essential parts of their character. The cadences are marked by chords, which fall upon the ear like the rattling of swords from their scabbards. The soft, warm, effeminate pleadings of love give place to the murmuring of deep, full, bass voices, proceeding from manly breasts used to command; we may almost hear, in reply, the wild and distant neighing of the steeds of the desert, as they toss the long manes around their haughty heads, impatiently pawing the ground, with their lustrous eye beaming with intelligence and full of fire, while they bear with stately grace the trailing caparisons embroidered with turquoise and rubies, with which the Polish Seigneurs loved to adorn them. How did Weber divine the Poland of other days? Had he indeed the power to call from the grave of the past, the scenes which we have just contemplated, that he was thus able to clothe them with life, to renew their early associations? Vain questions! Genius is always endowed with its own sacred intuitions! Poetry ever reveals to her chosen the secrets of her wild domain!

All the poetry contained in the Polonaises had, like a rich sap, been so fully expressed from them by the genius of Weber, they had been handled with a mastery so absolute, that it was, indeed, a dangerous and difficult thing to attempt them, with the slightest hope of producing the same effect. He has, however, been surpassed in this species of composition by Chopin, not only in the number and variety of works in this style, but also in the more touching character of the handling, and the new and varied processes of harmony. Both in construction and spirit, Chopin's Polonaise in A, with the one in A flat Major, resembles very much the one of Weber's in E Major. In others he relinquished this broad style: shall we say always with a more decided success? In such a question, decision were a thorny thing. Who shall restrict the rights of a poet over the various phases of his subject? Even in the midst of joy, may he not be permitted to be gloomy and oppressed? After having chanted the splendor of glory, may he not sing of grief? After having rejoiced with the victorious, may he not mourn with the vanquished? We may, without any fear of contradiction, assert, that it is not one of the least merits of Chopin, that he has, consecutively, embraced all the phases of which the theme is susceptible, that he has succeeded in eliciting from it all its brilliancy, in awakening from it all its sadness. The variety of the moods of feeling to which he was himself subject, aided him in the reproduction and comprehension of such a multiplicity of views. It would be impossible to follow the varied transformations occurring in these compositions, with their pervading melancholy, without admiring the fecundity of his creative force, even when not fully sustained by the higher powers of his inspiration. He did not always confine himself to the consideration of the pictures presented to him by his imagination and memory, taken en masse, or as a united whole. More than once, while contemplating the brilliant groups and throngs flowing on before him, has he yielded to the strange charm of some isolated figure, arresting in its course by the magic of his gaze, and, suffering the gay crowds to pass on, he has given himself up with delight to the divination of its mystic revelations, while he continued to weave his incantations and spells only for the entranced Sybil of his song.

His Grand Polonaise in F sharp Minor, must be ranked among his most energetic compositions. He has inserted in it a Mazourka. Had he not frightened the frivolous world of fashionable life, by the gloomy grotesqueness with which he introduced it in an incantation so fantastic, this mode might have become an ingenious caprice for the ball-room. It is a most original production, exciting us like the recital of some broken dream, made, after a night of restlessness, by the first dull, gray, cold, leaden rays of a winter's sunrise. It is a dream-poem, in which the impressions and objects succeed each other with startling incoherency and with the wildest transitions, reminding us of what Byron says in his "Dream:"

"... Dreams in their development have breath,
And tears, and tortures, and the touch of joy;
They leave a weight upon our waking thought,

And look like heralds of Eternity."

The principal motive is a weird air, dark as the lurid hour which precedes a hurricane, in which we catch the fierce exclamations of exasperation, mingled with a bold defiance, recklessly hurled at the stormy elements. The prolonged return of a tonic, at the commencement of each measure, reminds us of the repeated roar of artillery—as if we caught the sounds from some dread battle waging in the distance. After the termination of this note, a series of the most unusual chords are unrolled through measure after measure. We know nothing analogous to the striking effect produced by this in the compositions of the greatest masters. This passage is suddenly interrupted by a Scène Champêtre, a Mazourka in the style of an Idyl, full of the perfume of lavender and sweet marjoram; but which, far from effacing the memory of the profound sorrow which had before been awakened, only augments, by its ironical and bitter contrast, our emotions of pain to such a degree, that we feel almost solaced when the first phrase returns; and, free from the disturbing contradiction of a naïve, simple, and inglorious happiness, we may again sympathize with the noble and imposing woe of a high, yet fatal struggle. This improvisation terminates like a dream, without other conclusion than a convulsive shudder; leaving the soul under the strangest, the wildest, the most subduing impressions.

The "Polonaise-Fantaisie" is to be classed among the works which belong to the latest period of Chopin's compositions, which are all more or less marked by a feverish and restless anxiety.—No bold and brilliant pictures are to be found in it; the loud tramp of a cavalry accustomed to victory is no longer heard; no more resound the heroic chants muffled by no visions of defeat—the bold tones suited to the audacity of those who were always victorious. A deep melancholy—ever broken by startled movements, by sudden alarms, by disturbed rest, by stifled sighs—reigns throughout. We are surrounded by such scenes and feelings as might arise among those who had been surprised and encompassed on all sides by an ambuscade, the vast sweep of whose horizon reveals not a single ground for hope, and whose despair had giddied the brain, like a draught of that wine of Cyprus which gives a more instinctive rapidity to all our gestures, a keener point to all our words, a more subtle flame to all our emotions, and excites the mind to a pitch of irritability approaching insanity.

Such pictures possess but little real value for art. Like all descriptions of moments of extremity, of agonies, of death rattles, of contractions of the muscles where all elasticity is lost, where the nerves, ceasing to be the organs of the human will, reduce man to a passive victim of despair; they only serve to torture the soul. Deplorable visions, which the artist should admit with extreme circumspection within the graceful circle of his charmed realm!

Handel and Haydn Society, Boston.

SECRETARY'S REPORT, MAY 25th, 1863.

Mr. President:

No very important results have been realized from the labors of the society, during the past season, beyond those usually attained during an ordinary concert season. Consequently there is but little for your Secretary to do but to state, in plain and simple language, the number of public performances given, and the general success of the same, with such other information pertaining thereto as may suggest itself.

The first work of the season just closed, which the Society engaged in, was in giving a concert in connection with the several Military Bands of the city, and other artists, all of whom volunteered their services for the occasion, for the benefit of the 41st Regiment of volunteers, and which was also understood to be in compliment to our late President, the gallant commander of the Regiment: Col. Thos. E. Chickering. The society was enabled through this means to pass over for the benefit of that Regiment the liberal sum of Five Hundred Dollars; which, we have no question, has been judiciously expended for the comfort of the men under Col. Chickering's command.

Our usual Christmas Oratorio, "The Messiah," was given in a very creditable manner, and proved to be, pecuniarily, highly successful. From this time until the 15th March our weekly rehearsals were devoted almost exclusively to the study of Mendelssohn's "Elijah," when it was given to a full house, with extra vocal assistants, and in all respects in a superior manner. It was repeated with the same cast, one week from the time of the first performance, and resulted in a loss to the society of some Two Hundred and Fifty Dollars. Comment, considering the nature of the work, and the manner in which it was produced, is unnecessary.

Very few, with the exception of those immediately interested, know the labor of preparing a great work like the "Elijah," for performance. It is a labor of weeks for those even, who have been familiar with it for years, and who have assisted in its performance; and for those who take it up for the first time, it is a labor of as many months; but all feel a satisfaction in devoting the time necessary for a perfect representation of a work of this magnitude; for who can listen to the sweetly flowing melodies, the expressive recitatives, the majestic choruses interlaced and encircled with orchestral harmonies of the richest tints of tone-color, like the chaste and beautiful setting around some precious stone, and not have the conviction forced upon him that the mind that conceived, and the hand that executed, must have been guided and directed by an overruling power?

Such, to my mind, is Mendelssohn, as exemplified in his "Elijah," and I am sure that no one can attentively follow the windings of his wonderful harmonies, and feel that the picture is overdrawn, or too highly colored. On us is devolved the responsibility of adequately producing these great works.

No other similar society exists among us, and there is no necessity for the formation of one; but the Handel and Haydn Society, though by far the largest, and most effective choral society in the country, is, nevertheless, defective in many important requisites for a perfect rendering of works of this class; and as we should strive to remedy all existing defects in a more perfect organization of our chorus with particular reference to a better balance of parts, and a more constant attendance at rehearsals on the part of each and every member; so we should reasonably expect, as we should then deserve, the public patronage in a corresponding degree.

A serious drawback to a perfect performance of any oratorio is found in the too prevalent custom of many members absenting themselves from rehearsals, on the plea that there is no particular necessity of their rehearsing; as they are thoroughly acquainted with the whole thing, have sung it for years, and can sing every note without rehearsal. To all such let it be said, that when mistakes do occur, they are readily traceable to those persons who are so perfectly acquainted with all the difficulties of the composition as to require no rehearsal; and until some remedy can be found to relieve the society from this incubus, occasional defects will be observable. An attempt was made during the past season to secure better attendance at rehearsals, by a frequent calling of the roll, which resulted in the discharge from the society of seven members, who had proverbially been absent from rehearsals, the receipt of a large mail of excuses from sick and disabled, and a much fuller attendance on each evening of the roll-call. Unless some more simple mode can be adopted, it may become necessary hereafter to resort to the calling of the roll at every meeting.

The erection of the Great Organ in the Music Hall, one of the largest and finest instruments ever built, immeasurably superior, without doubt, to anything of the kind ever seen in this country, should be a sufficient incentive to all lovers of the Oratorio to come forward and assist in augmenting the ranks of the society up to the number of Four Hundred, at least, thereby enabling the society to secure a more perfect balance of the four choirs than has ever yet been attainable, and to fitly render the massive double and single choruses of Handel and Mendelssohn, with the powerful Organ referred to. The taste of the musical public would very soon be educated up to a full appreciation of the immense effects, nowhere else to be found in the whole range of musical composition, which would thereby be developed.

Being fully alive to the pecuniary embarrassments of the society, and believing that the time has now arrived when an effort should be made for securing a fund, so often alluded to by your Secretary in his former reports, and so often discussed in meetings of the Board without coming to any definite conclusion as to the best mode to be adopted to secure the desired object; your Board of Trustees, at a recent meeting, voted to make an appeal to the friends of the society, and the public at large, for aid in establishing a fund, to be permanently invested; the proceeds to be expended in giving to the public, each season, such works as in their judgment may best tend towards elevating and cultivating a taste for the higher order of sacred compositions. Should this much desired object be accomplished, it will enable us to institute a series of Musical Festivals, combining all the choral force of the large cities and towns in the immediate neighborhood of Boston, in addition to our own, in one great choir, after the manner of similar periodical gatherings in London, Birmingham and other places in England; and in imitation also of the great Festival held in Boston by the Handel and Haydn Society in 1857, with this difference only, that the choir at that time numbered six hundred only, whereas with our present facilities a chorus of twice that number might easily be gathered. The material is at hand, but funds are necessary to carry out plans of this magnitude, and, which cannot fail of perfect success, if properly managed.

The fiftieth anniversary of the formation of the Society occurs two years from this time, when a festival should be given, and long months of preparation must be devoted to it in order to insure success. To stand still is to be left behind; for while all the world is pushing along, they that were first will soon find themselves last, unless an effort be made in the direction in which the tide is setting; and as the Handel and Haydn Society has ever been first in the particular department of art chosen, so let it maintain that enviable position by every honorable means within our reach; and as time rolls on, the memory of those who gave to us this honored institution shall be held dear, and handed down to our successors as names indissolubly connected with the fortunes and fame of the Handel and Haydn Society. All of which is respectfully submitted.

LORING B. BARNES, Secretary.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, MAY 25.—The most interesting concert of the past two weeks was that given by Mr. CARL BERGMANN on Saturday evening last, at Irving Hall. The programme consisted almost exclusively of what old people call "future music"—that is, music by composers yet living, or not yet cold enough in their graves to have become "classic."

Liszt's "Faust" Symphony was the feature, performed here for the first time. The whole work is too "long drawn out," not always in "linked sweetness"; it consists of three movements, 1. Faust (Allegro). 2. Gretchen (Andante). 3. Mephistopheles (Scherzo and Finale). In programme music, one naturally expects to hear the poetic subject very clearly presented; but although Liszt has successfully embodied Mephisto in the closing movement, which is malicious, witty, diabolic with a will,—the musical Faust is uncharacterized—and as to Gretchen! Liszt brings her before us from the cradle to the grave, apparently, yet his Gretchen is but an insipid servant maid. The other orchestral numbers were Berlioz's fanciful "Carnaval Romain" overture, and the introduction to Wagner's "Lohengrin," which sounded knightly, pure, poetic, as it always does:

"Aus alten Mäahren winkt es Hervor mit weisser Hand."

Mr. MILLS played Schumann's A minor piano-forte Concerto—fine music! and finely rendered; also a transcription by Liszt from "Sonnambula," which proved Liszt's appreciation of what is fine in other composers. Mme. JOHANNSEN sang Schubert's song "Liebes-Cotschaft," and that Wanderlied by Schumann, which sounds as though Schumann had not written it.

If we may believe managerial assertions, the Italian company has closed its present season; and, to judge from appearances, with less success than the opening performances promised. Peri's "Judith" was announced, but not given.

Mme. VESTALI will open the Winter Garden to-night, for an operatic season, commencing with Gluck's "Orpheus," to be sung in English. If this great music is even tolerably well presented, it will indeed be something to hear; and as Vestali has recently had an opportunity to study Mme. Viardot-Garcia's wonderful performance of the part of "Orpheus," as well as the whole opera as produced under Berlioz's direction in Paris, we may hope to see some of the great points outlined, at least. Mme. ROTTER is to be the Euridice; Mr. ANSCHUTZ will conduct.

NEW YORK, MAY 26.—Musical matters are at present in a very spasmodic state, and the epidemic of Italian and English opera, "Anniversary Concerts," "Gottschalk Matinees," "Victory Symphonies," quite bewildering in its effect. MAX MARETZEK of the Italian Opera promised and gave six nights of opera, with an additional one thrown in as a gratuity. "Aroldo" and "Ione," with a fragment of "Rigoletto" at a matinee, were the attraction; but unfortunately the anniversaries and other matters combined made the week one of pecuniary loss to the manager and caused him to withdraw for a temporary breathing spell. Signor BELLINI, the popular and meritorious baritone of the troupe, took a benefit at a matinee on Saturday, when Petrella's "Ione" was given to a large and brilliant audience. It is pretty well known that when Mme. MEDORI returns from the settlement of her family affairs in Belgium, the Maretzek troupe, thus re-enforced, will go into action again, and the news will be doubly welcome when Max announces the revival of "Ione". It is certainly one of the richest, most original and meritorious works that has been brought out at the Academy for a long time, and if Medori could have remained with the company until the close of the season it would have drawn the same magnificent houses that "Norma" did.

Maretzek is still planning, and his generalship, as evinced in the past campaign, is undoubted. With the return of the legions from the watering-places, and the arrival of cool and enjoyable weather in the fall, Maretzek will astonish the public with something that cannot fail to pay them and him.

Irving Hall, second in importance to the Academy, has been the theatre of great musical events.—THEO. THOMAS's concert and performance of "Harold in Italy" has already received a review from the pen of a correspondent. GOTTSCHALK has been revelling in all his brilliancy and fascination, and, with Sanderson, Miss Krowlikowska, Mlle. Barnetche, Mr. Castle, Campbell and the Bretton children, has been giving concerts and matinees without number. Miss KROWLIKOWSKA and Miss BARNETCHE have also given concerts and all have been quite successful. On Saturday evening last CARL BERGMANN gave a concert and introduced Liszt's "Faust" Symphony. This was the first performance of this composition in America, and, judging from the universal on-dit, its repetition will not be solicited save from mere curiosity. It is divided into three parts :

1. Faust (Allegro)
2. Gretchen (Andante.)
3. Mephistopheles (Scherzo and Finale.)

Even the most enthusiastic of the German school pronounced it wild, disjointed, unsatisfactory. A succession of broken, angular sounds; a sort of chaotic mass, no melody distinguishable; a labored seeking but never finding—in fact bewildering and beyond description. How much sweeter and how charming was the Schumann Concerto in A minor, and Wagner's "Lohengrin" with Berlioz's "Carneval Romain" as a finale! Mme. JOHANNSEN sang a couple of happy German songs: "Liebesbotschaft" by Fr. Schubert, and "Wanderlied" by Schumann; and S. B. MILLS played a fantasia on "Sonnambula", and in the Schumann Concerto.

GOLDBECK repeated his "Victory and Peace" Symphony at the Academy, on Tuesday evening.

Last night, Mlle. VESTVALI inaugurated a season of opera at Winter Garden, the scene of her former success. Gluck's "Orpheus," an English translation of the libretto—was the announcement for the evening, with Mlle. Vestvali as Orpheus; Mme. Rotter, Euridice; Miss Geary, the Goddess of Love; Miss Kemple, Hymen; Miss Drome, a Blessed Spirit; and Mr. Fouche, Pluto; with a corps of assistants in the shape of nymphs, spectres, furies, demons, spirits, &c. A glance at the cast will lead to the correct supposition that Mlle. Vestvali and Mme. Rotter have the fate of the opera resting upon them. Such is the fact. The first three acts depend solely upon the vocal and dramatic success of Mlle. Vestvali. The music of the opera is very pleasing, the general nature of it sad and plaintive. The mise en scene is very creditable, and, although it is a matter of considerable doubt as to its meeting with the success here it did in Paris, yet it will be attractive for a number of representations. Mlle. Vestvali looks as beautiful as ever and still may claim the favored title "Vestvali the Magnificent".

PROVIDENCE, R. I., May 25.—As I see but little in your Journal in regard to musical matters in this town, I take the liberty of sending you the enclosed programme of a "Musical" given by the "Orpheus Club" (a male chorus) at the Piano Ware Rooms of Messrs. Henry Baker & Sons, for the gratification of their particular friends. Everything passed off pleasantly and to the satisfaction of all present.

Part I.

1. Overture to "Jean de Paris".....Boieldieu
Two Piano, Eight Hands.
2. Chorus. "Praise of the Soldier".....Boieldieu
Orpheus Club.
3. Chorus. "Two Roses".....Werner
Orpheus Club.
4. Solo—Piano. "Variations" on March "Il Pavitani".....Hurs
5. Chorus. "Artillerist's Oath".....Adam
Orpheus Club.

Part II.

1. Trio—Piano. "Airs from Mozart's Operas".....Cserny
One Piano, Six Hands.
2. Solo and Chorus. "Image of the Rose".....Reichardt
Orpheus Club.
3. Chorus. "Rhine Wine Song".....Zollner
Orpheus Club.
4. Duet—Piano. "Airs from Norma".....Schubert
5. Chorus—March.....Becker
Orpheus Club.

The lady pianists played creditably to themselves, and the Club sang in a manner which showed that they were interested in their work, and that they had practised diligently to acquire the proficiency which they manifested in their performance.

We hope to be able, ere long, to claim for Providence as fine a male chorus as their name-sake in Boston, and they have certainly made a good beginning; although mostly amateurs, they have several of the best professional musicians in the state, (both vocal and instrumental) among their numbers; and have voices ranging from the highest tenors to the bassi-profundi; being able to sing music of more than 3 octaves in compass.

As to musical matters generally, but little can be said for this place; concerts are not very numerous here; occasionally we have a visit from some celebrated artist, and then a long time passes without anything to stir the musical public, the generality of whom do not appreciate anything much better than a "nigger concert." Would that something could be done to elevate the musical taste in this place, for it is decidedly below par.

We have a few good choirs; and are afforded an opportunity almost every sabbath, of hearing some one of those fine old English Cathedral services, by the choir of the Grace Church (Bishop Clarke). This choir consists of about 30 singers, and is under the direction of Mr. L. T. DOWNES, who gives us by far the best church music we have ever had in the city.

Hoping for better times (musically), I remain yours, respectfully,

N. E. D.

A Letter from Timothy Trill.

My dear Journal:

I believe I do not often trouble your columns with my remarks, not half so often as I would like to, were it not for other duties—but now and then steam accumulates, and an escape at the safety valve of one's intellectual being is healthy.

My text on the present instance is a very grand choral service at Trinity Church, New York, on Ascension day, May 15th, by a reinforced choir of 60 boys and men, composed of the regular choir of the church, that of Mr. Frank Gilder of St. George's Church, Flushing, and a number of stragglers from other quartets. The service was at eleven o'clock, A.M., and long before that hour there could hardly be obtained standing room in the vast edifice, so thronged was it, despite the rainy weather.

After a voluntary by Mr. Henry S. Cutler, the organist of the Church, (an improvisation, by the way, which did him great credit), the clergy and choristers defiled from the robing-room doors into the chancel, all in their milk-white surplices, which, reflecting the light of the brilliant candelabra, presented a most impressive picture, and one which strongly contrasted with the murky state of atmosphere out of doors.

To make a very homely, but perhaps pardonable comparison, the two sides of the crowded chancel where the clergy and choir sat, looked like two huge musical snow-banks, and I hope the reader will not be pierced with "a cold shiver of delight" at the thought, as Charles Lamb says! However that may be, it certainly was one of the most beautiful sights imaginable, viewed from the organ-gallery, and was a fit precursor to the beautiful sounds which were to follow.

The Venite Exultemus Domino, sung to a Gregorian tone in unison, and of course, antiphonally, Mr. Cutler keeping up an interesting though not always felicitous change of harmony during each verse, until the Gloria Patri, when the voices branched out into full parts and the organ formed a glorious foundation for the entire musical structure. The effect of this immensely powerful choir was irresistible. It was actually more noble than I have ever heard from choruses of mixed voices, two and three hundred strong, and made me long to hear Handel's or Mendelssohn's choruses sung in such a manner and by such material, but quadrupled numerically.

The service consisted of Nares's popular but effective Te Deum and Jubilate in F, sung with great accuracy and an ensemble truly surprising. They also performed Cutler's Anthem to Psalm XLVII, verses 5 and 6, "God is gone up with a merry noise and the Lord with the sound of the trumpet," all done in the same careful manner. The verse passages were sustained by Masters Hopkins, Ehrlich, and Grandin, the first being no relation however of the Vermont tribe by the same name. A tenor solo was also sung in pure choral style (which is saying a good deal now-a-days) by Mr. Sam. D. Mayer, an amateur, but who should rather be called an amateur artist.

This was the most successful trial yet made here of the effect of a purely male chorus on so grand a scale, where the soprano and alto parts were sustained by boys alone, and it has equalled the most sanguine expectations of all.

Great credit is due Messrs. Cutler and Gilder; especially the latter, he living in a small country town, and having struggled against the petty jealousies and old-womanish antipathies to anything like "popery" which are always rife in such cess-pools of artistic ambitions; besides which, both these gentlemen have had to furnish means for bringing about so fine an exhibition of the possibilities of boyish capacity.

Our New York dilettanti are gradually becoming reconciled to boy choirs.

Truly yours,

TIMOTHY TRILL.

Schumann's "Paradise and the Peri."

The romantic element in musical art has perhaps no finer illustrations than three modern works, which, differing essentially from one another, are equally worthy to be called exquisite imaginative creations. Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music, Weber's fairy opera "Oberon," and Schumann's Cantata, for orchestra and voices, for which Moore's poem "Paradise and the Peri" furnishes the poetic theme and text. All three are works of genius; "Oberon" perhaps having the best claim to be considered the most genial of the three. Those of our readers with whom we shared the pleasure lately of hearing the "Peri" sung by Mr. Parker's club of amateurs, will scarcely wonder at our naming it in such great company. To the unprejudiced and best informed in German music, it can need no justification. But Schumann is so much a mooted question, and many music-lovers, otherwise appreciative, find him so hard a dose to swallow,—partly, no doubt, because he is so unequal in his works, being sickly and obscure in some, as he is clear and strong and heavenly in others,—that we feel it a duty to those who furnished and those who enjoyed the recent feast, to note it with a broader mark than we have yet had opportunity to do. We would fain try at least to set down some of the characteristic traits and beauties of the Cantata in detail and in order.

We are the more moved to do this, because once we copied, by way of specimen of bigoted English anti-Schumannism, some of the cross things which the critics (of the Musical World, Athenæum, &c.) wrote on the morning after its first production in London (in 1856), when Mme. Jenny Lind Goldschmidt sang the part of the Peri, and Sterndale Bennett conducted. A few sentences picked out from their columns full of ravings will read curiously here. For instance:

"Mme. Goldschmidt's singing was entirely thrown away, the music being everywhere unvocal, and scarcely anywhere interesting." (The great song-tress doubtless would agree that it was thrown away upon such critics, but not with the rest of the statement.)

"In short, a more dreary concert was never listened to at the Philharmonic."

"Judged by the standard of the great writers, it can hardly be considered music at all." . . . "There is no melody, no form—nothing that 'appeals' to the ear—nothing that touches the heart."

"Dr. Schumann, in short, is not possessed of that musical organization, without which all the talent and ingenuity in the world avail nothing. He has mind—but his mind is not musical. He has power, but he lacks the instinct for music. He produces by some mysterious rule of his own; but nothing he does springs naturally from the heart."

"It was sad to listen to the efforts of Mme. Goldschmidt Lind and her associates—so clever, intelligent and zealous—to give life to music which has no more spark of vitality than a corpse."

And so on through all the symptoms of the raving epidemic, which prevails in certain quarters, and especially in England, "Anti-Schumannism." It is safe to say, however, that in most musical circles the disease has long since materially abated, and seems to be giving place to a hearty, wholesome admiration, none the less warm because qualified in some respects. The conviction, which places Schumann as a musical genius more nearly on a level with Schubert, Mendelssohn, Weber, &c., than with any lesser names, certainly gains ground, and just in proportion to the more intimate acquaintance with his works—that is, with the works which best represent him. Yet still we hear repeated these wholesale denials. For you he has "no form," because his forms are not always those in which all your ideas of music have been moulded; "no melody," because his melodies wear not a close family resemblance with the darlings of your memory and fond associations; nothing that "appeals" to the ear, because your ear is obstinately otherwise accustomed, and keeps listening for what it does not hear, regardless of what it does; nothing that "touches the heart," because your heart is set too exclusively upon its idols, and against whatever can come out of Nazareth; and this being the case, no wonder that nothing he does appears to you to "spring from his heart"; no wonder, either, that the habit so tyrannical in you should deny the "instinct" so original and free in him. Now in proof that Schumann had the musical instinct, so fine and sure that he could find the latent music in a poem and transmute the poem into music; that he has melody, both exquisite and tender, such as springs from the heart and goes to the heart, melody from a right original, exhaustless vein too; that there is life, "vitality" in his music, such as we commonly ascribe to artistic or poetic inspiration, such as quickens and inspires; and "form" too, such as easily and fitly clothes that life, form not unsymmetrical, and logically developing out of a germ or motive; in short that he holds the keys that unlock some of the most interesting chambers in the divine wonder-world of music sealed up in the hearts and the imaginations of us all—we propose to examine this very "Paradise and the Peri," which not even Jenny Lind could save from being "dreary" to the Philharmonic conservatives in London.

We are too well aware, from plenty of experience in such attempts, of the difficulty, in most cases the impossibility, of giving anything like a clear and satisfactory idea of such a composition by any description in words. Our own conception of it, even, must lack color and completeness, from the fact that our studies of it have been made merely from the voice parts with piano-forte accompaniment, we having heard it only once performed with orchestra, and that more than two years ago. Then again our means of conveying any notion of many an important passage are sadly limited by the inability to adduce it here in musical notation. Yet we indulge the hope that, while we are pretty certain to convince the reader of the rashness of our undertaking, we may at the same time succeed in conveying, here and there at least, such inklings of our meaning as shall lead him to suspect that there is really some rare charm in the music that could so prompt us and almost compel us to run such a risk.

We take it for granted, reader, that you know Moore's poem. And, if you think of it, you must see at a glance how admirably it lends itself to musical treatment, how noble and spiritual a subject it offers the composer; what room for many shades and contrasts of emotion, sad, heroic, timid, tender, hopeful, joyful, all tending upward to pure heavenly triumph; for play of fancy in the story of spirits beautiful and free as air, yet human; for wealth of color and of imagery in the warm luxury of Oriental scenery and atmosphere and fable; what chance too for dramatic episode and climax. No one can doubt it after hearing Schumann's music. It was the right poetry for him, at all events; not that he had not in him a musical vein as well for other poetry and other subjects. But this one touched the musical springs in him as naturally and truly as Shakespeare's fairies did in the young Felix, or the wonder-horn of Oberon in Weber. Moreover Schumann was himself poet enough to make his text conform more perfectly to the musical conditions, here by wise abridgement, there by the insertion of new verses quite in keeping with the rest.

The three gifts which the Peri bears to Eden's gate, in hope to gain admittance there, naturally suggested the larger divisions of the Cantata, which contains 26 musical numbers. But it must be remarked, as a peculiar structural feature of the work, that these numbers run without pause or period into one another. Only at the end of each of the three Parts does the movement actually stop; one or two pieces only in the whole work are separable from the rest, so as to form wholes in themselves. In each Part it is a continuous flow from the first measure to the last, the transition from one piece into another being beautifully and almost imperceptibly achieved by means of commonly a few chords of most ingenious and poetic modulation. To some ears this method may be ungrateful; they may crave the frequent point of rest; and this is probably a good part of what the English critics meant by want of melody and form. At the worst it is but the difference of the unrolling panorama from a series of detached pictures, each in its own frame. There is this in favor of this continuous form, that it accepts itself from the poem; the music runs along with that, contentedly and loyally, not parting with its own nature in the least, or violating any unity of music. And is there not a charm in this continuous web? We like to see the story weave itself all out before us, not knowing where a thread is dropped, nor noting new beginnings; it can have as many colors as Joseph's coat, and yet be woven of one piece; in fact this is the way that Nature weaves, and by this very continuity she fascinates us and keeps up our interest in her. And this is one of the secrets which Art learns of Nature. In Schumann here it likes us well; continually the music moves, fresh images emerging in clear outline, each so gracefully succeeding, that you feel no lack of alternation or repose. It is pleasant to have the melodies take you up and leave you, without announcement or leave taking, like chance companions on a journey, not even claiming separate remembrance. But to our task—a formidable one—twenty six musical numbers or pieces waiting to be registered.

1. Andante, an instrumental symphony or prelude of some little length. In the opening phrase, first breathed or sighed out by a single instrument, then woven as a motive into the whole harmonic web, mark with how sure an "instinct" Schumann has caught the tune, the musical throb, as it were, of the poem and the subject; just as Beethoven in that little phrase that steals in leading after it the whole first movement of the Pastoral Symphony, has caught the very tune of summer in the fields. This little phrase is pensive, sad and full of longing. It reveals the sense of loneliness and exile within hearing of the heavenly harmonies. A beautiful spirit is this that longingly listens at the gate; an earnest spirit, that will fly through the universe to do the penance, or to find the gift whereby she may rejoin her pure and happy sister spirits.—This instrumental Andante sets the poetic key of the entire Cantata; out of its little motive naturally develops all that follows. It is characterized by a deep tenderness of feeling, and a certain ethereal fineness, with a touch of somewhat mystical in the more involved middle portion where a new subject enters. But it comes back to the first one, lending to the phrase this time the new charm of a certain smile of hope; and thus it feelingly and gracefully preludes to a few lines of Alto solo:

One morn a Peri at the gate
Of Eden stood, disconsolate;
And as she listen'd to the springs
Of Life within, like music flowing,
And caught the light upon her wings
Thro' the half-open portal glowing,
She wept to think her recreant race
Should e'er have lost the glorious place!

What the Alto sings, beautiful as it is, is not a melody, so much as a sort of recitative cantabile. The pensive figure of the prelude steals in again after the utterance of the first two lines; then a pause, filled by mysterious tremolo of strings, while the voice, listening "to the springs of Life within", forgets its sadness in a few excited, rapturous utterances; then, where the Peri thinks of the doom of "her recreant race", droops to a close through a retarded, thoughtful phrase, in which you recognize essentially, though somewhat modified, the pensive little motive of the prelude.

2. So far it has been narrative. By a single dominant chord, on which the recitative ends, we are in a beautiful, strange key, surprised by the Peri's song. A most lovely song it is, the melody full of longing, of rapture and regret, with a fluttering accompaniment (for her heart beats quick), and a delicious strangeness in the harmony, the key playing in opaline colors between minor and major, and the time accelerating with her excitement, as she goes on picturing to herself:

How happy the spirits who wander there,
Mid flowers that never shall fade or fall!

To what a pitch of earnest eloquence the strain rises, (a strain of which we shall be again reminded in her final song of triumph), as she sings:

Though mine are the gardens of earth and sea,
And the stars themselves have flowers for me,
One blossom of Heaven outblooms them all!

And still more earnest and emphatic, where the voice climbs through an octave of accented notes, each strengthened with full harmony, as if striving to embrace the idea of illimitable space and splendor, at the words here italicized:

Go, wing thy flight from star to star
From world to luminous world, as fur
As the universe spreads its flaming wall:
Take all the pleasures of all the spheres,
And multiply each through endless years—
One minute of Heaven is worth them all!

Indeed she is a beautiful, true-hearted, earnest Peri; she loves the things of earth too little to be kept long out of her true home above; aspiration, pure, sleepless, uncontainable breathes in this exquisite, this unique song. The Peri claims your fullest interest and sympathy from this moment.

3. A short tenor recitative, (that original motive phrase of the prelude filling the pauses again, tells how the "glorious Angel" who keeps the gates, hears her and drops a tear. Henceforth all the connecting bits of narrative are given to the tenor. Upon the last chord (dominant seventh in E) two flutes suddenly strike in above with D and E, filling out the measure with a strange sense of expectancy, commanding silence while the Angel speaks (an Alto voice), deliberate and grave, with crystal clear aerial chords pulsing in triplets, though the melody keeps on in steady two-fold measure. This heavenly announcement, relieving musically what has gone before by perfect contrast, sets before us the shining goal to which the whole is tending.

4. Quick, eager, broken phrases in the orchestra, as the Peri exclaims: "Where shall I find this gift?" Then gradually retarded, by a subtle modulation, the key (A major) settles down into A flat major, and a broad, luxurious melody succeeds, reinforced by clarinet and fagotto in thirds, while for bass the viola runs rippling and semi-quavering along in constant rapid alternation between the tonic and the tone below, the figure now and then for just an instant overleaping this contented liquid level, as she counts over in thought the rare things that she knows, the "Isles of Perfume", the "jewelled cup" of the king of the Geni "with life's elixir sparkling high", &c. But the strain murmurs itself away, and gives place to a sequence of serious, thoughtful phrases, of which the echo lingers in the instruments, as the question occurs: "But does Heaven want such gifts?"

Where was there e'er a gem that shone
Like the steps of ALMA's wonderful Throne?
And the Drops of Life—oh! what would they be
In the boundless Deep of Eternity?

5. The key brightens into the sunshine of F major, as the time quickens and the measure broadens, and the Tenor recites:

While thus she mus'd, her pinions fann'd
The air of that sweet Indian land.

Then a quartet of mixed voices take up the strain, and launch forth into a rapturous contemplation of the beauty of the scene,

Where palms breathe in whispers light,
Where glitters the starry night—
Whose air is balm; whose ocean spreads
O'er coral rocks, and amber beds;
Whose mountains, pregnant by the beam
Of the warm sun, with diamonds teem;
Whose rivulets are like rich brides,
Lovely, with gold beneath their tides;
Whose sandal groves and bowers of spice—
Oh Paradise!

A buoyant, sunny, clear and happy piece of harmony, as serene and sweet as the most perfect of June days. As seeming endless, but alas! as short! "O Paradise!" the voices linger on the exclamation; but even now the ground begins to tremble, the harmony grows dark and threatening; this peaceful air is even now disturbed with war's alarms, and swells of death; these streams are red with blood.—But our types are inexorable, and we must break off for the present, before even reaching the stirring and dramatic climax and conclusion of the first Part. We shall take up the thread again next week, with the hope of going through, with more concise speed, to the end.

Music in Boston.

With the two concerts, which we must now briefly notice, we suppose our musical season may be considered fairly closed.

1. Mlle. CAMILLA URSO had a good farewell benefit at Chickering's Hall, on Wednesday evening of last week. The audience were numerous, refined, enthusiastic, and the music all good of its kind, and mostly good in kind. This was the selection:

1. Grand Duo Brilliant, Piano and Violin. La Muette de Portici..... Wolff and De Beriot
Mlle. Camilla Urso and Mr. B. J. Lang.
2. Spring Song..... Mendelssohn
Miss J. E. Houston.
3. Andante and Rondo Russe. Violin..... De Beriot
Mlle. Camilla Urso.
4. { a. Prelude in E minor..... Mendelssohn
b. Fugue in E minor..... Handel
Mr. B. J. Lang.
5. Reverie, Violin..... Vieuxtemps
Mlle. Camilla Urso.
1. "Oh! weel I mind the days..... Scotch Song
Miss J. E. Houston.
2. Elegie. Violin..... Ernst
Mlle. Camilla Urso.
3. Rondo Capriccio, op. 44..... Mendelssohn
Mr. B. J. Lang.
4. Slumber Song..... Kucken
Miss J. E. Houston.
5. Grand Duo, Piano and Violin, William Tell.
Osborne and De Beriot
Mlle. Camilla Urso and Mr. B. J. Lang.

The serious young face of Camilla looked uncommonly radiant, and she exerted all the fine witchery of her art triumphantly as usual. The Elegie by Ernst we do not remember to have heard played by her before; she rendered it with true feeling and expression. Mr. LANG's aid was most efficient in the brilliant Duos; and he made admirable choice in the three pieces which he interpreted alone. The Mendelssohn Prelude and the Handel fugue were particularly welcome once more; and both these and the Rondo Capriccio were artistically played. Miss Houston gave much pleasure by her songs. The "Spring Song" of Mendelssohn was a particularly good choice, and Mr. CARL MAYER left nothing wanting in the rich accompaniment. There were eager calls for repetition after several pieces; but the artists showed more good sense than the public, in politely declining to repeat in every instance. Hearers, in their desire to prolong a momentary pleasure, forget how easily they take the life out of a programme thereby, making the whole concert tedious. The repetition of a piece too often spoils three or four pieces that come after it; the appetite for them is gone. Sometimes, however, it is safe to arrange a programme with pre-allowance for "imperative encore."

Mlle. URSO has gone on a short artistic visit to the British provinces, after which she will sail for Europe, having accepted engagements for the summer in England. It is her purpose to visit the Continent also, and hear and learn as much good music as possible for several years to come, and then return to us with a rich repertoire of classical as well as merely concert music. May success attend her!

2. MR. THOMAS RYAN, whose labors in the cause of classical music, in connection with the Mendelssohn Quintette Club from the very birth thereof, as well as with all our orchestras, and with hosts of pupils, have so identified him with the musical life of Boston, and the country round, had an interesting benefit concert at Chickering's last Saturday evening. The gathering of his friends, both from the city and the suburbs, was quite large. The stage was tastefully adorned with flowers by some fair hands, together with a fine bust of Mendelssohn wreathed with ivy. The programme consisted of choice favorite pieces, all well played or sung.

- 1—Quintet in C, op. 29, Moderato..... Beethoven
- 2—Recitative & Aria, "Dove Sono," from Le Nozze di Figaro..... Mozart
Miss Ryan.

- 3—Piano Trio in D minor, op. 49, Allegro and Scherzo. Mendelssohn Messrs. Lang, Schultze and Fries.
- 4—Rode's Air and Variations, Transcribed for the Saxophone. (Played by request)..... Rode Thomas Ryan.
- 5—"O, rest in the Lord," Air from Elijah..... Mendelssohn
Miss Ryan.
- 6—Songs without words for Piano,
A { Gondellied in G minor, book 1 }
B { in C, No. 5, book 5 }..... Mendelssohn
Mr. B. J. Lang.
- 7—Clarinet Quintet in A, op. 108..... Mozart Moderato—Larghetto—Minuetto—Tema con Variazioni.

HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY. The Advertiser reports the annual meeting of this society, which was held in Chickering's Hall last Wednesday evening, the President, Dr. J. Baxter Upham, in the chair. The reports of the Secretary, Loring B. Barnes; Treasurer, Matthew S. Parker; and Librarian, Geo. H. Chickering, were read and accepted. Mr. Barnes in his report (we print it in full upon another page), alludes to measures in progress to raise a fund of $20,000, the income of which shall be devoted to musical entertainments, more especially chorus festivals, which, with the aid of suburban talent, can be made superior to anything of the kind in the country. It is also contemplated to celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of the Society, which occurs in two years. Mr. Parker's report showed the receipts of the year to be $4787 79, and the expenditures $4937 79, leaving a balance of $150 against the Society, which with a note of $700 due makes the Society's liabilities $850; to meet which the Society holds an Ogdensburg bond worth $1040, thus leaving an actual balance of $190 on hand. The old board of officers were reelected for the ensuing year, as follows:

President—Dr. J. Baxter Upham.
Vice-President—Oren J. Faxon.
Secretary—Loring B. Barnes.
Treasurer—Matthew S. Parker.
Librarian—Geo. H. Chickering.
Trustees—William Hawes, H. Farnham Smith, George P. Carter, Isaac Woodward, William O. Perkins, Samuel L. Thorndike, Edward Faxon, Geo. Fisher.

We understand that Miss CAROLINE RICHINGS, the singer, has bought of Mr. EICHHORN the right of performing his popular little Museum operas, "The Doctor of Alcantara" and "The Rose of Tyrol," for twenty-five hundred dollars. This looks really like the beginning of worldly success for an artist in this country. No doubt the composer will continue to work so promising a mine.

THE NEW YORK INSTITUTION FOR THE BLIND and its exhibition, at Irving Hall, on the 15th inst. Music entered largely into the exercises of the pupils, under the direction of their earnest teacher, Mr. S. LASAR. Among other pieces were sung: the Gloria from Mozart's "Twelfth Mass" (so called); the Hallelujah chorus; a solo from the Creation; a song by Robert Franz: "Now the summer days are ours"; a couple of old English madrigals, by Ford and Morley; a three-part song: "Chorus of Mermaids," by Gade; divers glees and rounds; Mrs. Howe's "Battle Hymn of the Republic," to the "John Brown" tune; and the "Star-spangled Banner." There were also Band and Piano-forte performances.

Music Abroad.

GENOA. It must be a rare God-send to almost any theatre in Italy nowadays, to hear a tenor who is so true an artist as Stigelli. A friend sends us clippings from Italian musical papers, glowing with the impression he produced during the winter past in Genoa, on the occasion of his debut in La Favorita. With all these critics Stigelli shares the highest honors with the prima donna, Signora Tosi; and the baritone, Rossi Ghelli, also a debutant, is highly praised. One says: "Signor Stigelli (Fernando), throughout his part, obtained one of those triumphs of which any artist, however great, might be proud." "The dramatic accent, the energy and the fine coloring with which the brave tenor reproduced the grand final scene of the third act, approved him a consummate artist. The Romanza 'Spirto gentil' was divinely executed." Sig. Stigelli (or Herr Stigel, for he is properly a German) made friends in this country, who will be glad to hear of his success in Europe—and in Italy.

London.

A few paragraphs, culled from the Musical World of May 2, will show that the great metropolis is as full of music as usual during the spring and early summer. For instance:

MUSICAL SOCIETY OF LONDON.—The third concert, last night, was marked by two events of uncommon interest—viz, the success of a new violinist, and (mirabile dictu!) the success of a new symphony. The following was the programme:—

- Part I.
Overture (Leonora, No. 3).....Beethoven
Recit. and Aria: "A te riedi".....Mercadante
Concerto (violin) in D minor.....Molique
Duet (Jessonda).....Spohr
Overture (Melusine).....Mendelssohn
Part II.
Symphony, No. 1, in A major (Op. 15).....Siles
Aria (Le Pre aux cleres).....Herold.
Overture (Freischutz).....Weber
Conductor, Mr. Alfred Mellon.

THE VOCAL ASSOCIATION (conductor, Mr. Benedict) produced another novelty, at its fourth concert, in the shape of an operetta, the words and music by Mr. Chalmers Masters, a professor favorably known in musical circles. The name of the operetta is the Rose of Salency. The music, comprising three choruses, a serenade (also for chorus), a duet for soprano and tenor, a trio for soprano, tenor, and bass, two soprano solos (one with chorus), a ballad, and a finale—is of a light and agreeable texture, tuneful, cleverly written, and never dull. The singers were Madame Lemmens-Sherrington, Messrs. Tennant, Sims Reeves, and Weiss; the accompaniments were played upon two pianofortes, by the composer himself, Messrs. G. Baker, Frank Mori, and Emile Berger. This was, of course, a drawback; but, as the Vocal Association boasts of no orchestra, it was inevitable. The operetta was entirely successful, piece after piece (the solos especially) being applauded.

PHILHARMONIC.—The time-honored "Philharmonic"—as hopeful and vigorous in its 51st year as though it were still in the heyday of youth—presented its subscribers, at its third concert, with an admirable programme, including Mozart's queenly symphony in E flat—his most graceful and beautiful, if not his finest; Mendelssohn's in A major—the one with which the enthusiastic young musician was inspired by the sights and sounds and sunny clime of Italy; Beethoven's overture to Leonora—the third and grandest of the Fidelio series; and Weber's impetuous Ruler of the Spirits. All these well-known and universally-admired compositions were admirably given, perhaps the most striking display of the evening being that bright and genial work which was written expressly for the Philharmonic Society, and first performed, under its author's own direction, on the 13th of May, 1833. The 30 years that have transpired since then—during scarcely half of which the ever-striving and ever-progressing Mendelssohn was permitted to enrich the art with new masterpieces (he died in 1847)—have not robbed this fascinating symphony of any of its freshness, any of its melodious spontaneity; and certainly we have never heard it played with more fire, precision and correctness, the times of each movement being indicated by Professor Sterndale Bennett with such punctilious exactness that one might have fancied Mendelssohn himself (whose high opinion of our countryman's ability as a conductor is on record) was directing the performance. The concerto—Weber's in E flat, for pianoforte—besides being a masterwork, was heard with all the more satisfaction in consequence of its being entrusted to one of the youngest and most steadily advancing of our English pianists—Mr. G. W. Cousins, who played better, far better, than we remember him to have played on any former occasion, exhibiting qualities both of style and mechanism that brought out in effective relief all the more salient features of the music—music which bears the impress of Weber's romantic spirit in every movement. The singers were Mademoiselle Parepa, who gave "Ocean, thou mighty monster," with remarkable energy; and Mr. Santley, who in the splendid song of Count Almaviva, "Vedrò mentr'io" (Le Nozze di Figaro, act 2), showed the qualifications most essential to a singer of the "classical" (genuine) school.

HERR PAUER'S HISTORICAL PIANOFORTE CONCERTS.—The second performance came off on Monday, and was devoted to various schools, ranging from Scarlatti down to Kullak and Willmers. The selection comprised—Presto in G minor, and Allegro in G minor, Scarlatti; two fugues, Porpora; Sonata in C minor (No. 11), Martini; Sonata di clavicembalo, Paradisi; Sonata in C major, Clementi; Studies, Cramer; "Canon a due," and "Fugue on an air by Mozart," Klengel; Nocturne, in A major, and Diversissement, in E major, John Field; Two Studies, Kalkbrenner; Fantasia, in B major, Charles Mayer; "La Violette," Henri Herz; "Les Arpèges," Kullak; "Sehnsucht am Meere," Willmers.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—On Saturday Rigoletto was given for the first time this season, with Mlle. Fioretti as Gilda, M. Naudin as the Duke, both "debuts," and Signor Ronconi in his original part of the Jester. The performance was excellent, Mlle. Fioretti made even a greater impression than in Elvira (I Puritani); and, unless we are very much mistaken, this young singer is destined ultimately to fill up the void left by Angiolina Bosio—than which a greater compliment we could not tender her. Mlle. Fioretti is a real Italian vocalist—how rare in the present day, we need not remark—and her voice is fresh and sympathetic in quality. She sang some of Gilda's music exquisitely, and was enthusiastically applauded. M. Naudin was better, perhaps, as the Duke of Mantua than as Masaniello; but, though his singing was always correct and sometimes passionate, Signor Mario was sadly missed. Signor Ronconi never produced a greater effect in Rigoletto.

On Monday, an extra night, Guillaume Tell was repeated for the second appearance of Signor Caffieri.

On Tuesday the Prince and Princess of Wales paid a state visit to the theatre, when Masaniello and the National Anthem were performed.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.—On Saturday Lucia di Lammermoor was repeated with La Farsulella. Lucrezia Borgia was given for the second time on Tuesday, again followed by the new ballet. On Thursday the Troisvire was repeated, with Madame Theresé Ellinger, vice Madame Albani, in Azucena. Madame Ellinger acted and sang with great energy as the horrible old gipsy, Azucena, and created a most favorable impression.

To-night the Ballo in Maschera will be given for the first time. A new Oscar appears in the person of Mlle. Iradier, a débutante, and Signor Delle Sedie makes his first appearance at Her Majesty's Theatre in his popular character of Renato. The rest of the cast is as formerly.

Mlle. Trebelli makes her réentrée on Tuesday in la Barbiere, and Signor Schirn's new opera, Nicodé de Lepi, is positively announced for this day week.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.—M. Vieuxtemps is reviving the old impression at the Monday Popular Concerts. At the 12th (Monday week) he again led the "Rasoumoffsky" quartet of Beethoven (No. 3, in C), besides playing with Mr. Hallé, his own remarkably ingenious and original sonata in B flat, for viola and pianoforte, showing himself, not for the first time, as accomplished a master of the viola as of the violin. Mr. Hallé gave Beethoven's solo sonata in E flat (No. 29, Op. 27), the companion of the more famous "Moonlight," and in the ready hands of the German pianist quite as effective. He also—in conjunction with M. Vieuxtemps and Signor Piatti—performed Hummel's brilliant trio in E flat, Op. 96. MM. Wiener and Schreuz took second violin and viola, in the quartet. The singers were Miss Banks and Mr. Weiss—both established favorites at these concerts.

The 126th concert (Monday last) brought us, once more, Mad. Arabella Goldard, as usual with something new and attractive. Hummel's last pianoforte sonata (Op. 106, in D). It was played magnificently by Madame Goldard, and received enthusiastically by the audience, who recalled her unanimously at the end. Her other performance was one of Mozart's violin sonatas (in D), with M. Vieuxtemps, with which the audience were no less enchanted, and reasonably, inasmuch as the music is full of genuine melody, and the interpreters were both high-priests of art. The first quartet was the one in B flat, by Ernst. Enough that it is a striking, symmetrical and wholly original composition; that it was superbly executed by MM. Vieuxtemps, Wiener, H. Webb, and Piatti.

NEW PHILHARMONIC.—The second concert took place on Wednesday, and attracted an audience that filled St. James's Hall in every part. An excellent and well-varied selection, combined with the first appearance in a London concert-room of Mlle. Carlotta Patti, will readily account for the crowd. The principal pieces for the band were Mendelssohn's A minor symphony, and the overture to Medea and Jessonda—Cherubini and Spohr. The concertos were Beethoven's for the violin, M. Vieuxtemps executive, and Chopin's in E minor for pianoforte, Herr Alfred Jell, pianist. Herr Jaell recommended Chopin to the heat of his ability, playing with great power and facility, and winning unanimous approbation. M. Vieuxtemps gave Beethoven's magnificent concerto magnificently, and created a furor. The band in both concertos was irreproachable, and a finer performance of the "Scotch" symphony has rarely been heard.

Mlle. Carlotta Patti having selected the three identical songs in which she had already thrice been heard at the Royal Italian Opera. Concerts, we have nothing more to say than that she produced much the same impression upon Dr. Wyld's company as upon Mr. Gye's.

English comic song, in which "I really couldn't see it, couldn't see it, couldn't see it," comes in very funny.

Within the Convent Garden. Die Nonne, von Uhland. Music by S. Thalberg. 25

A sweet little ballad of Uhland's, admirably fitted to music by an admirable master. The accompaniment is very fine, and a good tune by itself.

O Love, thou'rt like a reed bent low. Song from The Armorer of Nantes. Balfe. 25

The first of a series of songs from a new opera which excites considerable attention in England. While there is much music in the Armorer which must be heard in connection with the rest to produce its full effect, there are also a few melodious songs and duets which may well sustain a separate existence. This song of Raoul the Armorer will no doubt be a favor to it.

Little Nell. Ballad. C. Packer. 30

An exquisite little song, composed for Mad. Bishop, whose beautiful and touching rendering of it is familiar to those who have attended her concerts.

O wake her not, my mother. Ballad. T. B. Bishop. 25

Instrumental Music.

Les Diamans de la Couronne. Die Krondiamonden. Beyer's Bouquet of Melodies. Op. 42. 50

Another of Beyer's collections of opera airs, which now include, probably, nearly every favorite opera melody in existence. Those who like the Crown Diamonds, will find it here served up, ready for the fingers.

Hymn to Love. Hymne an die Liebe. T. Oesten. 40

One of Oesten's most recent pieces. Contains a melody of great beauty. Of easy-medium difficulty.

The Flower Show Galop. F. Reyloff. 35

Very easy; enough so to render it just the piece to give at the end of a first quarter's instruction, and at the same time brilliant and musical.

Fidelio. Bouquet de Melodies. F. Beyer. 50

The favorite melodies of the opera Fidelio.

Corinna Polka. H. Pond. 25

A bright composition, with some quite novel effects.

Mine alone. German air, varied. 35

JOHNSON'S SYSTEM OF HARMONY. Practical instructions in Harmony, on the Pestalozzian, or Inductive System, and the art of extemporizing Interludes and Voluntaries. By A. N. Johnson. 1.00

The number of those who study Harmony is comparatively small. It should be larger. The above system will enable one who has no teacher (of course it is greatly better to have one), to master the art of writing music. It contains a great quantity of exercises, perfectly progressive, and plain directions for working out each musical problem.

Hector Berlioz.

It is with him, in this respect, as with Beethoven, who was at one time censured for the same thing, until Hoffmann opened the eyes of the reviewers. For example:

In the second part of the Allegro of the Frances Juges overture, we find the following passage for the violoncellos, as may be seen at B,

It might be that at a casual glance, or in the first hearing, this would appear like a new idea; but transpose now the melody from A flat major, which stands above, to F major, and note the same decline of tone, which is shown by the principal accent, and which, on account of its clearness, I have placed above at A—and it will be seen that the violoncellos bring in nothing but was there before; excepting that the melody was given to other instruments, transposed to a different key, and otherwise accompanied and varied. These means can all, at once, be applied, and are to be found in the works of all good masters. The rule of construction which underlies this, is one long known, although Berlioz's model is entirely his own, not formed of the materials of others, but stamped with his own individuality throughout.

Further, one will find often in his works bold and startling modulations. Once upon a time, the uninterrupted progression of two parts in fourths and fifths gave the greatest delight to the listeners; but the modern ear would be in despair. When the first septachord was hazarded, they thought the inventor only fit for the madhouse. And thus it is to-day. Having no musical discipline, the present age is not so charitable to harmony as to the theory of harmony, which crawls after music at a snail's pace, and still remains far behind! Already the new, free thinking doctrines of harmony deride every symphony of Haydn!

The first steps of all ingenious composers are transgressions, apparently, of harmonic laws; they are plausible, but seldom correct. "Theory forbids that," said a critic once to Beethoven. "And I allow it," returned he.

I will not here point out the passages which might be charged upon Berlioz, as containing crude harmonies; but it is certain, that his boldness in this respect goes no farther, relatively, than other masters have gone in earlier times. He has not overstepped the boundaries of art, but he has certainly discovered and pointed out new paths, wherein dwell marvellous effects of harmony, and of which our childish harmonists know nothing.

Of all reproaches which they make to Berlioz, done is to me more incomprehensible than that "he lacks expression" (feeling); that his heart is cold, and that he constructs his musical fabrics only by the aid of his reason. Berlioz wishes to portray the affections, feelings, and passions, which arise in men in certain situations, and because this exceeds the capability of purely instrumental music, he adds thereto a sufficiently clear verbal explanation.

Æsthetic writers maintain that "Programme-music" is a violation of the privileges of instrumental music—but of late, most composers have written programme-music. Which are we to believe the former or the latter? A negative dissertation on programme-music; or the emotion and pleasure which we feel in hearing the "Pastoral Symphony", the "Midsummer Night's Dream", and many similar works?

"It is absurd" one often hears, "to try to represent outward phenomena by musical sounds".—"Calmness" is an outward appearance; and, "A happy voyage" is an outward event. The former Mendelssohn has manifestly portrayed. But must one declare to any reasonable person, that this was not the chief object of Mendelssohn, but that he wished to represent the emotions which arise in men in certain situations and aspects?

And Berlioz wishes nothing more than also Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Spohr, and many others desired. Therefore, his design is not unartistic, at least to those on whom "programme-music," (in the above meaning) depends for its estimation. Every important artist has to create his own model, to express and portray his inclinations for special objects in his own way; these means are, and must be manifold in every art; they cannot fail of possessing in themselves, according to their nature, a power of attraction in larger or smaller circles of mankind. Schiller has a larger audience than Goethe. Kotzebue had, perhaps, in his time, a still larger one. The higher the style of art, the smaller will be the number in proportion of those who unite together musical ideas and a perfect form. It is truly said, like can be fully understood by like alone.

Berlioz inclines to select as subjects of his pen, the tragic heights and depths of human circumstances and passions. But he does not disdain the comic, the droll element, which he has in him the capability of expressing. At the same time, he endeavors to urge powerful emotions to the extreme; thus he may well be named the Shakespeare of music.*

I should not wish that Berlioz became the only model of imitation, any more than I would have Wagner's operas "of the future" furnish the only kind of opera; but in the manifold series of musical splendors I would receive these like all other genuine works of art, and leave them not to the future. I confide a work of art to no future, if it does not interest in the present, since men do not change so completely as that a whole subsequent generation can enjoy what a former one had actually with ill-humor, repulsed. And where can be found, in the whole history of music, a single example of a composer, who influenced, not his own time, but a future one? Mozart is cited as an example! But what do we understand by the "future"? Mozart died in his thirty-sixth year, already acknowledged by the greater part of the nation. Beethoven? I think he may be satisfied with the homage which he received from the greatest of his own time.—Possibly, J. S. Bach? He is even now the first in the present age, and has been known as a great genius during the last hundred years. He has given more pleasure to the ear and mind of our own time, than actually to his own contemporaries; yet he will also be acknowledged the greatest organ-player, and composer, of his own age.

Is Wagner a composer of the Future? In his writings, in which he disappoints himself and others, he is; but not in his operas, which have already found an audience. And so the works of Berlioz belong to the present time, in which they are oftentimes well represented.

Thus, briefly, writes an Englishman, who heard Berlioz's operas and other compositions lately in Weimar: "The revival (of the opera) has made a real sensation, in which there has been nothing factitious, or managed. Let the critics be ever so critical on the school to which M. Berlioz belongs, every generous person must have found pleasure in witnessing the cordial manifestation of sympathy, that greeted the French composer in Goethe's town."

Thus the works of Berlioz please in the present time. He does not require the future, in order to become known; he needs, actually, only the good will of the conductor and orchestra. With an increased number of instruments, and greater skilfulness in the orchestra, the high claims of the composer will be established. What Mozart required to have performed, was found very difficult by the orchestras of his own time; fifty years before they would have declared his works impracticable. They are now merely child's play! And from Beethoven's ninth Symphony many orchestras recoil yet. Perhaps Berlioz's works make even greater pretensions, but certainly they are not impracticable. Weimar and Brunswick have proved this. But does any one believe that, until now, his compositions have ever been perfectly well performed anywhere? A composer must have conducted his own works, in order to know how far the effect of the first orchestral performance falls short of the complete effect, which he hears, in his own mind.

How was it for many years with the Symphonies of Beethoven? Having incurred censure by unsatisfactory representation, his works were criticized with severity; and from this injustice Berlioz suffers to this day. Even now, some of them are called odd, because the effects therein are entirely original! Mozart was odd, Beethoven was odd, and so Berlioz is odd.

A Letter from Rome.

The London Musical World adopts the following for its "leader," having translated it from some humorous German writer in the Niederheinische Musik-Zeitung.

**** After what has preceded, you will naturally expect that a man who is great as a musician, not less important as an author, and unrivalled as a tourist, should send you at least an appendix to Mendelssohn's Letters from Rome. But no! I will not cast into the shade poor Mendelssohn, if merely out of a feeling of respect for my old master. I leave this task to others, say, for instance, Franz Liszt, whom I met yesterday in St. Peter's; but I could scarcely recognize in an old, bent-down man, leaning against a pillar, the lively, blond-haired, genial companion of former times.

Since, in the true poetic fashion, I have now plunged you in medicus res, I may return to the chronological course of my travelling epic. After I had somewhat deadened, by a farewell Soirée of solid musical cheer, with due addition of creature-comforts, the grief experienced by my Viennese friends at parting with me, I hastened, at the beginning of March, towards that quarter of the South where Goethe's believing admirers expect to perceive, on all sides, only verdant groves and glowing golden orange-trees. I saw and experienced, however, in the month of March, on the Brenner, and even a considerable distance further, a great deal which could be designated neither glowing nor verdant. Innsbruck, Verona, and Milan were evidences of the difference between poetry and prose; it was not until I proceeded from Genoa along the Riviera di Levante that a clear-blue sky was to be seen; but I beheld Chiavari and La Spezia already completely decked out in the garb of Spring; while the fortress-walls of Varignano appeared to me less grey than they appeared probably to Garibaldi. I would fain have sent you, from some local admirers of yours, a stone from the walls, but I restrained myself, pursuing, also, though with far greater difficulty, the same system of abnegation, on seeing the fine blocks of marble from Carrara, so that my letter might not be unconscionably heavy.

From Massa, I went by rail to Florence, and so on, by land, past Viterbo to Rome; summa summarum: rolling along uninterruptedly for twenty days in horse-dragged or steam-snooting vehicles. I could not, therefore, suffer from sea sickness, unless it had been in the Scala at Milan, or the Pergola at Florence. In the Scala, I heard an opera which was meant to be Gounod's Faust, but, from the mode in which it was executed, might just as well have been called Fra Diavolo or Il Trovatore. At the Pergola, on the other hand, I was treated to Verdi's epileptic music, as represented by his horrible Nabucodonosor. In Faust, not less than the greatest portion of the third act—the Garden-scene; the Walpurgis-Night; the Festival-scene; and other trifles—was cut out, while the remainder was made up with additions and interpolations from other operas, arranged à l'usage de chacun, and newly scored in such a way, that, as a rule, whenever there was a burst, all the violins and wood-instruments, as well as, sometimes, the brass, like so many pots and pans, blurted forth in unison with the singer, and remained hanging as long as possible upon a high note, until, gradually the wind-instrumentalists lost their breath, and the bow fell from the hands of the fiddlers, nothing being left but a vermilion-colored tenor, who, blessed with better lungs than any one else, still squeaked out his high a, till even he, succumbing to the power of time, broke down in his turn. This was followed by endless jubilation among the audience, the more roaring and deafening the more roaring and deficient in good taste the mode in which the singing athlete had taken advantage of his a. A German musician, however, feels broken-hearted on hearing these magnificent Italian larynxes so shamefully misapplied, and thrown away on such musical rot as most of Verdi's operas. At such performances, any one might fancy that all the persons before and around him were suffering from St. Vitus's dance.

During the journey from Florence to Rome I had time to recover from the musical impressions received in the chief city of Tuscany, and to look back with rather more satisfaction on the Palazzo Pitti than on the Pergola.

On Wednesday, in Passion Week, with restored vigor, therefore, I set about the Herculean task of listening, in the Sixtine Chapel, to the five-hour evening service—"Lamentationes," "Tenebræ," "Miserere," &c. I must again inform you, as I have already done in the exordium to my epistle, that, humble individual as I am, I obtained, on this occasion, a place which Princes and Ambassadors might have envied; a comfortable seat under the singers' tribune; I was indebted for it to the great kindness of a papal official, to whom I had been recommended by an influential German ecclesiastic. If you should happen to recollect, in connection with this fact, the fable of the lion, the mouse and the net, I have no objection, for all the lions in Rome could not have obtained for me the place rendered accessible by an apparently little mouse, who smuggled me in close to the Cardinals, and thus enabled me to see everything very comfortably, while many other persons were carried fainting out of the throng.

In a seat, therefore, which I shall, probably, never be able to obtain again as long as I live, I was present at one of the most impressive of religious ceremonies; one which, in its general effect, was of a most elevating nature. So much in compliance with truth! If, however, you ask what were my feelings and impressions as a musician, I must, once more in compliance with truth, give vent to the disappointment I have brought back with me. The intonation of these world-wide celebrated singers of the Sixtine Chapel is positively false; they sing without taste, and, to my ear, at least, possess repulsive voices. If this chorus of men, or rather of castrati, would, instead of indulging in four octaves, be content to sing in two pure and full-toned octaves; would round off their cadences quietly and in a dignified manner, instead of finishing with flourishes and blundering shakes; and emit their voices not through the nose but the throat, the strangeness of many other details which characterize them would be bearable, for the style of some among them is peculiarly interesting, and never heard, or to be heard, elsewhere—especially that of one old soprano of sixty-five years of age! Unfortunately, however, their voices remind the hearer only too often of those of the harp-girls in the "Café-Concerts" of Paris. Even if I am excommunicated on account of my compa ion, I cannot help it, and I must say, despite of all the fanatici in the Sixtine Chapel, that this style, which claims to be traditionally classical, strikes one as very unclassical, and could never be elevated into an indisputable dogma of our religion, either by the primitive fathers of the Gregorian chant, or by all the fathers of the Church put together. Any one who dared to make this assertion here in Rome would actually be stoned by every musician.

But now that I have given utterance to my especial musical discontent, I return to my previous opinion of the whole—to my assertion, that at this service, as in everything a person hears and sees in Rome, the general impression is grand and overpowering, and that nothing would ever cause me to wish that the hours I spent in the Sixtine Chapel were effaced from my memory. There, too, I heard, surrounded by the approaching night, as well as by the more palpable night with which the magic of Michael Angelo has adorned the walls, a "Miserere" by Allegri—or, in his style, by Baini (I could not learn with certainty the name of the composer)—which would have been very beautiful, if the way in which it was performed had been equal to the talent with which it is written. As an excuse for the Sixtine singers, I must, by-the-by, mention that, in conformity with the Italian fashion, they are treated just like the hackney-coach horses; false intonation is intelligible in the case of individuals whose services are regularly called into requisition six or eight hours every day during Passion Week.

Singing Societies in Germany.

Singing societies of all sorts of names, for the cultivation of all sorts of vocal music, consisting of all classes of society, but mostly for the working people—both exclusively of male voices and of mixed voices—are as numerous in Germany as are churches and Sunday-schools in America.

That a deep love for song is planted in the heart by a regular musical instruction in childhood, and favored by a mild, even climate, which makes the lungs and whole body strong, and withal, as their every-day labor is not of that exhaustive kind which renders man even unfit for pleasure—that all this should call into existence numerous singing societies, is just as natural as that the Puritan principles of Sabbath-keeping have given us our large number of churches and Sabbath-schools. Nor is the nursing of these institutions as different as it would seem at first. Wise Sunday-school superintendents take good care to have successful Christmas festivals, picnics, anniversaries, concerts, &c., and no pains or expense is spared to make their localities as attractive as possible. The singing societies in Germany, in like manner, while meeting mainly for the cultivation of song, always find occasion for some extras in the shape of serenades, concerts, excursions, &c. By the last steamer we received an annual report of one of the oldest societies in Germany, the Stuttgarter Liederkrans. Of its 1,091 members 38 are honorary members, every one of whom owes this honor to personal attainments either as a successful laborer for the cause as master singer, composer, or poet; and all of whom, with but few exceptions, live in the little kingdom of Wurtemberg. The active and passive paying members are from all classes of society; men of high literary attainments and reputation—government officers of all ranks, merchants, tradesmen, mechanics, and one or two gentlemen of noble birth.

The active members meet every Tuesday evening to practice in good earnest, as well as for social enjoyment; in which last, with German singers, next to song, lager-beer plays a prominent part; the luxury of smoking being excluded from the hours of exercise. The programme of the large entertainment of the Stuttgarter Liederkrans, during the last year, was the following:

- January 1. Celebration of New-year's day.
- " 12. Social meeting to pay homage to the celebrated Nuremberg feast-beer.
- " 29. Reunion (social meeting with singing).
- March 1. Grand Redoute (masquerade), said to have been a most splendid affair.
- " 30. Grand public rehearsal.
- April 12. Entertainment with brass band.
- " 26. Uhlend festival.
- May 11. Picnic.
- " 19. Public entertainment in connection with the Turners.
- " 28. Schiller festival.
- June 8 & 9. Song festival in Kirchheim.
- " 12. Serenade to the new City Mayor.
- " 29. Garden-concert to raise funds for Körner's statue.
- July 13. Inauguration of the standard of a neighboring singing society.
- " 27. Union-concert of all singers of Stuttgart and environs, to raise funds for Körner's statue.
- August 3. Excursion to the woods.
- " 24. Anniversary of the Society.
- Sept. 14. Excursion to a neighboring locality.
- October 3. Serenade to their newly married Musical Director.
- " 11. Annual autumnal feast, followed by a grand ball.
- Nov. 9. Public rehearsal.
- " 16. Trip to Tübingen to do honor to the departed Ludwig Uhland.
- " 29. Performance of Mendelssohn's "Antigone."
- " 21. Meeting in honor of Ludwig Uhland.

As a substantial proof of the success of this Society, we may add that it has commenced the building of a "Sängerhalle" (song-hall), 180 feet by 160, and three stories high, to cost 112,000 florins ($45,000). Let us crush out the rebellion, and then see whether we cannot do something to compare with the Stuttgart singers (not drinkers).—Zundel's Monthly Choir.

Musical Blunders.

(From the Philadelphia Dial.)

The blunders of the New York musical critics are sometimes very amusing. The New York Times, speaking of the Vestvali English Opera, thus trips over Gluck's famous work—very dangerous music, which has been fatal to more than one critic and singer. "We are very glad to see," says the Times, "that the first attempt is to be made with Gluck's celebrated 'Orphée,' a lyric, comic opera with which all Europe, and especially all Paris, has been simply wild. The incidents, based on a burlesque rendering of the classic story of the luckless Orpheus hunting after his abducted wife, Eurydice, in the infernal realm of Pluto, are side-splitting if not heart-rending, and the music brilliant and fascinating beyond words." It will be news to most musical men, that Gluck's sublime music is comic, and that its side-splitting incidents are based on a burlesque. The great air of Orpheus, "I have lost my Eurydice," is considered one of the most touching and beautiful melodies in all music. After a while we may hear that the "Messiah" is a comic Oratorio, or read a complimentary notice of "Polly put the kettle on," praising that familiar melody for its sublimity. The Times evidently confuses with GLUCK's work, a comic opera of the same name by OFFENBACH.

The success of "Orpheus" has not been very great in New York, owing to its imperfect production. Mr. ANSCHUTZ has made the most of a small orchestra, but the vocalists are not able to do full justice to the grand music. Among the funny notices of the Opera, is the following from the World, which apparently possesses a critic who cannot endure any music that is written outside of New York, and who thinks all music obsolete which was written before he was born. We seldom find the same spirit of depreciation in literature, yet the man who would call GLUCK's greatest Opera "a curious fossil," might as well ridicule MILTON as an old fogey.

"The music of 'Orpheus' may be superior in every respect, but in this degenerate age there are few persons among the public who would prefer it to the ornate compositions of the present period. Its attractive qualities are much like those of a curious fossil. The solemnity of the melodic themes introduced forbids applause, and suggests the idea that the fountain source of several village psalm books has been reached at last. People laugh at the eccentricities of an 'Old Folks Concert,' yet the spirit of the music which is usually offered at such entertainments is identical with that which pervades the scores of operas, sonatas, etc., of one hundred years ago. Why, then, it should be considered desirable to revive a work like 'Orpheus,' except in view of the opportunities afforded for scenic and ballet display, or as an antiquarian specimen, we cannot discover. In the present instance Mdle. Vestvali earns whatever success it is in the power of the representation to convey."

Scribe.

We copied last week Mons. Feullet's eulogy of Scribe before the French Academy, as reported by "Spiridion" to the Evening Gazette. Here is a portion of M. Vitot's reply:

We must look at the essence of the man himself for the true cause of his success. Scribe possessed a powerful and really eminent faculty, which assured to him and which explains to me his supremacy on the theatre of his day. This was a gift of dramatic invention which, perhaps, nobody ever possessed to the degree he had it; the gift of discovering at every step, at every trifle, theatrical combinations of a new and striking effect, and of discovering them not merely in germ or rough sketched, but in relief, in action, and ready for the stage. While his literary brethren are preparing for one plot, in the same period of time he prepares more than four, and he attains this prodigious prolificness at the expense of his originality. He does not cast his fictions in a common-place mould. If he has his secrets, his methods, he never uses them twice in the same way. There is not one of his works but has at least its spark of originality. But then his whole life was absorbed by weaving plots and knitting incidents and catastrophes. Night and day, travelling and at home, a-foot and in carriage, silent and talking, under the shadow of the Alpine glaciers and in the green-room of the Opera he did, he thought of nothing else. A mathematician brooding over some great problem, a commander-in-chief meditating over the plan of a campaign, were never absorbed by more obstinate, more incessant mental labor. Such was the imperative necessity to him of inventing constantly and introducing everywhere dramatic fictions, that he introduced them even into his alms. He was for years seen to exhaust all the stratagems and all the ingenious fictions of use on the stage to persuade poor literary brethren that they were his partners, and that they lived upon the returns of their works, when in reality 'twas he who supported them. A predominant faculty excited in this way is almost a genius. This word is not too strong to be used here: Scribe had the genius of dramatic invention. But the great art of dramatic composition does not live alone on calculations, scenic effects, agreeable surprises, and unexpected solutions. Its work cannot be accomplished, its work cannot last unless there be flesh upon these muscles and color upon this flesh; in other words, style and character are necessary. I hasten to say that in these two particulars Scribe never had even the pretension to be equal to himself. Had his temperament allowed them, he would upon principle have refused them. I agree that he is less prompt, less bold in inventing characters than in creating situations; but even in these very particulars it is not his vein which abandons him. Take his characters—they are humorous, various, amusing. Life is abundant in them, although, perhaps, a little facetious. He communicates to them his sprightliness, his gaiety, his giddiness, his amiable malice. What then do these figures, or rather these portraits, lack? A little consistency and solidity. They seem colored crayon drawings. One feels that they will be effaced like a photograph likeness which begins to fade. There is not a copper-plate engraving among them; nothing is deep, everything is on the surface. Why? Because he knew that if he penetrated deeper, if he delineated his characters with stronger outline, he would be less certain to please everybody; he would create contradictions which he was especially desirous to shun. He thought it best to catch the new fashion, yesterday's epigram, to-day's bon mot, and the new manners as they rose. This ephemeral truth displeases nobody. By limiting himself to sketches on his canvas he aimed at assuring his success.

I make the same remarks upon Scribe's style: between his fingers the pen slips even more quickly than the pencil. His style is simple, natural, with nothing like turgidity and nothing like effort; but what absence of everything like asperity! It has not an angle, not a salient point, not the least effect of color! Was this, too, a calculation? Was he afraid of diverting the attention of the spectator from his principal object and of coming into competition with himself? Was it from coquetry for his scenic effects that he remained in this crepuscular light? I know not; but this mode of writing (which, I agree, will not be without danger for the permanent reputation of his works) did not militate against the extent of his success. His cosmopolite fame most surely did not suffer by it. An unmarked style is almost a passport, especially to foreigners.—Had Molière written less admirably, had he been less an artist in our language, perhaps he would have been better understood beyond the Alps and the Rhine. Therefore I conceive how it is that Scribe never made any strenuous efforts to give greater individuality to his character and brighter colors to his style. He was too popular as he was. To win was to lose as far as he was concerned. But does it follow, as he has pretended, that he was by nature indifferent, nay, insensible, to these beauties of form and style from which he almost entirely abstained? I say that it is to ill-comprehend, it is but to half-see, that strange nature where all the contraries coexist, economy and munificence—enthusiasm and grovelling nature. While for his own works he neglected these sort of beauties, I assert that his heart felt, that he instinctively knew the most secret mysteries, the most hidden laws; and for proof I would refer only to his lyric dramas, that is, to the intelligent aid, to the adroit and impassioned assistance he lent to music, to that art which is in reality but a brother of the art of writing—a more cadenced and more harmonious brother. The riches of color and style which by this alliance cover his ingenious web—I know he is not the author of them—are in part his work, so great is his share in inspiring them. Let me here make Scribe reparation. A long time ago, even before he wrote his operas comiques, I confess I greatly pitied the musicians who would one day have commerce with him. How could one think that this great conqueror, this king of the vaudeville, suddenly forgetting the cavalier manner in which he treated music every evening, would willingly consent to become its humble servant? I was convinced, I even wrote that when he changed his stage he would retain his habits; but when he set to work, when I saw that without abdicating, without yielding everything to his guest, he did the honors of the house, and, not content with this defence, surrounded her with the tenderest attentions, suggested her ideas, prepared her happy contrasts, gave her ample developments, and especially when I saw him accepting with stoicism the tyrannical asymmetry of musical phrases, bravely throwing his lines upon the bed of Procrustes and condemning his hemistiches to the most painful operations, I confess I was seized with singular esteem for this unexpected auxiliary. Such resignation of vanity, such devotion to the common cause, such love of art, carried to sacrifice, revealed to me unknown regions in him. So he did then understand something else than his bon mots and his songs! I saw him from this day in an absolutely new light, and the impression remains as fresh as ever. Consequently, I declare, while recognizing the incontestable merit of more important works, and while classing apart the charming pieces he wrote for the Gymnase Dramatique (which possess in their favor his youthful bloom and frank originality) the plays I place in the front rank of Scribe's vast works are his lyrical dramas. To justify this preference, perhaps, little in conformity with the laws of hierarchy, it would be necessary for me to point out how much imagination, suppleness, penetration, and true sentiment of art there are in these little master-pieces of art, which no one would have dared foresee even in a dream—a prolific union of two arts, which double their power by aiding each other with discipline, without contest and without jealousy.

Verdi's "Aroldo."

NEW YORK ACADEMY, MAY 4.

(From the Tribune.)

Last evening was unpropitious for the Muses, especially as they put on a spick-and-span new dress—new at least to this latitude—in the shape of an opera by the redoubtable Signor Verdi. We beg to mention, as a stage aside, that this opera is not new in Italy. Years back it was born and baptized under the name of Stephen, or something of that sonority. But Stephen was martyred. There was something in the plot worse than politics, namely religion, for the land in which it saw the light: there was Protestantism and Olympus knows what all in the story, and so Stephen was martyred and forbade the boards. But happily an opera has a dual life. It is words and music: and although the words were killed—they were but the letter, while the music was the spirit which gave the work life. So Stephen was re-bathed literature-wise. A new text was set to music. And the result is before us.

The plot has the merit of simplicity. Harold, a knight bedeviled by the preachings and screechings of Peter the Hermit, leaves, like an ass, a beautiful young wife to recover the holy sepulchre. The wife must love something, as Harold was away so long bawling at the heathen, and assisting, probably, in that memorable transaction, the capture of Jerusalem, when the victors put the Jews inside the wall to death—believing, in their ecstasy, that they were the Original Jacobs who were guilty of the crucifixion (so history reporteth of the blind zeal and fury of the invaders, who thus and there abolished time to the tune of twelve hundred years). The love of the wife of Harold for something was only a sort of flirtation after all, but it terribly distressed Harold on his sudden return, for he saw that Mrs. Harold behaved in a monstrous queer manner generally. Mrs. Harold, however, wishing to give over the flirtation, writes a letter to the gentleman, and puts the note in a well-bound volume for his "single eye." The course of true love, however, runs rough, and this letter was picked out by Harold of the well-bound tome lying on a table, in a grand ball-room, where knights in real armor were doing everything but dance. Harold availed himself of the opportunity to denounce his wife in a most tempestuous manner before the whole crowd, who, previous to that time, had been elaborately gay, and singing like doves to the soft accompaniment of the brass tubes and kettle drums, and cymbals and great drum. The Harold lady, however, had a father, who interfered, and made the quarrel his own. The pater-familias did not allow the documents to be read, and so-forth. Finally, Harold is about to kill the sentimental gentleman who admires his wife; but a Hermit, a man with a beard, bass-voice, and that truculent manner which belongs of right to stage-hermits (who were the Broadway squad in the rough, of the Middle Ages), interferes, and assures Harold that bloodshed is contrary to the canons of the church. Harold, being a good sort of a fellow, relents, spares the sentimentalist, and emigrates to Scotland. Notwithstanding that country was the dullest place in Christendom at the time, Harold contrived to exist there, but only as a Hermit—in company with the other Hermits. Mrs. Harold being out on an emigrating tour herself, happened to be wrecked, one fine morning, upon the very coast where the Hermits were. One of the Hermits, finding that the sentimentalist had been killed by the irate father of the lady, and being assured that the whole affair amounted to nothing but a little pastime to while away dull hours during his Saracenic business, and feeling finally complimented thereby, rushed into the lady's arms. Not necessary to say that this Hermit was the junior member of the dry-bean and cold-water firm.

There is of course a terrible (musical) pothole, leading, one would suppose, to no end of lyrical bloodshed; and there is bitter disappointment felt by the audience that blood did not stream down the stage, and overwhelm the prompter in the immensity of tragic wrath. But when authors forget their duty and make jolly conclusions, all the critic can do is to utter a caveat and submit.

The music, the main thing, now claims a word. Up to the time of the apparition of Bellini's Il Pirata, in or about the year 1828, Rossini's music, and that of a few imitators, ruled. The introduction of a new style, in which a large simple theory and practice of declamation—(and after all the talk about recent musical declamation, we find nothing superior or purer in its genre than the revelations of that now old work Il Pirata)—had an immense effect on the works of others. Donizetti, like a skillful general, changed fortiori tactics, and wrote his Lucia; and no composer could hope for mercy who did not accept the new light—that is the old one—the Gluck theory of declamation—adding thereto the higher ecstasy of modern, and the nineteenth century, melodies, and the increased sonority and prominence of the orchestra, with the fresh and improved instruments. In this opera of Aroldo, we find the new school—phrasing, climax, declamation—all adopted—but with the touch of genius of course—for without that, Signor Verdi could not have made his mark.

The first act—often the least impassioned one of dramas and operas, in this instance rules the night. It is the most surcharged with melody and interest. We may note the fine bits assigned to Signor Mazzoleni, whose terseness and resonance of delivery electrified the house. The finale of the second act, however, is one of the best pieces in the opera: it is splendidly worked up—has good counterpoints in running syllabled phrases, and a happy contrast to this in subsequent long-drawn notes.

The baritone's solo—a piece of sweet revenge in prospect—is a happy inspiration.

The prima donna is all grief—and in dulcet tones means to do poetical justice—but the plot is against her—and it is only in the fourth act that her happiness is achieved.

There was not as large an audience present as we expected—but there was a great deal of applause—and we beg to say quite as discriminating as it would have been in any European Opera House.

The cast of characters was as follows: Aroldo, a Saxon Knight, Signor Mazzoleni; Mina, his wife, Mlle. Ortolani Brignoli; Egberto, father of Mina; Godrin, a Knight Crusader, Herr Rubio; Enrico, cousin of Mina, Signor Reinhart; Bryan, a Hermit, Herr Muller; Ellena, cousin of Enrico, Mme. Ficher.

LISZT, with several other musicians, has founded an Academy in Rome for the "Revival of Classical Music, Sacred and Profane." They have already given five concerts, which were well attended.

Music Abroad.

BERLIN. The Neue Berliner Musik-Zeitung announces the death (which occurred April 27) of its editor, GUSTAV BOCK, the well-known music publisher (Bots & Bock). Herr Bock was one of the most active friends of music, particularly in the higher walks of art.—RICHARD WAGNER had arrived, intending to make a visit of some length.

The Royal Opera House, by last accounts, was still pursuing its eclectic policy, giving on one night Auber's Domino Noir (with Mlle. Artot, Herren Formes, Wowsorsky and Bost in the principal rôles), successfully for singers not entirely at home in the light French opera comique; then Gounod's Faust and Margaret, still French, but of a more serious aim; then a couple of their own immortal classics: Don Juan, (with Frl. Maria Müller, from Hanover, as Donna Anna,) and Le Nozze di Figaro (with Frl. De Ahna to succeed Mme. Köster as the Countess, Mlle. Lucca as Cherubino, and Frau Harriers-Wipern as Susanna); then another little French piece, Grisar's Monsieur Pantalon; with due admixture now and then of Verdi.

Out of the unceasing list of interesting concerts let the correspondent of the London Musical World (who of course is always present and hears all—else how could he write such long letters about it) select, as follows:

First and foremost, in point of time, comes the last Soirée for Chamber Music given by Herren Lange and Oertling in the Englisches Haus. It began with a Trio by Grädener. This composition was given, if we are to trust the bills—and when was anything in print not scrupulously exact?—at the wish of several persons not named. I cannot say that I particularly admire the taste of these unknown venerated of Herr Grädener's talent. The most salient features in the Trio consisted of reminiscences of Beethoven and Mendelssohn. When I wish to refresh my recollection of those great master productions, I prefer consulting them myself to meeting with their disjuncta membra in the trios of any "Grädener" that ever lived, does live, or will live in secula seculorum. The Trio was well played by Herren Lange, Oertling and Espenhahn. Herr Lange then performed three solo pieces of his own composition; and Herr Oertling the first movement—amply sufficient—of Herr Anton Rubinstein's Violin-concerto. Schumann's Pianoforte Quintet concluded the programme. In the course of the concert Mlle. E. Hautscheck sang several songs, including one by Schumann, one by Franz, and the cavatina from Norma.

Herr Ehrlich and Signor Sivori announced a Soirée for Chamber Music, but it could not take place, in consequence of Sig. Sivori being detained by serious indisposition in Dantzig. Herr Ehrlich consequently got up a concert the next day, in the rooms of the Sing-Akademie, when, with Herr de Ahna and Dr. Bruns, he played Schubert's Trio in B flat major, together with a number of small pianoforte solos ancient and modern. The concert was invested with a certain additional interest for some persons by the fact of its being the last at which Mlle. Artot would make her appearance previously to her departure. She sang an air by Handel and the "Aragonaise" from Le Domino Noir, but even her greatest admirers were obliged to admit that the last fell flat. And so, farewell, Mlle. Artot, until next season!

The programme of the eighth Sinfonie-Soirée of the Royal Chapel comprised "Schottische Hochlands-Overture"—Niels Gade; A major Symphony—Mendelssohn; Overture to Coriolanus and Pastoral Symphony—Beethoven. All these were played in first-rate style, though the palm for execution must certainly be awarded to the symphony by Mendelssohn. The next and ninth concert brought the series to a brilliant close. The pieces selected for the delectation of the audience were Cherubini's Overture to Lodoiska; Schumann's Symphony in B flat; the Overture to Oberon; and Beethoven's Symphony in C minor. The last two were executed in a manner that sets all attempts at criticism at defiance.

The fourth and last concert for the benefit of the Gustav-Adolph-Stiftung was got up by the members of the Sing-Akademie, in whose rooms it came off. Handel's Alexander's Feast was selected, and the result was eminently satisfactory. Greater effect might, it is true, have been got out of the solos, had the latter been entrusted to experience, professional artists; but it is a rule that they shall always be sung by members of the Academie, and so, on the principle that a man must not look a gift-horse in the mouth, the public have no right to complain. They may, however, express their regret, I suppose, and, therefore, I, as one of them, now do so.

On the 26th of April, Herr Fritz Hartvigson, from Copenhagen, and a pupil of Herr Hans von Bülow, made his first bow to a Berlin audience, in Bechstein's rooms. By the way, I must mention the fact that all present obtained admission by special invitation. It is a bad thing for a young artist to begin his career before an "auditorium" filled with his own friends and those of his instructor. The programme comprised Liszt's Concerto in A, No. 2, and Fantasia on Hungarian National Melodies; "Giga con Variazioni" from Op. 91, by Raff; Herr von Bülow's "Mazurka Impromptu" (I wonder how many months were consumed by the composer in producing the said "Impromptu"?); "Au Lac de Wallenstedt," and "Tarentella," from Auber's Muette, by Liszt, and the "Galop de Concert," from "Le Bal," by Anton Rubinstein. Herr Hans von Bülow presided at a separate grand pianoforte and played the orchestral accompaniment to the first two pieces.

A second volume of MENDELSSOHN'S Letters is said to be forthcoming.

LEIPZIG. The first Haupt-Prüfung, or grand examination, of the Conservatory of Music took place on the 18th of April in the hall of the Gewandhaus. We translate from the report of it in the Signale:

"All the performances bore the stamp of carefulness and solidity; not one of the young men and women need to shun the light of publicity; and some among them rose far above the level of pupil performance. To name them in order:

"1. Concerto for piano, by Moscheles, played by Fräulein Emma Mayer, of Riga.—Right thoroughly studied and technically well executed; the delivery too was animated and showed much sense for musical expression.

"2. Concerto for violin, Spohr (No. 2, D minor), played by Georg Hünlein, of Breslau.—Great cleanliness and solidity; the youthful pupil will soon acquire the nerve yet wanting in his tone and delivery.

"3. Capriccio for piano, in B minor, Mendelssohn, played by Frl. Nanette Müller, of Lucerne.—Delivered with a very easy hand and in the liveliest tempo; a little more marrow wanting in the touch.

"4. Concerto for violin, F. David, played by Otto Peiniger, of Elberfeld.—An almost thoroughly successful performance.

"5. Concerto Fantastique, for piano, by Moscheles, played by Mr. CARLYLE PETERSHLEA, of Boston, U. S.—Altogether excellent in technical respects, and with much definiteness and ripeness of expression. The best piano performance of the evening.

"6. Concerto for violin, Mendelssohn (2d and 3d movements), played by Otto Freiberg of Naumburg. Tone and technique betray good foundations and tentative study.

"7. Concerto for piano, Chopin (F minor, 3d and 3d movements), played by Miss Emily Matthews, of London.—Showed a respectable fund of execution, equal to her task; room for finer shading, &c.

"8. Hungarian Concerto, for violin, by Joachim (1st movement), played by Aug. Wilhelm, of Weisbaden.—Praised in the highest degree.

VIENNA. Mme. Mulder-Fabbri (who sang in New York and Boston with Stigelli) has distinguished herself in the rôle of Valentine in the Huguenots. Herr Walter was the Raoul. Next followed Meyerbeer again—L'Etoile du Nord, in which the part of Peter is said to have been marvellously sung by Herr Beck.—Adelina Patti is said to be already reengaged by Merelli for the months of February, March and April of next year.—No great success without its parody! says the Gazette Musicale. When Catalani was at the height of her career, they played in Vienna a piece called La Fausse Catalani; and now the Josephstadt theatre announces La Fausse Patti: the principal part to be played by Herr Siebert, who, they say, imitates the singing of "the diva Adelina" to perfection.—The tenor Wachtel has been engaged at the Court Theatre at a salary of 18,000 florins per annum, with a congé of three months.

At the Court Theatre from the 4th to the 10th of May, the following operas were given: Robert le Diable (Mme. Fabbri as Alice), Lohengrin, "Lalla-Roukh" (by F. David, not relished by the Viennese apparently), L'Etoile du Nord, and Les Huguenots. Mme. Fabbri is to stay through the season.—Offenbach had arrived, to preside over the bringing out of a romantic opera, "The Daughter of the Rhine," which he has composed for Treumann's theatre.

The newly discovered Mass by Robert Schumann was executed in two churches on the same day, May 3.—List was expected.—Merelli's Italian troupe next Spring is to include, besides Patti, Mlle. Trebelli and Signors Giuglini and Bettini.—Ferdinand Stegmayer, conductor of the Sing-akademie, died last month.

HANNOVER. Gluck's "Orpheus" was produced here for the first time on the 15th of April, at the suggestion of Herr Joachim, who conducted the performance. Fräulein Weis (said to be betrothed to Joachim) won the highest praise by her noble and artistic rendering of the part of Orpheus. Mme. Caggiati did equal justice to Eurydice; and Frl. Abrieh to that of Amor. Chorus and orchestra were excellent.

COLOGNE. On the 19th ult., a matinée was given, under the direction of Herr Ferdinand Hiller, in the Casino, for the Schadow Monument in Düsseldorf. After Chopin's "Funeral March," Herr Zadernak, of the theatre here, recited a poem, by Dr. Wolfgang Müller, in memory of Schadow. The programme included, further, the Twenty-third Psalm, for female chorus, by Wold Bargiel; Pianoforte Trio, op. 70, in D, by Beethoven (Herron Ferdinand Hiller, Von Königsgow and A. Schmidt); "Nachtlied" and "Volklied," for female chorus, Herr Ferdinand Hiller; and J. S. Bach's Concerto for Three Grand Pianos, admirably executed by Mlle. Mathilde Bruch, of the Conservatory here, Herren Hiller and Bargiel. Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess Zu Hohenzollern, with their family, and the Prince of Altenburg, were present.—On the 28th ult., the sixth and last Soirée for Chamber Music took place in the small room of the Gürzenich. The programme comprised Beethoven's Quartet in A major, op. 18, No. 5; Pianoforte Trio, op. 6, in F major, by W. Bargiel (the pianoforte part being played by the composer); and Mendelssohn's Quintet for stringed instruments, op. 87, in which Herren F. Weber and C. Venth performed. These soirées have been more numerous attended during the present season than they were last.

London.

HIS MAJESTY'S THEATRE.—The principal event of the last month was the production of the long promised new opera, Nicola de' Lapi, by Signor Schira, since Garcia the first master of singing in London, a sound musician, and not at all fond of Verdi. It appears to have been a success; and certainly it was brought out under the best conditions, since the parts were taken by some of the very best of the great singers: Milles, Tietjens and Trebelli, Signors Giuglini and Bettini, M. Gassier and Mr. Santley. One critic says the new opera is a happy example of what is roughly designated by the phrase "good second-rate" composition. "It would be vain to pretend that the work is a masterpiece; but it is genuine music, and it is not dull." "No remarkable brilliancy of melody, nor originality of setting; but it is delightfully vocal, as might be expected from the chief of a great school of singing; it has the true glow and swing of the Italian manner; and there is a general air of freedom and lightness about the writing, which marks the hand of the practised musician." The Musical World says of it:

The success was doubly flattering to the composer, inasmuch as he had a somewhat cumbrously constructed story to illustrate by his music. The plot is taken from a well-known romance by the Marquis Massimo d'Azeglio, founded upon an incident in the history of the Florentine republic, at the time of Pope Clement VII.; and most of the characters are historical. The drama, although containing one or two powerful situations, does not hold the attention spell-bound. The entrance of Selvaggia in the first scene awakens an interest which is not sustained, and our sympathy, but for the music, would be but little excited in favor of Niccolò de' Lapi, the patriot, Landomia, his gentle daughter, or Lamberto, the republican warrior, her betrothed. At the same time there are passages in the story of Nicola de' Lapi calculated, we can understand, to fascinate a composer who looks to particular scenes and incidents rather than to the general march of the "passionate." Signor Schira's opera is that of a musician who has a thorough command of the resources of his art; his music is stamped with the martial vigor and republican spirit which breathes in the story; it has abundance of tune, and is everywhere dramatic and effective.

With the above exception, several weeks presented nothing new. Lucrezia Borgia and the Trovatori (with a new contralto, Mlle. Therise Ellinger); then Trebelli as Rosina in the Barber, and again as the gypsy Azucena. Then Lucia; then La Figlia, with Mlle. Artôt; and Trovatori again, with Alboni, and so on.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—The report reads much the same as last year: PATTI is still the word. On the 7th of May the little "diva" made her first appearance in the Sonnambula, "singing with even more brilliancy and expression than last year." Then she played Rosina in the Barber, with Mario and Ronconi. William Tell has been performed, with Tamherlik, Faure and Formes; and La Traviata, with Mlle. Fioretti, and a new baritone, Colonese, "with a remarkably good voice, of which he has yet to learn the use"; and Tell again, three times; and the Barber again; and Don Giovanni, with Patti for Zerlina; and Martha, with a new soprano, Mlle. Demi, Mario being Lionel; and Masaniello, and Patti again with her "inimitable" Zerlina. The sister Patti (Carlotta), too, is promised,—"two Patties," as PUNCH sings:

Your new Bill of Fare,
My dear Gye, I declare,
With embarrass de richesses you smother,
When at bottom and top
Of your bill down you pop
Two Patties, one after the other.

CRYSTAL PALACE.—The grand performance of Mendelssohn's music to Athalie—to inaugurate the tenth season, on Friday the 1st inst.—realized all the success anticipated. The band and chorus were two thousand five hundred strong, and the solo parts were allotted to Mlle. Parepa, Miss Martin and Madame Sainton-Dolby.

Of the execution it is impossible to speak too highly. The choir, indeed, surpassed all former efforts; and it does not require very acute ears to discover the extraordinary improvement in the soprano voices—we especially allude to members of the Sacred Harmonic Society, which supplied the major part of the "London Contingent" in the Handel Festival Choir. There was, perhaps, not the same thrilling effect produced as at Exeter Hall, where Athalie had been heard some weeks previously; but allowance must be made for the impossibility of some fourteen thousand persons scattered over an immense area hearing all to equal advantage.—Musical World.

MADAME JENNY LIND GOLDSCHMIDT.—The concert was for the benefit of the Royal Hospital of Incurables at Putney, and the programme consisted of Handel's L'Allegro and Il Penseroso, preceded by one of the same composer's concertos for string instruments. Madame Goldschmidt was assisted by Madame Lemmens-Sherrington, Miss Lascelles, Mr. Mount Smith, and Mr. Weiss; and Mr. Goldschmidt presided over the band and chorus, which consisted of some 250 performers; Mr. Lindsay Sloper was at the pianoforte, and Mr. E. J. Hopkins at the organ.

It is not our habit to criticize performances got up for charitable purposes. We may say, nevertheless, that Handel's Cantata was, to a large part of the audience, a novelty, it having been rarely heard as a whole since Handel's time. L'Allegro ed Il Penseroso was last performed in 1813 under the direction of Sir George Smart. Some few years ago Mr. Hallah brought out the first part, but was not induced to repeat it. Even last week at St. James's Hall the cantata was not given precisely as Handel wrote it. The cantata was originally entitled L'Allegro, Il Penseroso ed Il Moderato; Charles Jennens, author of the books of the Messiah and Belshazzar, having added a third part to Milton's poem, which so pleased Handel that he set the three parts together. Il Moderato, after a few performances, was "shelved," and has never (happily) been revived.

The chief points of the performance were, we need hardly say, the airs allotted to Madame Lind, of which, "Come rather, goddess," "Sweet bird, that shunn'st the noise of folly" (flute obligato, Mr. Pratten), "Hide me from day's garish eye"—all allotted to Penseroso—most thrillingly exemplified her powers, and (especially the Bird song) were rapturously applauded. That the great singer had lost nothing of her art was apparent in all her efforts, and though, as far as regarded her physical means, Madame Lind is no longer the Jenny Lind of 1847, she still retains her supremacy as a vocalist. Madame Lemmens Sherrington sang the music of Allegro very charmingly. Miss Lascelles gave due effect to the contralto songs; and Mr. Mount Smith and Mr. Weiss did ample justice to the tenor and bass music. The band and chorus under the able direction of Herr Otto Goldschmidt were in all respects excellent.—Ibid.

HERR PAUER'S HISTORICAL PIANOFORTE PERFORMANCES.—The third performance, on Monday, was devoted to composers of the German school—unless we may except Herr Anton Rubinstein, who is a Russian, and not much of a composer—the first period dating from 1680. Herr Pauer commenced with Kuhnau, whom he styles the "inventor of the sonata," and gave his sonata in B flat. This was followed by the "Suite Seconde pour le Clavecin," in A major, of Matthison—"the diplomatist, linguist, actor, singer, &c."—including "Toccata, Allemande, Courante, Aria, Gigue." From Kuhnau to Sebastian Bach was a jump of about twenty years only. The sample of the works of the great composer of Eisenbach, Weimar and Leipzig was the "Partita," No. 1, in B flat, comprising Preludium, Allemande, Courante, Sarabande, Minuets and Gigue. Wilhelm Friedemann Bach, eldest son of Sebastian, supplied Polonaise (No. 2) in C minor, and Fuga (No. 6) in E minor. From the works of Johann Ludwig Krebs, a favorite pupil of Sebastian Bach, we had "Prelude and Fugue in A minor." Carl Philip Emanuel and John Christian, second and eleventh sons of Sebastian Bach, furnished—the former, Sonata in A minor (Op. 2, No. 1), the latter, Sonata in A major, (No. 5 Op. 17). The composers of the third period, ranging from 1790 to 1825, included August Eberhard Muller, from whose works was selected "Caprice in C minor," (Op. 39, No. 24); Johann Wenzel Tomaschek—the son of a poor linen-weaver—whose style was exemplified in "Two Eclogues (Op. 25);" and Johann Hugo Wörzischek, represented by "Two Rhapsodies" (Op. 1, No. 6 and 8). Mendelssohn, Schuhooff and Rubinstein represented the "Fourth Period." From Mendelssohn was selected the "Seventeen Variations Sérieuses" (Op. 54); from Schuhooff, Two Idylls, "Etoile du Soir" (Op. 36, No. 1) and "Dans les Bois" (Op. 27, No. 2); and from Herr Rubinstein, "Barcarolle" (Op. 30) and Polonaise, "Le Bal" (No. 3, Op. 44). The performance was, perhaps, a greater treat to antiquaries and musical historians than to amateurs and connoisseurs of the pianoforte. Certain pieces, nevertheless, were highly interesting on their own account, especially when so strongly recommended by the vigorous playing of Herr Pauer.

THE BROOKLYN PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.—The annual statement of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society for the past year shows that it now contains 793 members, and 158 professional subscribers. Five concerts have been given during the past season. The receipts from all sources were $7,813 03; disbursements, $7,440 03, leaving a balance of $373 40 on hand.

MESSRS. CHICKERING & SONS have just completed No. 25,000 of their excellent pianos. We are happy to hear that never were their instruments in such demand. The only trouble is that orders come in faster than it is possible to execute them. Thousands must rejoice in this renewed prosperity of a house, a name, which has been so long a pride of Boston and the Union.

Schumann's "Paradise and the Peri."

SECOND ARTICLE.

We left the Peri on her first search for the gift most dear to Heaven. "Her pinions fanned the air of that sweet Indian land", whose earthly Paradise, rhapsodically described in the beautiful chorus (No. 5) with which we left off, already smells (not swells, as our types had it) of death, whose streams are red with blood. The key has changed; a few bars of dark and threatening tremolo lead into the thrillingly dramatic and heroic scenes, which with the great chorus (Nos. 6—9), conclude the first part of the Cantata.

6. A fiercely energetic chorus (D flat), opening with tenor voices, full of wild alarm, and hurried movement in the orchestra:

But crimson now her rivers run
With human blood.

Land of the Sun! what foot invades
Thy Pagoda, shrines, and Idol stones,
Thy Monarchs and their thousand Thrones?

The voices are suspended momentarily, as if listening to the scouring blast of battle in a swift, wild gust of instrumental symphony, before they answer, while the same symphony is spending itself: "Tis He of Gazna! in his fierce wrath he comes." Tenors and basses then divide into two opposing choruses; the basses in unison, barbaric: "Long live Gazna!"; the tenors in harmony, ringing heroic: "The tyrant he shall die!" Then another bit of symphony, suggestive of the tumult and the very thick of battle, clash of swords and whirl of arrows, and (here the art is shown) the strange wild modulation of the mingled mass of sound, so near to nature, and yet musical, and just long enough.

7. Tenor solo, recitative-like, with flowing serious accompaniment, tells how the Peri Beholds a youthful warrior stand,

Alone, beside his native river—
The red blade broken in his hand,
And the last arrow in his quiver.

"Long live Gazna!" breaks out again in full chorus (tenors and basses), with the battle tumult for accompaniment; and Gazna (bass solo) bids the youth surrender, offering him his life. The splendid declamation of the few bars, in which the young hero hurls back his defiance, is unsurpassed in oratorio or opera. It needs a robust, high and ringing tenor. A half dozen bars of the instruments (the flight of an arrow, vainly aimed, a pause, quick startled chords) announce the result; which becomes at once the theme of the next number:

8. Chorus of lamentation; sopranos and altos in four parts alternate with tenors and basses divided in like manner; key F sharp minor:

—Woe! woe!
False flew the shaft, though pointed well,
The Tyrant lives, the Hero fell!

This is indeed a most beautiful and touching chorus. The exclamations "Woe! woe!" are given out in long tones, in thirds, first the sopranos, the altos joining while their sound is still protracted; then the basses, joined in like manner by the tenors. The higher instruments join with the long wail of the voices, while between them and prolonged tones of sub-bass a contrapuntal cello figure steadily traverses the space upward and downward, making the reluctant harmonies to blend more readily (for these are only passing discords, or rather harshnesses; it is motion, intention, direction that explains them and resolves them, as in so much that otherwise might seem harsh in Bach's perfect contrapuntal weaving). But what have we to do with these technicalities? It is the expression of this chorus, that we would draw attention to:—who can hear it and still say that Schumann never "appeals" to the heart!

9. Finale to Part I. This is the great number of the work. A few bars of thoughtful prelude, and the Tenor in a tone encouraging and tender, almost melting into song, tells how the Peri saw the young hero offer up his life, and,

Swiftly descending on a ray
Of morning light, she caught the last—
Last glorious drop his heart had shed,
Before its free-born spirit fled!

A harp comes in with heavenly suggestion, and the Peri's heart leaps high, and her voice too, as she exclaims:

Peri and Chorus.

Be this {thy} gift at the Gates of Light!
For blood like this,
For Liberty shed, so holy is,
It would not stain the purest rill
That sparkles among the Bowers of Bliss!
Oh, if there be, on this earthly sphere,
A boon, an offering Heaven holds dear,
'Tis the last libation Liberty draws
From the heart that bleeds and breaks in her cause!

Winged by the shining arpeggios, her clear soprano cleaves the sky; and while they swoop down to earth, her voice goes straight to the highest mark, they rushing after to rejoin it there. But this is only momentary foreshine of the real climax, which comes a few bars later, when she strike the high A again, flashing down in trumpet tones (silvery trumpets in thirds accompanying), on the words "for LIBERTY shed," which wakes the chorus to repeat the phrase in a broader and still brighter blaze of harmony. The Peri leads off in an exulting strain in very lively tempo: the chorus takes it up, and works it up (as musicians say) with wondrous wealth of harmony and counterpoint; faster and faster; an exciting, whirling, glorious on-sweep of mutually pursuing, richly mingling sounds; written in long notes, because each so full of weight and energetic accent, but swiftly executed; now climbing to a height of ecstasy and holding out the tone through many measures in the upper part, while the other parts pursue their restless impulse; now subsiding to more level, quiet harmony; while from time to time the ardent Peri's voice is still heard "singing and soaring", lark-like, at Heaven's gate, leading and marshalling the vast choir on and upward, and fanning the sacred flame of aspiration and of triumph. How she lengthens out the rapturous high tones just before the end! Like the skylark, she seems to float there in that upper air, (that "privacy of glorious light") poised upon even wings, which vibrate ecstatic music. Our Peri is after the spirit both of Shelley's and of Wordsworth's Skylark; for while she soars, she also thinks of earth; she is heavenly and yet human,

Higher still and higher
From the earth thou springest,
Like a cloud of fire;
The blue deep thou wingest,
And singing still dost soar, and soaring ever singest.
In the golden lightning
Of the setting sun
O'er which clouds are brightening,
Then dost float and run,
Like an unbodied joy whose race is just begun.

At the same time her sympathies are with Man in this grand Liberty chorus, this apotheosis of patriotic martyrdom:

—Thou dost pour upon the world a flood
Of harmony, with instinct more divine;
Type of the wise, who soar, but never roam;
True to the kindred points of Heaven and Home!

We have ventured the opinion that this Finale of the First Part is the greatest piece in "Paradise and the Peri"; and in that view it seems almost a pity that it could not have formed the close and climax of the whole Cantata; but the closing piece, when we come to it, though less great in itself, will be found worthy of its place, a fit song of triumph crowning the successful search. This hymn of the holiness of "blood for Liberty shed" is surely in a right heroic, manly, wholesome vein; if there is more than enough of mystical and tender sentiment, of drowsy, dreamy Oriental luxury for Schumann's critics in other portions of the music, this certainly relieves them in strong contrast; for this, together with the whole series of pieces which we have just been endeavoring to describe, is altogether strong, dramatic and concise; and, properly performed, must thrill accordingly. It needs, to be sure, a large chorus, thoroughly drilled and animated, together with an orchestra, to make its relative importance fairly appreciable without study. With an amateur club of only twenty or thirty voices, and a piano-forte accompaniment, this was hardly the piece to make the greatest impression. Yet it did make a great one—and so timely too! It is a good piece, however, for a Finale to to-day's instalment of the too long task to which we find ourselves committed, and as we have got to stop somewhere short of the end, we will e'en stop here.

A New Libretto of Don Juan.

During the last eight years, various prominent members of the histrionic art, such as Franz Kugler, Alfred von Wolzogen, and Dr. Viol of Silesia, have sought to reproduce Da Ponte's version of Don Juan more in consonance with the original design, as rendered on the first representation, Oct. 29th, 1787. Finally, a new translation of the text has been offered to the Munich Theatre by Dr. Wendling; so this gem of musical art can henceforth be produced in a manner worthy of Mozart's genius. The original recitative has been retained, and the three arias subsequently added by Mozart: "In quai eccessi, o numi"; "Dalla sua pace"; "Deh fuggi," are placed in appropriate position. The equestrian statue will, according to the first edition of the text, be placed as a simple statue in a chapel-like mausoleum. The Finale to the opera will be purged of its too tangible hell; the fireworks, and red devils with flaxen hair and fiery jaws (which suited the taste of our forefathers), will be replaced by tongues of fire and clouds of gauze. Don Juan simply disappears.—This will be welcome news to the musical public, and we may reasonably expect to hear Mozart's immortal work given here in accordance with his original intention, and enjoy its manifold beauties uncurtailed.

WAGNER'S "TRISTAN."—The Imperial Opera in Vienna, after a half-year of rehearsals (57 in number) of Richard Wagner's Tristan and Isolde, has finally concluded to give up the idea of its performance, the part of Isolde being beyond the powers of endurance of the principal artists. The next attempt is now being made at Prague. Very characteristic and true is the assertion made by Robert Schumann to a prominent author in Vienna, concerning Wagner's operas, ten years since: "Wagner is no good musician; he lacks the idea of form and euphony. But you should not judge him from the Piano score. Many scenes from his operas, as heard from the stage, will not fail to impress you deeply. If not the clear sunlight, that genius emits, there is yet some mysterious spell to enchain our senses. But, as was said, the music apart from the representation is deficient, often too much of the diletante order, again mediocre and repulsive; and it is alas! a proof of perverted musical taste, when, with all the numerous dramatic masterworks that Germany has to show, preference should be so often given to "music of the Future."

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

The venerable, and highly esteemed DR. HODGES, for many years the distinguished organist of Trinity Church, New York, and director of the music of that parish, has within a short time resigned his position, and on Wednesday the 3d inst., he embarked in the steamship "Persia" for England.

For the past three years, Dr. Hodges has been compelled from feeble health to live in retirement, and relinquish all participation in the musical services of the church, and the position he once so much adorned, by his rare musical learning, skill and talent, as well as by his truly Christian character, has now passed into other hands; worthy we hope to fill that position in the church, which the talents and virtues of Dr. Hodges have in past years rendered so prominent and distinguished.

Inquiries having been made regarding the publication of certain portions of Dr. Hodges's compositions for the church, it may be well to state that the collection of psalm and hymn tunes, chants, Communion and Burial Services, as formerly used in Trinity Church, New York, including valuable additions by the Editor of the work, will be issued by Messrs. O. Ditson & Co., early in the ensuing autumn.

This collection of Church Music is earnestly recommended to the attention of all persons interested in the subject, and especially to those who desire a purer, and better style of music, than is usually found in our churches.

ORGANS will probably become the leading musical subject hereabouts for the year to come, so much will the musical mind be turned in that direction by the opening of the Great Organ in the Boston Music Hall next Autumn. And this reminds us that we had designed ere this to call attention to a new Journal, of which we have seen several numbers, devoted chiefly to the discussion of questions relating to the duties and the art of Organists and Organ-builders. It is called The Monthly Choir and Organ Journal, published at 452 Broome St., New York, and is edited by Mr. JOHN ZUNDEL, the distinguished organist, who is highly qualified to diffuse wholesome light upon such subjects. We hope we are not heaping coals of fire on anybody's head!

By our reports of "Music Abroad" it will be seen that one of our Boston boys, the son of Mr. PETERSILEA, the well known music teacher, who went to Europe hardly a year ago to complete his musical studies at the Conservatorium, in Leipzig, has distinguished himself at the annual examination of that famous school. The standard there is high, and young Petersilea's piano playing is pronounced (by one of the critical journals) "the best of the evening," while all the rest are praised. This speaks well, not only for the pupil, but also for his only teacher, his father, from whose hands he so lately went to Leipzig.

It is said that Manager MARSHALL intends to give a series of grand PROMENADE CONCERTS at the Boston Theatre (Academy of Music) this Summer, under the conductorship of Mr. CARL ZERRAHN.

OUR CORRESPONDENCE from New York and Philadelphia must cease to be regular for the remainder of the Summer, for the reason that there is no music to speak of, and that correspondents are sensible enough to wish to rusticate a little. Would'n't we do so, if we could! We are sorry, however, not to have one more letter reviewing the Gluck's "Orpheus" experiment in New York. We are privately assured, though, by good judges, that the performance was a great failure, that the noble work was travestied, so that the common run of musical sensationists could not have been expected to find much in it, and therefore the less said the better.—But pray send at leisure, O thou of the musical signature, that resumé raisonné of the past musical season in New York, and "on 'over the hills and far away'" to heart's content, so you come back again when Music comes!

BOSTON MUSIC HALL ASSOCIATION.—The annual meeting of this Association was held in Chickering's Hall Wednesday at 3½ P.M., Dr. J. Baxter Upham in the chair. A more than ordinarily full attendance of stockholders was present. The report of the Treasurer, John Rogers, Esq., was read, showing the receipts for the past year to have been $4983 92, and the expenses $5973 60, being an excess of expenses over receipts of $989 88.

This deficit, it was stated, was owing, in part, to the closing of the hall consequent upon the arrival of the great organ, and also to the absence during the past year, of all rents from fairs, which have heretofore added largely to the receipts. It was also stated, as an indisputable fact, that the number of concerts and musical entertainments of various kinds have decreased within the last few years.

The treasurer's report having been accepted and placed on file, the President being called upon gave a brief sketch of the Grand Organ enterprise from its first inception down to the present time—touching upon several interesting incidents and events in the history of its progress—and mentioning in detail some of its many points of surpassing beauty and excellence—showing the care and toil and patient study that has been bestowed during the last seven years upon this great work, on the part of all concerned, no pains nor expense being spared to make it what it is, the best, most perfect and comprehensive work of the kind in the world. It is indeed a marvel of art and skill, and will be prominent as a permanent object of attraction in our city.

It was stated that the setting up of the organ would be completed in October. Its cost will be fifty or sixty thousand dollars, and it is now some seven years since the work was first projected. It will be the combined result of the experience of all the noted builders of the world, and will amply repay the time and labor spent on it.

The Board of Directors for the ensuing year was chosen as follows:

J. B. Upham, R. E. Apthorp, E. D. Brigham, J. M. Fessenden, H. W. Pickering, Eben Dale, J. F. Putnam.

EMIL PRUDENT, the pianist, died recently in Paris.

The decease of the well known composer and arranger, Fred. Beyer, in Mainz, Germany, is announced.

Both are names dear to music publishers, both here and abroad, and very familiar to piano-forte teachers and pupils.

GRU'S ITALIAN OPERA company are still performing, with fair success, in Western cities. Brignoli is with them.—Mme. ANNA BISHOP is making a concert tour of the New England States.

WAGNER IN ZURICH. The many admirers of the eminent composer of "Music of the Future," Richard Wagner, are rejoicing at his recent brilliant successes in Russia. Many of his finest operas were written while a resident of Zurich, and his wonderful creation of "Tannhäuser" was first brought out at our city theatre, under his own direction, he supervising the minutest details of stage arrangements, and overlooking each separate article of dress, even to the stockings of the chorus, which he imperatively demanded should in no instance be other than silk.—His dwelling-house was situated upon a charming hill on the western bank of Lake Zurich, on the very spot formerly occupied by a little summer house, where Lavater used to repair every Saturday afternoon to prepare his sermon for the succeeding day. It commands one of the finest and broadest views in the vicinity, including a whole half circle of Alps on the south.

IN A NUTSHELL. The following paragraph, which we find in the Chorister and Musical Adviser, a monthly paper published in New York, contains the whole art and science of the psalm-tune manufacturer.—Ringing the changes upon given numbers would seem to be his idea of musical creation. His trade is lucrative, and by a simple mathematical computation he assures himself and us that his stock in trade will not soon be exhausted. Hear:

An English mathematician has made a computation of the number of tunes that can possibly be made from the notes of only one octave. He finds that from the major-scale alone, when used only in one key, 40,320 different tunes may be constructed, without any repetition. Of course the same number can be made from the minor-scale; so that in the natural key alone there can be 80,640 different tunes. Singing six of these each Sabbath in the year, it would take nearly two hundred and sixty years to sing them. Now when we consider that there are twelve major and twelve minor keys, and that the rhythmical combinations are still greater than those arising from the notes, we can see that we cannot begin to know the endless variety yet to come. Go on, then, tune-makers. There is room enough for you all to spread yourselves. Be original, don't imitate one another so much. You can't possibly use up all the ground before the war is over.

Could not some cute Yankee invent a machine to do it?

CAMBRIDGEPORT. Wallace's Opera "Lurline" was sung here by a society of amateurs, under the direction of Mr. Jos. B. SHARLAND, on Monday evening, June 1st. Miss ADDIE S. RYAN sang the part of Lurline in a manner which gave pleasure to every listener; we have never heard her when she appeared to better advantage. The other soloists were apt in their parts, and some of them made quite an impression. The chorus numbered over forty voices, prompt and efficient in every respect.—The proceeds were given for the relief of the families of deceased volunteers from Cambridge. Great praise is due Mr. Sharland and the society for the admirable manner in which this work was given. We only remember of its being given once before in this country, although it may have been. We refer to its performance under direction of Mr. Geo. W. Morgan in New York.

[If we mistake not, it was given during the past Spring at South Boston, by another club of amateurs.—ED.]

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS. The 128th Concert (London), on Monday night, passed off in a wonderfully cheerful manner. All the instrumental pieces were by Mendelssohn. The departure of M. Viouxtemps, the absence of Herr Joachim, and the impracticability (not his own fault) of M. Sainton, made the question of a first fiddle one of some difficulty. Mr. Arthur Chapell, however (as is his wont), speedily solved it; and the hitherto unknown name of Herr Japha was announced. That Herr Japha is a practised artist, was soon made apparent in the quartet, Op. 12 (E flat), with which the concert opened brilliantly. The quaint canzonetta (G minor), which occupies the place of scherzo, was unanimously encored, and the new violinist's position thus at once established. The other players in the quartet were M. L. Ries, H. Webb and Piatti. Her Japha subsequently joined M. Hallé and Signor Piatti in the second trio (C minor), with which the concert ended as brilliantly as it had begun, and M. Hallé (in excellent play) selected the well known Andante and Rondo capriccioso (E minor) for solo, and being encored, substituted two of the Lieder ohne Worte; he also joined Signor Piatti in the charming Tema con variazioni (D), which has on several occasions delighted the patrons of those concerts, but never more completely so than now.

"FASHIONABLE"—yes, that's the word. In musical criticism it is sometimes exceedingly difficult to adapt one's style to one's subject; but here is an instance, taken from the New York Sunday Times, where happily the right vein is hit, and the prominent characteristics of a phenomenon are seized and held up in their true light. To be sure, it wanders a little from the main point in the second paragraph, talking about a charm that is "artistic," "spirituelle," and all that, but it returns to the keynote and ends in it, as a true composition should.

The Gottschalk concerts are very fashionable, there is no doubt of that. They are put down in the list with opera, with shopping, with dropping in at Mrs. B——'s reception, and other things that must be done, and bring out more of the stylish girls, who are the adoration of the clerks of the establishment they patronize, than any other public entertainment that New York city can boast. Not that the young ladies are "all in love with Gottschalk," as vulgar newspaper writers sometimes say; on the contrary, they are not at all in love with him, or, at any rate, not in the sort of way that need cause the slightest uneasiness to father, mother, or even accepted lover.

The charm which attaches to the great pianist is artistic, the interest he inspires, tender, but spirituelle, not at all of the hearty, material kind which healthy girls take in the gentlemen of whom they intend to make lovers and husbands. Gottschalk, in public, has the air of being either indifferent or absorbed—indifferent to others, absorbed, perhaps, in his art or in himself, and this does not suit our haughty belles, who require homage in return for their devotion.

Nevertheless, the Gottschalk concerts are fashionable; they are patronized by nearly all married ladies of distinction and recognized position, and, as a matter of course, by the light brigade, in buff and lavender kids, who are always found fluttering in the vicinity of persons who give large entertainments and have handsome daughters.

The proper dress, on these occasions, is remarkably elegant and tasteful. It is not so gay, or so nearly like evening full-dress toilette, as that allowed for the opera, it not being considered in good taste to dress in such a way as to distract attention from the artist and from the performances. But the most charming bonnets of white crêpe, or puffed tulle, are worn, lightly trimmed and slightly depressed on the top, accompanied by small velvet basquines, or scarfs, lined with white taffetas, with dress of the pale drab, grey, or lilac silk, ornamented with full narrow ruches of the same material &c., &c.

This, then, it seems, is what is meant by an artistic success!

PITY PATTI. A New York weekly tells a story, which is going the round of the newspapers, in its own pretty style, as follows:

Yes, pity Patti—the charming Adelina, we mean,—for if her own story is correct, she is very much to be pitied. According to the Paris correspondent of the Courier des Etats Unis, she has been crossed in love and fearfully depleted in pocket. The pecuniary loss she doesn't mind, but the heart affair cuts deeper. It seems she has addressed a letter to the press, over the water, in which she intimates that the Pater Patti, her sire, and her brother-in-law, M. Strakosch, have used her vilely—in fact, choused her out of one hundred thousand dollars and a husband. All her earnings, it appears, have passed into their hands—and remained there. Not a fig does pretty Patti care for the money. She can make more, by discounting the notes of which her dainty throat is full. But to be prevented from getting married is a more serious affair. She was wooed and won, we are told, by a rich and honorable Spanish don. He implored Patti's pity and Patti pitied him. She asked her papa about it, and he replied that if the don's paternal derivative said "ay," he said ditto. The senior don did say "ay," and there seemed to be no "just cause or impediment," &c., &c. But at this point the elder Patti turned ogreish, forbade the banns, and refused to let the sweet songbird bill and coo with her intended mate. Then forbearance ceased to be a virtue, and she told her sad story to the public through the newspapers. And won't the public sympathize with its favorite? Rather! Miss Patti lacks some six months or so of twenty-one, and she wishes to be taken in charge by the English Court of Chancery until she obtains her majority. If the said Court of Chancery has a spark of gallantry about it, it will comply with her request.

TERESA CARRERO was to leave Havana on her return to New York, on the 30th June. She has won a most splendid success there, receiving, besides other flattering testimonials, under her sweet pet name of "Teresita," membership in the Havana Lyceum, which many able artists have striven after in vain for half a lifetime.

SCHUMANN-OPHOBIA still rages in England. The critic of the Athenaeum, in a recent number, utters himself in this wise about the composer of the "Peri" and the "Manfred" music, the noble symphonies, &c.

We cannot, for the sake of a few songs (which make a sort of oasis, overvalued by reason of the barrenness of the desert which they diversify), and a few juvenile pieces for the pianoforte, disdained by their writer as obvious and trivial, consent to "enter on the list" of great composers a man so deficient in melody, so licentious to impurity in harmony, so imperfect in technical skill, and so frequently false in expression, as Schumann. It is a treason to beauty, to truth, to knowledge, to represent him (as Germany is now disposed to do) in the light of Beethoven's continuer—as the man in the depths of whose poetic genius the shallow and correct works of Mendelssohn are being rapidly swept out of sight to their right level, as so many mediocrities.

This dreary platitudinal utter want of freshness if not feeling—have, nevertheless, a great advantage for the person who can induce his audiences to consider him as profound. The public comes to prize the plainest of chords, the most obvious of contrivances, the most paltry bar of stale melody, by contrast, as so many revelations.

PHILADELPHIA.—The sixth and last classical soirée of Mr. CARL WOLFSOHN took place May 28, with the following programme, which certainly is out of the beaten track, though all the names are classical:

Part I. Sonata (C major, op. 24). C. M. Von Weber. Played by Mr. Wolfsohn.

Part II. 1. Fantasia-Stücke (for Clarinet and Piano). Schumann. Messrs. Stoll and Wolfsohn.

2. Sonata in F major (Horn and Piano). Beethoven. Messrs. Birgfeld and Wolfsohn.

Part III. Sestetto (Piano and wind instruments). Onslow. Messrs. Koch, Stoll, Birgfeld, Müller and Wolfsohn.

The musical season proper is winding up with one or two remaining Public Rehearsals of the Germania Orchestra. This was the last programme:

1—Overture; Fra Diavolo. Auber
2—Serenade. Schubert
3—Waltz: The Troubadours. Lanner
4—Andante of Jupiter Symphony. Mozart
5—Overture; Prometheus (by request). Weber
6—Cavatina; Prophecy. Meyerbeer
7—First Finale: Martha. Flotow

During the summer months the "city of brotherly love," when it wants musical refreshment, will betake itself occasionally to Fairmount park, where Bandmaster Birgfeld, having made up a large subscription for the purpose, will give a number of open air concerts.

The Lutheran and Missionary says:

We claim that at the present time, Philadelphia is not unmusical. But one thing is very certain, that its taste is better developed in every other department of the art than in Church music. The popular funeral march for a military band is Chopin's. Very good so far. At the Saturday afternoon popular Rehearsals, where the programme is miscellaneous, selections from Beethoven or Mozart are uniformly insisted upon. Still very good. Beethoven's Fiddio packed the Academy,—the fullest and most enthusiastic audience known for many years. Also very good. But in church, at least in the Protestant churches, woe be to the man who hopes to find much music appropriate to the place. Snatches of operas, incoherent fantasias, finger exercises, startling combinations of the stops, see-saw on the swell pedal, these things are actually popular in many of the first churches. The idea of a style of music peculiar to the place, different from other music, is generally ignored. Such churchly playing as that of Mr. Zundel of Brooklyn, or Mr. Paine of Boston, would be generally insufferable.

MR. C. JEROME HOPKINS lately gave a "piano forte and vocal concert in aid of a fund for supporting a Brooklyn Free Chorister School," and has issued a brief treatise addressed to the intelligent citizens of Brooklyn entitled "Free Musical Instruction for the Poor." At the concert Mrs. Jenny Kempton, Mr. Reis, Mr. Brannlich, Mr. Rudiger and Mr. E. Mollenhauer assisted. The programme was "eminently Hopkinsonian."

WINNER'S PERFECT GUIDES FOR THE FIFTH, FLAGEOLET, FLUTE, GUITAR, ACCORDION AND VIOLIN. Each, 50

One would think, from the general appearance of keyed instruments in houses, and the preponderance of music for them in stores, that no one played anything now-a-days, but pianos and melodeons. But there are multitudes who practice upon the smaller instruments. For such, Winner's guides are very extensively used, and are thought to be among the best of cheap instruction books.

WHOLE No. 580.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JUNE 27, 1863.

VOL. XXIII. No. 7.

Translated for this Journal.

Hector Berlioz.

Let us now examine a fragment of one of his Overtures, which is profound, scientific and beautiful, in order to see if the opinions of R. Wagner were too severe upon him. I select the Adagio of the Frances Juges Overture; it was written to an opera, but also belongs to programme-music.

The Overture contains the chief incidents of the opera, and is not without merit, as representing the imagined feelings of the dramatis personæ. One must regard them, as the composer has portrayed them: with the assistance of the title, the "Frances Juges," endeavoring to find out, by the music, what the composer has so skilfully expressed.

The defendant is led with bandaged eyes before the judges, who in a gloomy place, at midnight, pronounce their terrible sentences, and execute immediately the criminal, in case of his proven guilt. In extreme anguish he stands there scarcely daring to breathe.

Adagio Sostenuto.

This first period of six bars, considered scientifically, contains two phrases of three bars each. The second repeats the first phrase, one degree higher, a manner of construction of the simplest, clearest, most comprehensible style. There are no difficult successions or unpleasant modulations therein.

2nd Period. 13 bars.

The bandage is removed from the eyes of the prisoner, and horror seizes him at the dismal preparations before him; he trembles, and believes himself to be utterly lost. The end of this period from the (7th to the 13th bar) portrays his emotion at his unhappy situation; a psychological passage, the truth of which no one can judge, who has not observed a culprit before a tribunal, or placed himself in a like position.

In a technical point of view, the first six bars of this period, are elaborated from the first phrase of the first period. There, the theme was carried by the upper parts, here it is in the bass. It is throughout like it in rhythm, though the progression of the tonic is somewhat altered and it disappears in the sixth bar.

The seventh bar brings in a new subject, which in the next (eighth bar) continues, and which furnishes another idea, that in the ninth, tenth, and eleventh bars, which keep on in imitation. In the eleventh bar another theme is added to the former, which continues to the end of the period. There appear, then, in this period, thematic subjects obtained from the first period, and later new ones, employed precisely in the same manner as by other masters. And as such long periods are capable of being divided into several parts, so the foregoing may be separated into two smaller ones, viz., a seven-barred period, (from the first to the seventh, where a resolution into F minor, takes place) and a six-barred one, going from the eighth to the thirteenth bar.

Both the before-mentioned periods, together, from the first group of pictures. They resemble each other in their hidden meanings, and the imagination is engrossed with the situation of the criminal, and the nature of the emotions aroused by it.

Another incident now takes place: amongst the isolated entreaties and prayers for mercy from the prisoner, continually interrupted by the thundering "No!" of the chorus—the terrible accusation of the judge is heard, until, affrighted and exhausted by his fruitless attempts, he at last resigns himself to his fate, and succumbs. These are the chief points of the Adagio, as intimated by the title, and could not be treated effectively in any other way. Could any listener maintain that there is no resemblance between the music and the incidents therein depicted? Does not the effect answer the complete idea of the composer?

This can be demonstrated by the second group.

The third period, of eight bars, hardly needs comment.

It is formed of three distinct subjects, which are seen in the first, third, and fourth bars. The second phrase is a repetition of the first, in another key. A simpler, clearer melody cannot be constructed. The modulations are plain, but the instrumentation extremely effective in the powerful unison of the brass instruments.

The fourth period is similar, but the same themes are more difficult to recognize. Those dissimilar to each other, are found in the first, fourth, sixth, eighth, and ninth bars. The first is repeated in the second bar, but not easily recognized, from the legato, and contrary motion. The theme in the third bar continues the second subject originating in the former bars.

The subject in the fifth is a repetition of the fourth bar, with the exception of the last crotchet. That in the seventh is rhythmically like the first, but in regard to tone, more fully treated. One must have an expert glance, and a still more experienced ear, in order to comprehend the relation of these several subjects to each other, and to estimate the freer, and therefore more intricate construction of these periods individually considered.

The subject is completely finished in the following fifth period, where it may be seen that all the former ones are repeated. All masters introduce into their works direct repetitions, following each other through whole periods, especially when the model has a somewhat complicated structure, because they maintain that these modes of construction form an excellent method, absolutely indispensable to the coining of melody, and musical ideas. But our fifth period contains a new attraction, by the entrance of another accompaniment—the imitating octave figure in the different parts, which was obtained by analyzing the subject of the sixth bar of the preceding period.

The sixth period is woven throughout from the ninth bar of the fourth period. Also the slight resemblance in the sixth and seventh bars is not to be mistaken, when one glances at the foregoing fifth bar, where the fortissimo suddenly divides the second part of the theme.

At last, in the seventh period, appear, with the exception of the seventh bar, still earlier, existing subjects, and portions of themes. The first part of the subject in the first bar is a repetition of the second idea, which was heard in the ninth bar of the fourth period, for the first time. The second part of the theme is similar in rhythm, but changing its position. The second bar continues this. In the third, fourth and fifth bars, the first theme, of the first period, again emerges; the seventh bar shows the second phrase of the first period, without the first minim, and in contrary motion.

The first observation which the reader now makes to himself, probably, is, that in this little Adagio, which contains only seven periods, more subject matter is used, than lies at the elementary basis of the whole finale of Haydn's Symphony [which one? №.] of thirty-six periods. While this great model, strictly considered, is woven from only six different ideas; in this little Adagio of Berlioz there enter at least twelve new ones, differing from each other; and while in that finale, throughout, all the periods are formed from the first two subjects, there appear in this Adagio three periods containing entirely new subject matter. This observation is just. But although the finale in Haydn's Symphony may be an example of the strictest melodic treatment, the later masters, (and Haydn himself in many of his works) allowed freer ways of treatment; and I must here limit myself to the assurance that there are introductions to overtures, and symphonies of good masters, which are still more freely treated than the one in question, without therefore wishing to deny that they possess a good technical construction. I have here, unfortunately, given only one selected example, and could not show the beautiful instrumentation of the ideas; but the foregoing facts, it is to be hoped, will not contradict the subsequent statements.

This Adagio, for instance, does not violate any scientifically constructed rule, whether in regard to melody, rhythm, modulation or instrumentation; but it is, on the contrary, throughout, correct and clearly defined.

Within this legitimate barrier all are new ideas, and, in regard to their objective expression, are of a plastic skill, and fidelity, which can seldom be found clearer, or more effective in the best compositions of the great masters.

Berlioz proves himself also, in this his first little music sketch, to be, not merely an artist endowed with a great invention, and creative skill, but also one who preserves the essential laws of his art, has them completely under his control, and is a pleasing, rational, and truly great musician.

Were it possible, in the present space, to analyze the Allegro of the Overture, with all other compositions by him, just so intimately, it would be shown that he has accomplished no more than in the before mentioned Adagio.

Now, whence come the numerous opponents of this composer? whence the constant ignoring of his works in German concert rooms? One reason is, few search for themselves, but echo the sentiments of others. Among a hundred who fearlessly give their verdict against Berlioz, ninety-nine have never heard one of his compositions; still fewer have read one of his scores, but are familiar with newspaper opinions of him, which they take without proof, as correct, and spread abroad.

A second cause is the following. They concede that Berlioz continues Beethoven, but only in an exaggerated fashion. Beethoven may have also continued Mozart, but how differently! There is somewhat of truth in this observation, but also some injustice towards Berlioz. Beethoven in the commencement did not continue Mozart, but imitated him very faithfully. His first periods are all in Mozart's graceful style, first in the Trios, then in his first and second Symphonies, which were welcomed as unmistakably legitimate offspring of his own model.

Those first compositions were not uncommonly original or progressive. Berlioz, on the contrary, does not make his first appearance as a recognizable imitator of Beethoven, although his chosen subjects are earnest, gloomy, passionate, and like the ninth symphony in their purely, instrumental parts. He, however, out-did his predecessor in instrumentation; he made use of entirely new, and hitherto unknown means of expression, (while Beethoven's manner of instrumentation closely resembles Mozart's) and appears to differ from Beethoven, as the latter does from Mozart. Had Beethoven first appeared before the public in his Eroica Symphony, his position, compared with Mozart, would have been the same as that of Berlioz to Beethoven, and the same would have happened to him, as now to Berlioz; for as he stepped forth, self-reliant in his own character, what opposition would have been raised against him! how the critics would have censured him, the orchestra resisted, and the public opposed him!

The directors, besides, who will not study his scores, are opposed to Berlioz; and the orchestra, who wish to avoid the multiplied and constant rehearsals, which the proper performance of his works requires.

Another opposing obstacle may be found in the notion of many critics, that the analyzing of musical works is prejudicial to the enjoyment of them, and especially can only be an accurate estimate of individual works, and not of the whole of them. But this kind of analysis is actually that, which, the proper understanding of higher musical works imposes on the public, and this means alone can win for them a better opinion. It is owing to this analyzation that progress in clearness of expression is aimed at, that is, that the young artist is incited to really say something, and, not as often happens, to write merely notes, without any definite object.

Finally, it must be acknowledged by every creative talent, that if an entire work is to possess any signification, it must preserve its individuality. To defend this point, and by similar treatment to make important works still more impressive, I should allow myself to be perplexed by no contradiction; and I have the firm conviction, that this progress in criticism will by and by remove all those æstheticists, who deal in mere assertions, which can not be proved. It cannot be disputed that Berlioz is considered, at this time, a mighty phenomenon in the musical world. At the time in which the French composers all more or less sacrificed to the new Italian style, Berlioz stepped forward, unexpectedly, as the only exponent of the German spirit, and clings immovably fast to his principles, notwithstanding the hostile forces opposed to him. Shall the German concert rooms forever be closed to an artist, who ardently venerates the German masters, and ever points to them as the highest models of genuine music—and the little Weimar remain the only German city where his genial creations are known and valued?

In France, Berlioz's Opera, "Benvenuto Cellini," was thrown aside with contempt. That was natural. The then prevailing taste, for a music which tickled the ears of the majority, was not adapted to a music which it considered severe in expression, in which grief appears clad in mourning garments, and not in ball costume.

Liszt, who always acknowledges merit wherever he finds it, has already produced this opera on the stage in Weimar, without any especial success the first time. But Liszt is not the one to allow himself to be defeated by a single failure. He sent for Berlioz to go to Weimar, and undertake a few abridgements in the opera. It was repeated, and the effect it produced may be learned from the published statements of the English, who were present at the representation. A still greater, and more enthusiastic reception, fell to the lot of "Romeo and Juliet," and the fragments of "Faust's descent into Hell," when heard by the public.

What Liszt, in that little city of Weimar, strove after, and obtained, should not be an insoluble problem for many larger German cities and residences, which have ampler means at command, and boast of higher feeling, and taste for music; and if Berlioz has excelled in nothing but was anticipated by the great masters before him, no one since has attained such proficiency in instrumental combinations. Therefore, it becomes the duty of all Germans, who ardently desire progress, not to neglect or slight the genius which strives, most zealously, to satisfy the German demands; and which, undoubtedly, has most of all sufficed there-to, in modern times.*

* V. A. H. The following letter was written by Paganini to Berlioz, after a representation of "Romeo and Juliet."
 "My Dear Friend:—Since Beethoven is dead, it is only Berlioz who can make him live again, and I who have enjoyed the divine compositions, so worthy of your genius, beg you to accept, as a proof of my esteem, twenty thousand francs, which on presentation of the enclosed, will be handed to you by the Signor Baron de Rothschild. Believe me ever your sincere friend, NICOLÒ PAGANINI."

Mendelssohn and Schumann.*

Justly was the world of music dazzled when Mendelssohn appeared. After his mode of treating art—a mode at first received with astonishment—had become a power, the attribute, as a rule, of genius alone, the following question forced itself upon every thinking man: Could the gift of musical creation exist in any one after Mozart and Beethoven? Had it really sprung up in Mendelssohn? What novelty was music capable of producing after Mozart and Beethoven? By what paths could it attain to new artistic forms and modes of expression, without doing violence to nature; without overstepping the rules of art and the limits of moderation; without degenerating into artificiality and extravagance? These questions were presented still more emphatically to men's minds when Schumann, with scarcely lower pretensions than Mendelssohn himself, appealed to public notice. As music had attained perfection before the two masters in question, it followed, from the nature of things, that they could not so much surprise us by means of creative forms of art, like their great predecessors, as to obtain a prominent position by the power of their individuality, and the peculiar intellectual stamp impressed upon their works. Mendelssohn is the greater artist, exercising complete mastery over form, his ideas being accompanied by shape during the process of their production, and organically developed within it a sharply marked individuality. He moves with calm certainty in a sphere of lyrical sentiment, which enables him to express his inmost feelings, and whenever he gives scope to his own peculiar frame of mind, inward and truthful accents greet us in appropriate form. This is true of songs, with or without words; of the sonnet; * and of instrumental compositions in many parts, whether they are trios, quartets, octets, or symphonies. The fundamental tone of Mendelssohn's being is a yearning after the moral Ideal, after the reconciliation of the human with the divine element by means of the Beautiful. Being, as a perfect artist, joyfully conscious of possessing the ideal, in which the moral element is mirrored, he could give utterance to his yearning only in mild lament, and, consequently, the passion of a broken spirit, struggling through the obscurity of life for light, is never apparent in his works.

It is also the yearning after the moral Ideal which imparts to Mendelssohn's works that stamp of nobility and elevation which moves us so beneficially, not alone in those of his creations, in which he directs his glance upwards, but likewise in those which move in the sphere of earthly joy. Whenever Mendelssohn rises with his thoughts and feelings into the regions of faith, in his grand oratorios and psalms, Handel, Bach, and those old Italian sacred composers who had already granted admittance in their compositions to the more lively dramatic accent, were his models. In consequence of a weaker power of faith, and, consequently, strengthened yearning, the expression of his religious feelings was necessarily more elegiacal than that in similar works by the old composers above mentioned, and the more energetic character of which has its root in a firmer consciousness.

* Translated from the London Musical World from the Vienna Revue by J. V. Bridgeman.
 * Is not Sonata meant here?—Ed.

With him form, while offering nothing essentially new, is distinguished by a finer finish, by more carefully calculated execution, the smoothness of which, compared with the genial primitiveness in the works of Bach and Handel, strikes us as somewhat fashionably elegant, and weakens the power of objective representation.

The great perfection of form in Mendelssohn's works will always compensate the connoisseur, by the highly æsthetical satisfaction it produces, for the slight touch of monotony which his fundamental tone of mind imparts to them, while his aristocratic manner, which is that of education and not of thought, can never repel or offend, but, at most, only be sometimes rather unwelcome to any one attached to fresh natural sentiment.

That Mendelssohn's sharply marked subjectivity, directly it set about portraying any circumstance of life connected with, or prescribed by, language, could successfully apply itself only to objects intimately allied to itself, is a fact which follows as a matter of course. In the oratorio, and in the musical illustrations of the tragedies of Sophocles, the general mode of expression, striking with vigor and truth, and faithfully conducted through its wanderings the fundamental feeling of the soul, was sufficient; neither the portrayal of the sentiments and passions of the masses in the choruses, nor the solo songs in his oratorios, demand a more marked individualization, while the personages taken from the ancient world can never possess for us more than typical and not living individual life. But on all other occasions that Mendelssohn stepped out of the strictly subjective sphere, it was the world of fairy romanticism which tempted him. It was the impulse of his genius which directed his course to these paths, in which he was destined to celebrate his greatest triumphs. It is in the music to Shakespeare's A Midsummer Night's Dream; in the fragment of Lorelei; in his overtures to the Schöne Melusine, Fingalhöhle, and Ruy Blas; and in parts of his Walpurgisnacht, that his genius is exhibited in the most original, boldest, and most charming light. When he sank into this life of romantic nature he was really at home; for it was only by such a poetizing of nature that his constant and decided tendency for the Ideal could feel itself raised above the harassing conflicts of the every-day world.

What lover of music has not revelled in these tones; has not felt himself raised and lowered on this phantastic ladder in intoxicating sweet delight; loosed from the burden of earth, pressed forwards with the joy of a bird; borne over fearful abysses, along the deep night of the wood, upon the silver threads of the moonlight to the ruddy morn; on the golden disk of the sun to the splendor of evening; intertwined with the thousandfold life of nature, till he is one and the same with it, surrounded by elves and gnomes, and striving to attain eternity in his chequered dreams! On this ground Mendelssohn stands alone in his own manner; here his pinions expand freely and easily; his elegiacally melancholy fundamental feeling is not heard in this varied empire of tone, where Fancy, as the sole sovereign, builds herself a motley house, in which spirits merrily flatter up and down.

Schumann was already intimately acquainted with the poetical literature of Germany, especially with Jean Paul and Hoffmann, when his impulse towards musical creation first burst forth. That the high mental tendency of the former, and the fantastic productions of the latter author, should, under these circumstances, not be without influence upon the musical nature of Schumann, who had not then ripened into perfect independence, was to be expected. This will explain why the first works of the composer, too soon impelled to develop himself by the rich stores collected in his mind and soul, on the one hand most sharply stamp his mental peculiarity, while, on the other, they satisfy us least in artistic shape. But a man of so morally serious a nature, aiming at the highest ends, could not remain in the paths of hurried exaggeration, whither a too powerful impulse was leading him; his acquaintance with the high models of the departed masters, as well as his personal acquaintance with Mendelssohn, speedily caused him to recognize the more severe claims of art, and, in the works of his second period, we already behold the blessed influence of his acquaintanceship and of conscientious study. That marked originality of form and of purely musical, that is to say, melodic expression, must not be expected in Schumann, any more than in Mendelssohn, is, after what we have said, evident. In those of his compositions which are alone able to afford us artistic satisfaction, whether they are sonnets [sonnets?], quartets or symphonies, it is impossible not to perceive the influence exerted by his great predecessors.

The entire course pursued by the art-development of Schumann and of Mendelssohn, springing, as it did, immediately from the mental development of the masters, reminds us of the Epigonian age, in which really new creative forms do not usually arise.

How very differently did Handel, Haydn and Mozart begin; how their first works sprang from a creative impulse of which these masters were unconscious! Still quite dependent, they cling humbly to great models; they knew nothing of any tendency to intellectual significance, and, consequently, bear the stamp of childlike ingenuity, and are only the first messengers of the genial impulse to play and develop themselves. It would have been incomprehensible had a man of so peculiar a mind as that of Schumann not discovered in the inexhaustible store of forms of expression belonging to his pliant art, many new traits and turns in rhythm, harmony or modulation, in which the most hidden feelings of his soul could be uttered clearly and fully; but these touches of originality are by no means of pre-eminent importance, and, while they sometimes served him to achieve great effects, are, not unfrequently, to blame for a disagreeable strangeness and monotony of expression.

The inmost personal feature of Schumann's being, however, is enthusiasm, and this is what lends him, when we have rendered ourselves thoroughly acquainted with his peculiar manner, that power over the mind which in recent times has among the Germans cast even Mendelssohn into the background. A perfect devotion to the life and the idea to be portrayed, to nature and to mind, distinguish the works of Schumann's best period; the vigorously living pulsation in his pieces dedicated to the joy of existence; the warm and profound feeling manifested in his laments and his yearning after love; and the glowing language of his spiritual struggle afford testimony of this. Even in those instances where his art proved powerless, or was not sufficiently strong to complete its flight to the high goal it had set itself, we are carried away by this touching trait of enthusiasm. There will, perhaps, never be another artist whose compositions will vary so much in artistic value and intellectual purport, and who, side by side with so many works which display the hand of the thorough master, and which exhibit so much intellect, will write so many that are incomplete, obscure and purposeless. This is explicable, certainly, by the irritation of Schumann's temperament, which, increased by an over-tension of his mental impulse to creation, laid the foundations of that terrible fate under which this magnificent composer succumbed at an early age. We must turn away from the works of his last period, works which already bore evidences of the obscurity which was afterwards to fall upon his mind and spirit, if we would honor his art—that art, namely, which can be considered a product, as all art must be, of his own exertion.

In the period of his full artistic power and free productivity, we meet, therefore, also with works marked by really vivifying and powerfully exciting beauty. To this period belong his delicious songs, mostly reflecting in a wonderful manner the sense and spirit of the poem, and always flowing from a profoundly moved heart; the cantata, Paradies und Peri; the four symphonies in B flat major, D minor, C major, and E flat major, of which that in D minor is distinguished for artistic beauty, and that in C major for intellectual significance; then an orchestral composition, consisting of three movements, charming by its rhythm, and fresh, humorous spirit; the overtures to Die Braut von Messina, and Manfred; the opera of Genoveva, and a host of interesting, and sometimes charming specimens of chamber-music; a pianoforte quintet, and quartet, two pianoforte trios, studies and sketches for the pedal grand, pieces for four hands, variations for two pianofortes, pianoforte pieces for two hands, the Album for Youth, etc.

Like Mendelssohn, Schumann was a man of strongly subjective nature, and, therefore, his creative power, whenever applied to the portrayal of things beyond the limits of his own inward individuality, always sought the sphere of romanticism, as affording more than sought else free play to the fancy. The extraordinary creative impulse within his breast, an impulse which urged him on to find in musical utterance a vent for every feeling, to fashion musically every thought which struck him, either from the inward or the outward world—so that for him, as for Rückert, every emotion of life became a poem—was by no means in keeping with his art capabilities, which did not command such stores of independent originality as had in readiness for every utterance of the mind, and for every emotion of the soul, an æsthetical expression equal to the importance and force of the intention to be conveyed. His genial calm and freedom suffered also, not unfrequently, from the pressure of his irritable temperament, and many of his most beautiful intellectual inspirations are artistically unsatisfactory. This artistic incompleteness, through which, in many of his compositions, the first qualities requisite in every work of art, namely, clearness and equality, appear to suffer, as well as the diminution of musical charm, properly so called, resulting from overpowering pretensions to intellectual profundity, and an entering into broadly developed frames of mind, is most certainly the principal cause why Schumann has, up to the present time, found but little favor any where save in Germany; not even among the English, allied to us by descent, and partial as they are to German art.

We must not judge Schumann simply by isolated specimens; we must make ourselves acquainted with the whole man; we must render ourselves intimate with his artistic and mental peculiarities, and hear his best works performed in a manner which does justice to the many new, free and profound traits in them, if we would appreciate and enjoy the rich beauty which this master, whenever he was not led astray in the unfettered exercise of his talent, has displayed in his productions, and we shall then be astonished at finding what fresh, foaming life, rich in joke and pleasing wantonness, gleams forth from them in combination with the most ardent language of the soul, and the most dazzling intellectual brilliancy.

The "Pity-Patti" Story.

The rumored appeal of Miss ADELINA PATTI to the English Court of Chancery, for protection against her own father and brother-in-law, turns out to have been a piece of unwarrantable interference in her affairs, which she entirely disowns. The following is an extract from her Affidavit, sworn in the cause in chancery "between Adelina Maria Johanna Clorinda Patti, an Infant under the age of Twenty-one years, by James William Macdonald, her next friend, Plaintiff, and Salvatori Patti and Maurice, Strackosch, Defendants."

I, ADELE JUANA MARIA PATTI, in the Bill filed in this Cause, wrongly called Adelina Maria Johanna Clorinda Patti, at present residing at Number 22 High Street, Clapham, in the County of Surrey, the person above named as the Plaintiff in this Suit make oath and say as follows,—

I have had read to me carefully the Bill of Complaint and the Affidavit of Henri de Lossy, Baron de Ville, Hester Day and Sarah Eliza Elliott filed in support of it, and I say, that, although my name is used as the Plaintiff in this Suit it has been done entirely without my sanction, and even without my knowledge.

Until I read the name of James William Macdonald, of Number 15 Howard Street Strand, who styles himself my next friend, I never heard of such a person, nor did I ever, to my knowledge, see him, nor did I ever communicate with him in any way.

The said Defendant, Maurice Strackosch, is the husband of my elder sister, to whom he has been married many years, and he has been my professional instructor from the earliest period. There is not one word of truth in any of the allegations against him or against my said father, in any of the Affidavits filed in this Cause. I wholly deny that I am, or ever was, treated with cruelty by them, or either of them, or that my liberty is or ever was controlled, or that I am or ever was kept short of money, or that my jewellery or any part of it has been or is appropriated by them or either of them. On the contrary I have and always have had whatever money I require, and all my jewellery has always been and is under my own control, and I could convert the whole of it into money at once if I were so disposed.

It is, however true, that the Defendant, my father, takes care of the bulk of my earnings as an Operatic Singer for me, and I say that I have the most entire confidence in and the greatest love and affection for my dear father, and also for the Defendant the said Maurice Strackosch, both of whom have always treated me with the most affectionate kindness.

And I say that I am quite satisfied with any and every arrangement which my father sees fit to make on my behalf, and I do not desire to have any other care or guardianship but his.

I say that ever since the marriage of the Defendant Maurice Strackosch with my sister, I and my father have lived together with the said Maurice Strackosch, and my said sister and we have always lived most happily and affectionately together.

A very large number of letters, sometimes to the amount of thirty and upwards, are daily sent to me, and as most of such letters relate to business matters I requested my said brother-in-law to open all my letters and to consult with my father and answer for me all my business letters, and to hand over to me any private letter, and this course has for several years been pursued with regard to my letters, and I am and always was perfectly satisfied therewith, and desire that the same may continue.

A. J. M. PATTI.

Sworn this 11th day of May, 1853.

To this affidavit the young Baron de Ville, to whom the young lady was reputed to be engaged, replies through the London papers in the following note:

"To the Editor of the Daily Telegraph:—

"Sir—It has long since become a matter of public record that the object of the proceedings in the Court of Chancery was never explained to Miss Adelina Patti by those who would have acted in her interest; but that, on the contrary, they did it who at the same time were living upon her earnings, and whose fees are paid for out of them—under whose influence she was living. Every one who knows me will pity Miss Patti, when she could be induced to swear that she did not believe that I entertained honorable intentions to her. Whether she was so prevailed upon, or whether she did this of her own free will, I was at once determined to give up all thoughts of a person who would break off an engagement in this libellous and perfidious manner. I beg, therefore, that you will give it the utmost publicity that there is not the remotest probability of my marrying Miss Patti, and some day it may be an impossibility.

"The affection at one time was sincere; but Strackosch and S. Patti, who had a momentary interest at stake, were determined it should not last. I have demanded a return of my letters and a mutual exchange, but it has not been complied with.

"I am sir, yours, &c.,

DE VILLE."

4, Old Cambridge terrace, May 30.

We add the following comments on this curious history from the Morning Star of June 3d—greatly at variance with an article in the same paper only two days before:

Mdlle. Adelina Patti and her family are the latest sufferers through the propensity to swallow at a gulp any narrative which wears a romantic aspect. For a few days past their private affairs have been made the topic of town talk, and damaging statements have passed from mouth to mouth, growing rapidly, as a matter of course, in the process of transmission. We have been led to believe that the captivating and gifted vocalist is groaning under a heartless and oppressive bondage. She has been pictured to us as spending her leisure hours hemmed in by bolts and bars, and proceeding to the scene of her professional labors in the custody of a stern and lynx-eyed keeper. We have been told that she is not allowed either to see a friend or to write or receive a letter—that her very large income is pocketed entirely by somebody else—that engagements are made for her by her tyrants without her consent and against her will, which she is forced to fulfil by threats of violence—and, worst of all, that she has been forcibly debarred from the gratification of an honorable attachment, simply because her marriage would prevent her gains from flowing into the pockets of her relations. All these allegations were put forward in support of the petition to Vice-Chancellor Stuart, in which Mr. James Macdonald, styling himself the next friend of Mdlle. Adelina Patti, besought that potent functionary to appoint a guardian to the young lady, and rescue her from a thralldom which made her life a torment.

Now a great many people labor under the disadvantage of not having as many friends as they fancy; but very few indeed are the favored mortals who possess more friends than they are aware of. Mdlle. Adelina Patti is one of those thus exceptionally blessed by fortune. She declares that until the commencement of these proceedings in Chancery she never even heard of this chivalrous "next friend" who takes so ardent an interest in her welfare. The solicitors whom he has generously employed in her behalf without her knowledge, admit, however, that he only acted as a substitute for a certain Baron de Ville, with whom she is certainly not unacquainted—though, according to the information which has reached us from the most reliable source, her reminiscences of him are not altogether pleasant, and she and her friends have long since arrived at the conclusion that if she had married him in haste she would in all probability have had ample opportunity of working out the rest of the adage during the remainder of her existence. But of the treatment which Mdlle. Adelina Patti has received from her family, and the wishes which she cherishes, no one is likely to know so much as the young lady herself, and we must assuredly give her statement the preference over that of a discarded suitor, her engagement with whom, contracted under false impressions subsequently dispelled, was broken off by her own act some time ago. It cannot have been very agreeable to her to find herself compelled to come forward and make a formal deposition with regard to the circumstances of her domestic existence as the sole means of silencing the tattle of scandal-mongers. But she was bound to do so in justice to those near and dear to her, whose characters have been grossly aspersed by these hostile allegations, and she has not shrunk from the discharge of the unpleasant duty. We have been fully apprised of the circumstances under which her affidavit was made, and they leave no room to doubt its perfect candor and spontaneity. Mdlle. Adelina Patti contradicts in the clearest and most emphatic terms the assertions that she has been harshly treated by any members of her family, or deprived of perfect freedom of action, or forced into unpalatable engagements, or prevented from disposing as she sees fit of her property and her salary. In short, Mdlle. Adelina Patti avers that she is a very happy girl, well cared for, and kindly treated by a fond father and an affectionate brother-in-law, and we have unimpeachable authority for asserting that the picture which she has drawn of her position is in all particulars correct. The solicitors for her "next friend" state that they would not have advised the filing of the Bill in Chancery unless they had seen evidence in her own letters of the truth of the allegations which it contained. We do not doubt their good faith, but we are satisfied that they acted under the influence of a delusion. Whether they misinterpreted passages in these letters, or whether any of the letters themselves bore affinity to a certain communication signed with the name of Mdlle. Adelina Patti and addressed to the editor of the Paris Figaro, which we have heard spoken of, we shall not pretend to say. It is enough for us to know that our little drama has come to an end—or rather never had a beginning. The pearl of Rosinas puts off the character with her Spanish costume, and emerges from the stage door happy, light-hearted, and free. Herr Maurice Strackosch is no Bartolo, but an upright kindly gentleman, very fond of his sister-in-law—the pupil whom he has trained, and over whose welfare he watches with tenderness and fidelity. Signor Salvatore Patti has not a single qualification for that part of Basilio which we cast to him under the influence of false representations; and Almaviva turns out to be an unauthorized intruder, who, if rumor be not altogether a liar, would not be at all likely, if he won the lady, to follow the example of his operatic prototype by giving up her fortune. The nine days' wonder has collapsed, and henceforward we hope the tattle-mongers will leave Mdlle. Adelina Patti in the undisturbed enjoyment of that domestic happiness which, every body will be pleased to learn, sweetens her life and solaces the cares and toils of her professional career.

Music Abroad.

Paris.

THE OPERAS. From the Gazette Musicale we glean the following summary of operatic doings in the month of May.

OPERA COMIQUE. La Chanteuse voilée, a graceful little one-act opera by V. Massé, with libretto by Scribe, has been revived, with Mlle. Marinon, M. Capoul and M. Gourdin for interpreters. Next came Auber's Haydée, with M. Achard, a light tenor "now without a rival in France", M. Troy and Mlle. Baret—these pieces continued to be given alternately with Lalla Roukh. Zampa, with Montaubry and Mlle. Cico, was promised for the end of the month; also Grisar's Le Diable amoureux (first produced a dozen years ago, with Mme. Colson, at the Théâtre Lyrique) was to be revived in favor of a new pensionnaire of the Comique, Mme. Galli-Maré. Several interesting debates were to take place in the interval.

The programme of novelties in preparation for the winter is quite rich; for instance: La Fiancée du roi de Garbe, by Auber; Capitaine Henriot, in three acts, by Sardou and Gevaert; Lara, three acts, by A. Maillart; La Peruvienne, three acts, by Victor Massé; Hermine, by Felicien David; and finally, La Nuit des Dupes, words by Saint-Georges, music by Flotow.

THEATRE LYRIQUE. The month (May) opened with two new comic operas. One, Les Fiancés de Rosa, composed by a lady, Mme. Clemence Valgrand, of whom M. Leon Durocher says: "You see, from the first bars of the overture, that she is far above the class of ordinary amateurs; she has worked in earnest. A pupil of the Conservatoire, competing for the grand prize, could not be more racheté in his harmonies. She writes well for voices, and her instrumentation is very correct,"—and so on, praising some pieces in the opera, but pronouncing the rest inferior, the ideas common, &c. Mlle. Boyer, a young artist, of good voice and intelligence, but inexperienced, took the part of Rosa; the other parts were agreeably sung and acted by Mlle. Faivre, and MM. Girardot, Wartel and Legrand.—The other novelty, Le Jardinier et son Seigneur, in one act, founded on one of Fontaine's fables, was composed by M. Leo Delibes, a pupil of Adolph Adam, who has so perfectly appropriated the manner of his master (according to our critic) that it might pass for a posthumous work of his. A gay, grotesque, bright piece, and well played, it seems, particularly by M. Gabriel and Mlle. Faivre.

Mme. Cabel made her last appearance for the season in Les Peines d'amour perdues (Love's labor lost). She was going to replace Mme. Carvalho at Marseilles.

A young singer made her debut, almost incognito, at this theatre, as Agatha in Robin des Bois, as the French call Der Freyschütz. Her name is Mlle. Doria; she is said to have a mezzo-soprano of rare brilliancy and sweetness, as well as sentiment, intelligence, and all sorts of personal charms; but her vocalization is imperfect; one critic says: "She seems to have stepped down, like Pygmalion's statue, expressly to demand singing lessons of M. Dupres!"

But the best event here has been the revival of Weber's Oberon. The part of Rezia was sung by Mme. Ugalde, whose voice is not what it was twenty years ago, but who has "will, audacity and a singular verve." M. Monjaux lacked pleasing voice and easy vocalization for the tenor rôle of Huon, but showed zeal. Mlle. Girard was very piquant in the part of Fatima.

Mme. Carvalho, after her triumphs in Marseilles, gave several performances of Gounod's Faust, assisted by a new tenor, Morini, who made a fine impression.

GRAND OPERA. Rossini and Auber—Tell and Masaniello—shared the stage for a week or two. Then came for novelty a danseuse from St. Petersburg, Mlle. Mourawief, to turn the heads of people in the ballet La Glisèle. This had its run for several nights, when music recovered its foothold in the shape of Rossini's delicious comic opera, the Comte Ory, in which Mme. Vandenheuvel (Duprez's daughter), and MM. Warot and Obin, had the prominent parts.

THE NEW OPERA HOUSE promises to be "Grand" indeed. "Spiridion", describing the Exhibition of Fine Arts, which opened last month, says:

After the battle-pieces which delight French eyes, the object in the Exhibition that commands most attention is the model in plaster of the new opera-house. It is scarcely possible to get near it, so dense is the throng of people constantly around it. What a place does the theatre occupy in the lives of these people! It is by the orders of the Emperor that this model appears at the Exhibition. The architect, Mons. Charles Garnier, was opposed to its appearance, on the ground that this exhibition of his plans was to limit his studies, was to pledge the public that he would select certain forms and ornaments of the edifice which are far from being those he may definitely select, again, that the public could not judge the merits of his work in a reduction which necessarily excludes all breadth and elegance of style and all purity of form. The new opera-house is building on what will be Opera House Square, fronting on the Boulevard des Capucines and at the head of a broad—and as yet unbuild—boulevard which runs from the new opera-house to the French comedy. The new Rue Lafayette towards the new opera-house on the left, the Rue de Rouen (on which is the Eastern side of the Grand Hotel) bounds it on the left.

Seen from the Boulevard des Capucines, which is in front of it, or from the Rue Neuve des Mathurins, which is behind it, the first objects which strike the eye in the new opera-house are two circular wings or bows, which are reached by a circular terrace in the Italian style, so gently graded as to allow carriages and horses to ascend them and land their passengers under the porticos of the wings. The left wing (looking North) is the imperial carriage way to the Emperor's box; from this portico are staircases which lead to the Emperor's private saloon, to the dressing-rooms, to the saloons of the aides-de-camp, and to the imperial box. There will be a telegraph office in this wing in communication with all the capitals of Europe, and a council chamber too, so that if an important telegram comes during the performance of any opera, a cabinet council may be immediately assembled in the opera-house itself. Isn't that a French idea? The imperial box is on the left of the stage. The architect at first thought of placing the imperial box in the centre of the semi-circle and first tier of boxes; but when he considered that this box would interrupt the semi-circle of all the tiers of boxes and clog the circulation of the main lobbies by separating the right from the left side of the house, and when he remembered that he had seen this state box in the Russian and Italian theatres dwarf all the other boxes by its proportions and chill the actors and audience by forming a huge and almost always unoccupied place in the centre of the house, the architect determined to abandon all thought of placing it there and to keep it where it is commonly to be found in the French theatres, that is to the left of the stage, in fine, the first stage box. The wing to the right is for the subscribers to the Grand Opera; it is sufficiently large to enable several carriages and horses to enter its portico together. It opens into a large vestibule which communicates with the grand staircase. The decoration of the grand staircase consists of immense arcades built on coupled marble columns, which are crowned with the extension of the passages and landings, and with balconies. The whole hall is profusely decorated with marble, bronzes, gilding and sculptures. The subscribers, whose seats are in the "amphitheatre" (seats in front of the first tier of boxes and raised a good deal above the level of the pit), reach their places by the staircase in the axis of the hall. The subscribers whose seats are in the first tier of boxes reach their places by the step on the right and left of the axis. The spectators who have taken the cheaper seats may see the subscribers enter or leave the auditorium by the grand staircase, for the extension of the passages and the landings (and which end in balconies in the vestibule as I have described) enable the spectators of all the inferior places of the theatre (even to the cheapest) to enjoy the brilliant scene to be found in the vestibule and on the grand staircase. It is thought here that Mons. Garnier has displayed more talents in the arrangement and decoration of the vestibule and grand staircase than in any other portion of the building. The lobbies of the new opera house are twice as large as those of the present opera. The present opera house contains nineteen hundred persons. The Government desired the new theatre to contain two thousand. The architect has by "some skillful arrangement contrived that the new house may contain as many as three thousand spectators without inconveniencing any person." I have been unable to ascertain what the proposed "skillful arrangement" is. Every box has a saloon, which is an elegant, comfortable, well-lighted, well-aired, and large parlor. The old chandelier is to be retained, but the new fashioned ground glass roof lighted from above is to be introduced in part. Mons. Garnier insists that the sight of the gas lamp is cheering, and there is the same moral difference between the new ground glass roof and the chandelier as there is between the steam-heated room and the room heated by a gas, sparkling fire in the chimney. What diner-out does not know the difference! There is an immense promenade saloon in the usual place; it has at each end a small saloon which looks on the boulevard, and between these small saloons there is a sort of porch called loggia, which is built for a summer promenade for those spectators who may wish to stretch their legs between the acts.

The canon of proportion in stage construction being that the depth of the stage should be equal to twice its width at the curtain, the stage of the new opera house is sixty feet deep, and it may be made seventy-eight feet without much trouble, and even as deep as 150 feet by removing some of the inside partitions. The perpendicular depth of the cellar beneath the stage is so great as to allow any scene—even a cathedral or a mountain—to be lowered in one piece, without rolling or dislocating it, instantly down the trap-door. All the scenes are suspended from the roof, and they are moved on rollers on moveable rails. As the scenes are balanced with the utmost exactness a child can move them in any direction; they turn upon their axis and can be placed in any, even the most oblique position. Each side of the stage are cases for scenes, in which the scenes are placed in the position they are to occupy at the moment when they are to be used. The moment the whistle gives the signal they are moved forward in front of the spectator. As these cases are half as deep as the stage is broad, the scenes placed in them may have these dimensions; the moment the whistle gives the signal the scenes on the right and left of the stage are put together and the stage is filled. The width of the stage from wall to wall (including the cases for the scenes) is 168 feet, and consequently it is large enough to contain the scenery of twelve operas or ballets constantly ready for use. No less than 560 workmen are daily engaged in Paris in the new opera house, of whom 300 are stone-cutters. The stone-cutters' yard occupies 120,000 feet of ground. It is provided with railways and eight steam engines of twenty horse power. The stones used are brought from the department of L'Yonne. They are enormous; many of them weigh 20,000 pounds.

CONCERTS. The same journal (over the signature of Adolph Botte) reports from week to week a long list of "auditions musicales", chiefly of virtuosos producing themselves on their own account, in order to win or brighten up a Parisian reputation. M. ALEXANDRE BILLET, pianist of high standing, played in Erard's rooms a Beethoven Trio, and won new applause in a variety of styles, as works of Field, Weber, Chopin and Mendelssohn.—M. VAILATI, a blind man, created enthusiasm, at the Salle Herz, with a mere mandolin, playing the "Carnival of Venice" on one string, fantasias on Norma, Travatore, &c., and seconded by Braga, violoncellist, and the famous ophicleide of Colosanti. A cricket concertizing with the assistance of the roaring ball of Bashan!—Then came a lady violoncellist—young, pretty, capital musician, first prize at the Conservatoire of Brussels, Mlle. HELENE DE KATOFF by name, pupil of Servais. She was well seconded by other artists, and the high expectations of her talent were not deceived.—Then one GIUSEPPE GARIBOLDI, a flutist of talent brought out, in the circle of some learned Societies, vocal and instrumental compositions of his own, which are moderately praised; among others a Scène fantastique for violin, piano and organ.—So much for one week.

Second week (in May). Concert at the hotel du Louvre of Mme. de VILLETTE, with other singers; miscellaneous, dilettante affair.—M. EDOUARD CAZANEUVE, pianist, got together various attractions of "youth and talent"—some "pleasant voices needing discipline"; Beethoven's Sonata Pathétique, and "graceful pages" of his own; a Concerto of Vieuxtemps, an oboe solo, &c.—M. F. BRISSON, who concertized in company with M. PORTEHAUT, played some melodious little pieces of his own upon the organ, viz., his Ronde de Nuit and his Fête des Porcherons; also the piano part in a Trio by Auber (much admired by the reviewer); also his own Trio on I Puritani, for two pianos and 'cello. M. Portehaut sang a grand scena from Charles VI and something from a comic operetta by M. Brisson.—Of more importance was a concert of the "Academie Society of Sacred Music" conducted by M. VERVOITTE, having for its object to restore the taste for what is classical and noble in church music. The Subat Mater of Haydn, the Tantum ergo of Bortnianski, the Gaudeamus of Carissimi, the Paulus of Mendelssohn, furnished some of the choruses sung, besides pieces by Marcello, Palestrina and Jomelli.

Third week. Concerts of Mlle. CAUSSEMILLE, fine pianist, (C minor Trio of Mendelssohn, and lighter things); Mlle. TIEFENSEE, vocalist, mezzo-soprano of rich quality, large and finished style (pieces from Handel, Mozart and Rossini, as well as Casta Diva difficult variations and national airs, Russian, Spanish, Irish, Bohemian, Tyrolean and Hungarian); and Mlle. MARIE TRAUTMANN, once an infant prodigy and first prize at the Conservatoire, pupil of Hers (Mendelssohn Trio in D minor, Thalberg's Don Juan fantasia, a Concerto by Herz, &c.)—SILVESTRO NICOSIA, a "very unequal violinist, fond of capricious fantasies", gave a concert, at which the chief enchantment was the appearance of his son CARLO, a little virtuoso of five years and a half, who played a prelude of Bach and a duo of his father's with extraordinary accuracy, aplomb and expression.—LEOPOLD DE MEYER played with great acceptance at one of the Princess of Metternich's soirées.

The only concert we see noticed in the last week of May was one by SIVORI, the violinist, who, it would seem, never played more admirably. His selections were the "Kreutzer" Sonata, Mendelssohn's C minor Trio, and some of the common show pieces. LEOPOLD DE MEYER was lionizing at all the private Soirées in aristocratic houses.

Leipzig.

The following letter appears originally in the London Athenæum of May 30, and reappears, quasi originally under the head of "Our Musical Correspondence," in the New York Musical Review and World of June 20.

My last report of the season will deal more with revivals than with new compositions. None of the latter have been produced in the Gewandhaus—but the former have been very interesting. A Symphony by the Abbé Vogler showed more life and freshness than could have been expected; the first movement, which is decidedly the best, contains some devices, not to say tricks, which speak more to the eye than to the ear; the other movements fall off somewhat. Very solemn, and excellently fitted for its purpose, is Mozart's 'Masonic Funeral Music,' written for the funeral of the Grand-Master, Prince Esterhazy. I must return to the concerts devoted to French music, having sketched the programme:—Overture to 'Semiramide,' Catel,—two Choral Songs (Brunettas) of the middle of the seventeenth century,—'La Violette' and 'Grisélidis,' compositions of exquisite grace and beauty,—Ariette and Chorus from the ballet 'La Mascarade de Versailles,' Lully; strangely Handelian in many touches,—Violin Variations, Rode, superbly played by Herr David,—Aria and Chorus from 'Hippolyte et Aricie,' Rameau; graceful and pleasant, but with rather too many bird-effects for modern taste,—Overture 'Jean de Paris,' Boieldieu,—Symphony in G minor, Méhul; the longest, but the least interesting, work of the evening; some of the themes are good enough, and the scherzo and finale have piquancy and life, but the way in which the whole is worked out makes the effect monotonous; the second movement is a singular anticipation of Mendelssohn's four-part song, 'Ein Vöglein in den Zweigen schwank,'—Chorus from 'Les Deux Avaros,' Grétry,—'Fée Mab' Scherzo, Berlioz, a wonderful piece of orchestral sonority, but in which the harp effect was lost, only one harpist being engaged,—Le Sueur's March and Magicians' Chorus from 'Alexandre à Babylone'—a good winding-up piece.—In one of the Gewandhaus Concerts, M. Auguste Werner, of Geneva, a pupil of the Leipzig Conservatory, made his first appearance, and proved himself a thoroughly well trained pianist; his touch is strong and his technical acquirements brilliant. He chose Herr Hiller's Concerto; the second and third movements may be placed by the side of any piano concerto of later times. Herr Wilhelm has again won deserved applause by his rendering of Bach's 'Chaconne' and Ernst's 'Elégie.' Hanover has sent us a most welcome contribution—two singers who can really sing. Fräulein Weiss has a high and sweet contralto, and uses it with true musical and poetical feeling. The other guest was Dr Gunz, likewise a member of the Hanover Opera, with a tenor voice of pleasant quality: if not very powerful, well suited for lyrical music, which he sings with great purity.

At the Euterpe Concerts, M. Rubinstein's Overture to 'Dimitri Donskoi' was produced for the first time—the best of the works of this very unequal composer which I have heard this season. Dr. Liszt's music to Herder's 'Der entfesselte Prometheus' does not grow upon us; though it contains some good passages, the Reapers' Chorus especially, the greater part is an extravagant use of means, with a result most disproportionately meagre and unpleasant.

Two chamber compositions call for notice. The first, which was given in a Gewandhaus Quartet Concert, is a String Quartet in E minor, by Herr Musik Director Richter, a Professor of Harmony in the Conservatory. Most refreshing is it in these excruciating times to find a writer who does not think it beneath him to be cheerful and gracious. Herr Richter's name is a sufficient guarantee that his Quartet would be clear in construction and judicious in his treatment of instruments; but, besides, there is a pleasant and novel elegance which will recommend his work. Very different is Herr Volkmann's Trio in B flat minor, for piano, violin and violoncello, given in an Euterpe Chamber Music Concert. This composer seems to despise beauty of sound and clearness of form; his themes, however good in themselves, make no pleasant effect, and the hearer is sent away dissatisfied and weary. Belonging to the same class is another Suite for the Piano in E minor, Op. 72, by Herr Raff, which was played by Herr von Bülow in the last of his Pianoforte Soirées. Besides this suite, the aforesaid pianist gave us, among other things, Sebastian Bach's 'Italian Concerto' and a Sonata in A flat, by Philip Emanuel Bach, a new edition of which has been somewhat strongly 'edited' by the player. Herr von Bülow also introduced two new pieces by Dr. Liszt—'Venezia e Napoli.' The first, a Gondoliera, is very graceful.

In a Concert of the Dilettanti Society, for the conducting of which Herr von Bernuth deserves all praise, Mr. Danreuther played Mendelssohn's 'Variations Sérieuses,' as well as other music by Bach, Schumann and Chopin, with remarkable power and promise.

Herr Riedel's Choral Society always gives an interesting programme. In the last concert we had Gluck's only known sacred composition, a 'De Profundis,' a work very monotonous, and quite unworthy of the master. Its dreary effect was not removed by the three next pieces,—a song 'On Death' by Beethoven, a composition rarely heard, and its effect marred by the substitution of a very injudiciously 'stopped' organ accompaniment,—the Requiem and Kyrie from Berlioz's 'Requiem' and the 'Agnus Dei' and 'Dona nobis' from Schumann's Mass. But the concluding two numbers made rich compensation; two of Bach's best Cantatas, 'Ach wie flüchtig,' and 'Ein feste Burg.' A page might be written upon the beauties and strong contrasts of these two works,—the one so tender,—the other as strong as some old-world fortalice.

Herr Louis Lubeck, whom I mentioned in my last letter, has been appointed to the several posts lately held by Herr Davidoff, in the Conservatory and in the Church, Gewandhaus, and theatre orchestras.

A 'Concert Grand,' of a new form, has just been built by Herr Julius Blüthner of this city; each side has a curve similar to the one curved side of the ordinary instrument. This symmetry of shape makes it much more easy to dispose of this usually so despotical instrument in any part of the room. Internally it is provided with two sound-boards, and the lower bass strings are made to cross the others obliquely. For a concert instrument the tone is brilliant and penetrating, but is a little too hard for a small room. The touch is excellent. A.

Schumann's "Paradise and the Peri."

THIRD ARTICLE.

PART II.—The Peri has found a gift worthy to bear to the gates of Heaven; she has caught the last life drop from the heart of the young hero who falls fighting for his country, and the praise of "blood for liberty shed" has been sung in the magnificent chorus which forms the finale of Part I. We wait the result with the opening of the second Part.

The first piece (No. 10) is altogether lovely. A slow, thoughtful melody of the oboe, with a syncopated, faltering accompaniment, preludes to and accompanies the Tenor solo, which recites (what the music has already in itself suggested) the timid and wistful approach of the Peri to to the gate of Eden, scarcely daring to ask herself if it stands open. The oboe still pursues its theme, while the Angel (Alto) addresses her:

Sweet is our welcome of the Brave,
Who die thus for their native Land—
But see—alas! the crystal bar moves not—Holler far the boon must be,
That opens the Gates of Heaven for thee!

The musical phrase (taken with the instrumental harmony), to which the last two lines are set, is exquisite beyond description; it is indeed angelic music; and instantly an angel chorus (female voices in four parts, four voices on each part) echo the passage pianissimo, the same delicious harmony being caught up into the ethereal octaves; and the very brief, but not to be forgotten piece ends, as it began, with the oboe theme and syncopated harmony. There is such purity, refinement, tenderness in this passing breath of melody and harmony, that it may well seem to come from upper air and from a heavenlier sphere. The tenderness and sweetness with which this heavenly No! is uttered, contains assurance of the final victory—is victory, if you listen only to the music, which reveals the deeper truth beneath the words.

11. This number opens with Tenor recitative again, the pauses filled with rustling of wings, as the disappointed Peri flies away upon another quest, to "Afric's lunar mountains."

Far to the South, the Peri lighted;
And sleek'd her plumage at the fountains
Of that strange tide—whose birth
Is hidden from the sons of earth.
Deep in those solitary woods
Where oft the Genii of the Floods
Dance round the cradle of their Nile.

The last three lines suggest to Schumann a happy interpolation of his own: a chorus of Genii of the Nile:

Come forth from the waters, appear!
Come, spirits! What form divine lingers here?
'Tis a Peri, see how wondrous fair;
Take care, take care!
List to her song!
Hear her complaint!
Listen! still!

It is a chorus for three parts, soprano, alto and tenor, and is one of the most delightfully original, romantic and poetic creations to be found in the whole repertoire of fairy music. The slumber song of the Elves in "Oberon," the Naiad chorus in the same, the fairy choruses of Mendelssohn are no whit more remarkable nor steal upon the sense with a more exquisite surprise. The key is B minor. The cool and watery shades, the steady flow and ripple of the stream, whence these startled sprites emerge and call to one another, are indicated by a rapid and continuous violoncello figure, which runs through the whole, while flute and clarinet and oboe sing in chords above, like little calls and signals, helping to mark the nervous accent of the vocal phrases, which are treated fugue-wise, with bits of imitation in the violins. The creature whom the Genii rush out to see is not more "wondrous fair" nor more alive, than is this music; it excites in you the sweet and strange surprise it sings of. The picture is not in the least commonplace, nor is it in the least misty or indefinite; it is not unsubstantial, dream-like, sentimental, but real and objective; it is as sound and wholesome as it is thoroughly imaginative music. You cannot listen to it unrefreshed. But we have not told all;—the Peri's voice is heard from time to time blending its sad strain with the chorons; and bark! it is a snatch of that same yearning, earnest melody, which she sung when first we heard her (No. 2), as she thought of the happiness of the spirits in Heaven; now, to the same tune, she sings (and beautifully it is worked in with the bright themes of the chorus):

O Eden, fair Eden, I'm longing for thee!
Ah when shall thy portals be open to me?

12. The running accompaniment to the chorus of the Nile genii dies away, gradually slackening its pace like a spinning wheel as it goes to sleep, and disappearing in the new chord (G minor) upon which the Tenor solo tells of her further flight:

Thence over Egypt's palmy groves,
Her grots and sepulchres of Kings,
The exiled spirit sighing roves;
And now hangs list'ning to the doves
In warm Rosetta's vale; now loves
To watch the pelicans that break
The azure calm of Moeris' Lake.
For ne'er did mortal eye behold
A fairer scene; a Land more bright.
Who could have thought that there, ev'n there,
Amid those scenes so still and fair,
The Demon of the Plague hath cast
From his hot wings a deadly blast!

The style of this recitative is serious, sweet, sympathetic, graphic, fully in keeping with the words and situation. As it goes on the accompaniment takes the form of a steady alternation of a low chord of strings answered by a higher chord of reeds and flutes, giving the idea of a wide, rich, tranquil scene. Presently these harmonies grow dull and close and sweltry, like the very atmosphere of pestilence: diminished sevenths to satiety; a creeping, lifeless, would-be modulation, restless, finding no outlet; a turgid, over-crowded, helpless sort of harmony; in itself not very beautiful or musical, certainly not refreshing, but wonderfully suggestive of the scene it introduces, while you have the comfort that is very short. It soon dies away, and a holier calm begins to fill the air as the Peri's voice is heard, in a few tender phrases, sighing over these sad fruits of the fall of man; her strain grows exquisitely touching as it takes the rhythm of the last two lines:

Some flow'rets of Eden inherit ye still,
But the trail of the Serpent is over them all!

13. This triple (3-4) rhythm keeps on in the accompaniment, accelerating, brightening into the major, giving a buoyant lift to a charming page of symphony, in the course of which the Tenor solo (melody and bass now in 4-4 against 6-4) tells how the Peri wept and instantly the air around grew pure and clear. The symphony suddenly ceases, and a quartet of mixed voices sing, first in plain choral form:

For there's a magic in each tear
Such kindly spirits weep for man!

And then the voices separate in imitative phrases, with accompaniment, and recombine again, and the piece ends with a return of the opening instrumental motive.

14. A short Alto solo, in E minor, a sort of Romanza, a sad and simple tune, which repeats itself, dividing the words into two stanzas; and the same tune is sung a third time, in the tenor, by the plague-stricken youth:

Alto Solo.

Beneath that fresh and springing bower,
Close by the lake, she heard the moan
Of one who, at this silent hour,
Had thither stol'n to die alone.
One who in life, where'er he moved,
Drew after him the hearts of all;
Yet now, as though he ne'er were loved,
Dies here, without one tear-drop's fall!

The Youth.

None to watch near me; none to slake
The fire that in my bosom lies;
Oh for a sprinkle from that lake,
Which shines so cool before mine eyes.

15. This number is perhaps more amenable to the charge of that peculiar "Schumannism", which has been a stumbling block to many.—That is, it seems at first sight, not quite so clear and natural as most that we have been through; over-ingenious, crowded, more like an orchestral fantasia, some might think it. But it is certainly expressive and has traits of rare beauty. To the first portion of it, however, the (Alto or Mezzo) Soprano Solo there can be no objection on the score of clearness or beauty—a well defined and tender melody, moving in six-four measure, accompanied by full, evenly divided chords :

Soprano Solo.
Deserted Youth! one thought alone
Shed joy around his soul in death—
That she, whom he for years had known,
Was safe from this foul midnight's breath,—
Safe in her father's princely halls,
Where airs from fountain-falls,
Perfum'd by many a brand
Of wood from India's land,
Were pure as she whose brow they fann'd.

Tenor Solo.
But see—who yonder comes by stealth,
This melancholy bower to seek,
Like a young envoy, sent by health,
With rosy gifts upon her cheek?
'Tis she—far off, thro' moonlight dim,
He knew his own betrothed bride.
Her arms are round him now,
His livid cheek to hers she presses,
And in the lake her loosened tresses
Dips, to bind his burning brow.

The Youth.—Thou here! O fly!
One breath of mine brings death to thee.

As the Tenor solo enters, the time is hurried, the rhythm syncopated and disturbed. the modulation strange, and the widening chords appear to take great rapid strides, raising a passing doubt of perfect fitness; but as the music grows more excited, it grows more beautiful too, the orchestra giving free reins to its fancy at the thought of the devoted maiden clasping the dying youth.

16. But now listen to the Maiden, as the key modulates enharmonically into that singularly pure, fine sphere of F sharp major.

The Maiden.—Oh! let me only breathe the air,
The blessed air, that's breath'd by thee,
And whether on its wings it bear
Healing or death, 'tis sweet to me!
There—drink my tears, while yet they fall—
Would that my bosom's blood were balm,
And well thou know'st, I'd shed it all,
To give thy brow one minute's calm.
Nay, turn not from me that dear face—
Am I not thine—thw own loved bride—
The one, the chosen one, whose place
In life or death is by thy side?
Think'st thou that she, whose only light,
In this dim world, from thee hath shone,
Could bear the long, the cheerless night,
That must be hers when thou art gone?
That I can live and let thee go,
Who art my life itself!—No, no!
Oh, let me only breathe the air,
The blessed air, that's breath'd by thee,
And whether on its wings it bear
Healing or death, 'tis sweet to me!

The song suggests not a large, but a fine, high, bird-like, earnest little soprano voice; and the whole soul of unselfish, passionate, devoted, pure first love pours itself out in this most musical and touching strain. Sure never was a truer, sweeter love strain. The Tenor solo briefly describes the rest of the mournful, but morally beautiful scene:

She falls—she sinks—as dies the lamp
In charnel airs, or cavern-damp,
So fades the sweet light of her eyes,
One struggle—and his pain is past—
He is no longer living!
One kiss the maiden gives, one last,
Long kiss, which she expires in giving!

A few softly breathed low chords, from the trombones, fill the sacred silence, and then, the key changing to B major, we have

No. 17. The wonderfully beautiful Finale to this Second Part. It is a heavenly Requiem sung over the lovers, by the Peri, joined by a silvery choir of angel voices (in six parts: two soprani, two alti, two tenors). These are the words:

Peri and Chorus.
Sleep on, in visions of odour rest,
In airs balmy than ever yet stir'd
Th' enchanted pile of that lonely bird,
Who sings at the last his own death-lay—
Sleep on, in dreams thine eyelids close,
Sleep on, thou true one, gently repose!

Basses.
Thus saying, from her lips she spread
Uncerthly breathings through the place,
And shook her sparkling wreath, and shed
Such lustre o'er each paly face,
That like two lovely saints they seem'd;
While that benevolent Peri beam'd
Like their good angel, placed to keep Watch till their souls should rise from sleep.

It is impossible to conceive of melody more crystal clear, serene and luminous with light from heaven than this sweet, simple melody, in which the Peri's voice leads off, or of harmony more pure and chastely rich than that which accompanies it. When this pure white beam of melody divides into the prismatic colors of harmony, as the angel voices take up the lovely theme, the chords in the accompaniment are broken into light, hovering wing-like figures, which seem to buoy the strange, delicious music up and hold it poised in upper air still within reach of mortal ears. At intervals the Peri's voice adds itself to the heavenly chorus. Nor is this all. The basses all the while are chanting, in deep tones, a wholly different motive, which supports the rest, supplying (in the words above) the narrative description of the scene ab extra, while the angels sing.

And here endeth the Second Part. Will the last sigh of these true lovers open Heaven's gate to the Peri?

Paragraphs from Vienna.

BY A. W. T.

May 4.—The Presse this evening says that Herr Dr. Ludwig Nohl, tutor of music in the University at Munich, and known as the author of the much-read essays upon "The Magic Flute," "Der Geist der Tonkunst" (the spirit of Music) "Mozart" and others, has come to Vienna, and will occupy himself here for some time in preparations for a biography of Beethoven.

Very well, the more the better, provided that these biographers (!) will begin to make some original researches, and no longer content themselves with simply plundering Wegeler, Ries and Schindler.

May 5.—The same paper this evening has this paragraph: "Wagner's Tristan and Isolde, it is said, is now finally laid aside (at the Karnthner Thor theatre.) At least, the Recessione says, Frau Dustman has declared, that she has not the power to commit to memory the principal female part."

This reminds me of what an intimate friend of Mad. Viardot told me two years ago, to wit:—

She related to him that when Wagner came to Paris on that Tannhäuser expedition, he wished she would do him the kindness to let him hear some of his music, to Tristan and Isolde. She willingly consented, and with great pains learned portions of it, and a private concert was given in her residence. This was to be repeated the next week, but she was so utterly unable to remember the part, as to be obliged to go through the drudgery of studying it all anew! And this is music! This begins where Beethoven left off! This is to make Mozart forgotten!

Very well, so be it; it will not be in my day, I know.

This morning's Presse (May 5.) has an article by Hanslick on a certain Mad. Fabbri-Mulder, in which truth is spoken without fear or favor. People who are so sensitive at home, if a notice of them does not make them compounds of Lind, Sontag, Alboni, Malibran, Patti, and all the other great singers, may think themselves lucky that they have no Edward Hanslick to tell them plain truths.

May 10.—I see by the papers that the Archbishop of Cologne has invited the King of Prussia to be present at the celebration of the completion of the Cathedral, to take place October 15th next. This refers, of course, only to the body of the church, the two great towers remain still to be erected. On the 23d of this month, it will be fourteen years since, coming from Antwerp, I first saw that famous structure. Then little more than the choir stood complete, and people shook their heads at the idea of its ever being finished. I never doubted it, nor do I doubt the completion of the two glorious towers, which are embraced in the plan. But what music will be selected for that celebration? Well, I can only say, that if they do not play the Overture "Consecration of the House," and the Grand Mass in D, both written by the sometime organist of the last Elector of Cologne, both works in music what the cathedral is in architecture, I shall have no great opinion of the musical taste of his reverence, the Archbishop!

New Music.

ROBERT SCHUMANN. Op 28, No 2. Romanze, for the Piano. (O. Ditson & Co.)

This is not one of the "Studies and Sketches for the Pedal Grand," referred to in the enumeration of Schumann's best works in an article which we copy to-day upon another page; although the way in which it is engraved, on three staves, with the word Pedal affixed to the lowest of them, might lead one to suppose so. It is to be played by the usual two hands, without aid of the "nether continuations," so important to an organist. Nor is it very difficult. It is only written in this way, to make the construction of the piece clearer, and to call more strict attention to the melodic theme, which is placed on a middle staff, while the broken chords of the accompaniment, both above it and below it, are placed on the first and third staff; but two hands easily grasp the whole. It is a very pleasing, pensive melody, full of feeling, enriched and made somewhat mystical and dreamy by the aforesaid accompaniment. It is one of Schumann's truly poetic little pieces; and affords a good initiation into a new and interesting style. It here figures as one of a little series of pieces under the title "Concert Gems from Schumann's piano-forte works." We hope the others, named on the title page, will be forthcoming. They are: "Valse Nobla," from the Carneval; Eusebius, ditto; Nocturno, from the Nachtstücke (night pieces), and Fughetta (Op. 32).

MEYERBEER. Three Morceaux de Salon, from Robert le Diable, arranged for Piano by OTTO DRESE. (Ditson & Co.)

So this classical artist and skilful arranger does not disdain to turn his hand sometimes to the creations of brilliant popular idols. Robert certainly abounds in original and captivating ideas, and these which he has chosen make very graceful, fanciful and unique pieces for the parlor. The first is the "Procession of Nuns and Scene of Introduction," which we do not happen to have by us. No. 2. Romanza, the Trio with the low bass muttering in triplets, a very striking moment of the opera, is very clearly and fairly outlined in the not difficult transcription. No. 3, The Aria of Isabel, with its appurtenances, chorus of ladies, &c., from the brilliant scene of the second act, is a regular bravura piece, full of flowery ornaments and passage work; good for light-fingered practice, and fascinating just in proportion as it is well played.

We are happy to be able to inform our readers that Mr. JOHN K. PAINE will give one of his very interesting Organ Concerts, on Saturday afternoon, July 11th, at the West Church, in Cambridge Street. On that occasion he will play the famous Passeccagli of Bach, and a Trio Sonata in C of the same incomparable master, both pieces for the first time; and also the Toccata in F, which has made such an impression in his former concerts.

CARL ANSCHUTZ is in town, we understand, making arrangements to bring his German Opera troupe here in the fall. He has engaged various new singers in Europe, including, it is said, Formes the basso, Formes the tenor, and Formes the baritone. Then we may hope to hear Fiddio, and many a good thing that will be quite new to a Boston public.

MR. MOLLENHAUER'S NEW OPERA was performed last week, for the first time, at the Winter Garden in New York. The Sunday Times reports as follows:

The production of Mr. Mollenhauer's tragic opera of "The Corsican Bride" drew a large and fashionable audience last Monday evening, all of whom, from the display of cordial and kindly feeling, seemed desirous of testifying their good will and appreciation of the composer as artist and gentleman. The circumstances under which the opera was produced could not well have been more unfavorable. It was the close of the season, and so closely followed upon Vestvali's disastrous term that superficial people would confound one with the other.

Some of the artists were fair, but the cast altogether was not one that could secure prestige or success to any work, however great its intrinsic merit. The redeeming features of the presentation were the excellence of the orchestra, and of the chorus in the male department, and the heartiness with which nearly every one who took part lent themselves to the rendering of their roles and the final success of the performance, to the best of their ability. This was especially the case with Madame Kotter, who, though appearing in a part wholly unsuited to her style, and quite opposite to the light, arch characters she has been in the habit of assuming, infused into her impersonation a vitality so real and earnest as to animate others, and render much pleasurable that otherwise would only just have been endured.

Of the opera itself, we can speak in terms of greater satisfaction. The music is emotional and expressive in a very high degree. It does not often rise to positive grandeur, but it never sinks below successful effort to portray human passion in its different phases. It is difficult to tell what could be done with Antonio's part in the hands of a capable artist, which Mr. Quint is not. Mr. Weinlich, as Rosa's father, was only tolerable, ditto De Sennville (Hartmann). Rosa herself was the only one who did full justice to Mr. Mollenhauer's idea. In the second act there are some fine passages, which were received with great enthusiasm, and the opening chorus was also so good and so spiritedly rendered as to merit the nightly encore which it has received. If the opera lacks anything, it is an evidence of genuine creative power. There are few distinct melodies which can be carried away to the street or the fireside. Instrumental and concerted music there is of a very high order, but there is a lack of that individuality which appeals strongly to the feelings and the imagination.

Three other representations were given during the week, which, although gratifying in their results to Mr. Mollenhauer as showing an appreciation of his work, were not, from causes we have intimated, peculiarly successful.

The Tribune says: "The main characteristic of the music is a measured dramatic recitation to chords and musical figures in the orchestra; this, in contradistinction to the cantabile style and square-cut melodies."

GRAU's Opera Company have had a successful time in Cincinnati, having given there twenty-four performances, and eighteen different operas.

WORCESTER, MASS. Those who truly enjoy that which is pure and refining in music must have been highly gratified with the fine performance of the Mendelssohn Quintette Club last evening. The programme was an excellent one, and was rendered still more so by the presentation of the entire Beethoven Quintet, only two movements being at first announced. We desire to heartily thank the club for this favor, and to assure them that a complete work of this kind will always be acceptable. We will not attempt a criticism of the quintet, being satisfied that at this time we should fail to do justice to so magnificent a work. Mr. Schultze played a very difficult fantasia for the violin, with great energy of expression, receiving the most generous applause. Mr. Fries delighted all by his beautiful rendering of the solo for the violoncello, on familiar Scotch airs. Messrs. Goering and Ryan also gave us very interesting solos for flute and saxophone. Altogether, it was one of the most interesting concerts which has been given by the band.—Spy, June 12.

RICHARD WAGNER cleared about $10,000 by his concert in Petersburg, not to mention a villa in Switzerland, of which the Grand Duchess Helena made him a present.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.—The Mendelssohn Society, consisting of about 150 voices, aided by a select orchestra from New York, under the leadership of J. NOLL, gave a miscellaneous concert June 10th, under the direction of G. J. STOECKEL. The following was the programme:

- Part I.
1. Overture: William Tell. . . . . Rossini
  2. Duo: "Quis Est Homo?" (Stabat Mater). . . . . Rossini
  3. Concerto. G minor; (Piano and Orchestra.) . . . . Mendelssohn
  4. Prayer and Aria: Der Freischütz. . . . . Weber
  5. Symphony No. 2, in D. . . . . Beethoven
- Part II.
1. Overture and Chorus from "Mahomet. . . . . Stoeckel
  2. Angel Trio: "Elijah." . . . . Mendelssohn
  3. Chorus: "Come gentle Spring." (Seasons). . . . . Haydn
  4. Wedding March. . . . . Mendelssohn
  5. Double Quartet (Angels) Elijah. . . . . Mendelssohn
  6. March and Chorus. Tannhäuser. . . . . Wagner

The orchestral portion of the programme was finely rendered. For the first time, an entire Symphony of Beethoven was played in New Haven, and in spite of the length, it was attentively listened to and warmly applauded. Mr. WENNER rendered Mendelssohn's G minor Concerto with accuracy and precision, although at times wanting in feeling and fire.

Of the vocal selections apart from the chorus, the Prayer from Der Freischütz was best rendered. The Trio and double Quartet from Elijah, had been better left off entirely.

Mr. Stoeckel's overture and chorus from his opera of "Mahomet" were well received. We must confess however that the overture did not strike us favorably. There seemed to be too much rambling; a lack of form, and too frequent use of the side drum and cymbals. Perhaps another hearing would improve our impression of it.

The choruses were given with considerable promptness. The chief objection to the whole is, that there was too much of it, and not sufficiently popular in its character for a New Haven audience. We were glad the Society brought out a Symphony, but think the audience would have been better pleased with a single movement than with the whole. However, we are glad to report a favorable sign of improvement in musical matters in New Haven.

ALLEGROTT.

SARATOGA, N. Y.—During a short stay at that most fashionable of watering places, Saratoga Springs, we were favored with an invitation to the closing exercises of the "Temple Grove Female Seminary," which we accepted.

At this Institution, which is most delightfully situated on one of the finest streets in the town, surrounded with a beautiful grove, the young ladies enjoy every advantage for a solid and ornamental course of study, together with free access to those delicious and healthful fountains whose waters are so well known and sought for all over the world.

The following was the programme of the soirée, given on Thursday evening, June 18th, under the direction of Prof. G. D. Wilson, recently of New York, to a large (and I may say, fashionable) assembly.

| Grand Quatuor, for Four Pianos, Op. 816.             | Rossini |
| Chorus. From "Semiramide." "Hail to thee, Liberty!"  |         |

Rarely if ever, have we listened with as much interest to a school concert as on this occasion. The selections which were given, both for the Piano and Voice, evinced careful study and a well directed taste. [If their tastes run in the same direction with their devotions, what shall we think of the taste which united all those young ladies in that early act of "homage to Verdi"?—Ed.] Some of the young ladies who sang acquitted themselves in a manner deserving of great credit both to themselves and their teacher.

On the whole, the evening passed so pleasantly, that all seemed to regret that it was not longer, and we could but congratulate the heaves of fair young ladies as they gathered in dazzling groups in the large drawing-rooms of the Seminary, on their superior advantages for the pursuit of their musical studies at Temple Grove.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

- When first the bells. . . . . George Perren. 25
Gentle Bessie. . . . . E. Lund. 25

Two simple, pure and affectionate ballads. Both have very pleasing melodies.

- From the church tower falling. Das Züggelöcklein. . . . . Franz Schubert. 25

Called one of the very best of Schubert's songs. It is the custom, in some parts of southern Germany, to ring one of the church bells while a person is dying. Probably, originally, by its hallowed tones it was thought to purify the air of evil spirits, and facilitate the passage of the new-severed soul to its home on "the other side," as, in Deutschland, they often term the region beyond the grave. The song is simple, yet expressive, the accompaniment full of rich harmony, chiming to the ever recurring peal of mellow bell-tones, which sound through the entire piece.

- The Miseries of Sneezing. Song and Chorus. . . . . Ossian E. Dodge. 30

One of Dodge's super-comic odes. Well calculated to make one laugh heartily.

- Keep this Bible near your heart. Song and Chorus. . . . . H. S. Thompson. 25

Very sweet and touching. Mothers who have sent their boys to the war with a similar charge, will love the song, though it is to be hoped its sad termination may not be appropriate in their case.

- Close his eyes! His work is done. A dirge for a soldier. Song and chorus. . . . . Asa B. Hutchinson. 25

Pure, clear, simple and melodious. A regular Hutchinson song. Those who have heard it, as sung by the "Tribe of Asa," will welcome its appearance in print.

Instrumental Music.

- Venice Quadrille. . . . . Charles D'Albert. 35
Quite equal to, or a little above, the average of D'Albert's compositions, which are nearly all good.

- The Portuguese Hymn. Adepts Fideles. . . . . Brinley Richards. 60

An excellent transcription of the good old melody, which fits into variations better than many other sacred airs. Fine for practice.

- On the Rialto. Auf den Lagunen. Barcarolle. . . . . Theo. Osten. 30

A barcarolle, in Venice, approaches in character a serenade, and the melody of this fine composition would be well fitted for chanting by the gondoliers. Not difficult.

- Money-King Polka. . . . . Chas. A. Shaw.

Of moderate degree of difficulty, and considerable variety. Commended to Money-Kings and their daughters, and the many who like to dance with them.

Books.

- STABAT MATER. . . . . Rossini. Cloth, $1.00
Paper, 75

One of those books that choirs and musical societies should include in their libraries. A choir which confines itself to the singing of easy music will never be able to sing difficult music, nor sing easy music well; while a vigorous practice of a book of choruses, or a mass, or pieces like the above, shows very soon its result in the superior singing of common church tunes.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being about one cent on each piece. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that it is double.

The Concerts of Amateurs.

TRIBULATIONS OF A MUSICIAN.

From "Souvenirs d'un Musicien," by Adolph Adam.

There is a proverb which says, that there is nothing more to be dreaded than a dinner of friends or a concert of amateurs. Proverbs are the wisdom of nations, and nothing is more veracious than the maxim which we have just cited. One ought to esteem himself very fortunate when he is not smitten with both these plagues at the same time; but it is very rare that, after having been obliged to swallow the diner d'ami, composed, ordinarily, of the classic soup and boiled meat, followed by some one of those beneficial vegetables which recall to you the pleasant times and the succulent repasts of the college; it is very rare, I say, if, after this disagreeable feast, you are not still farther regaled with a little impromptu concert after the dessert. It is the little daughter of eight years who is to have you judge of her progress. The piano is opened, to which are wanting about half a dozen strings, seeing that it has not been tuned since the last soires when they danced to the piano, and the dear child is prayed to play something in order to give pleasure to the friend of the family. But the dear child, who usually takes her recreation after dinner, does not find it at all amusing to give an exhibition of her talents at such a time, and makes a wry face a yard long. "Come, come show to Monsieur that you are quite a young lady even now," says the papa, drawing his daughter to the piano. The child resists, the papa gets angry, and the budding virtuoso begins to cry. The mamma then introduces herself into the affair: "Why treat her so brutally?" says she to her husband. "You know how timid she is, she will now no longer dare to play. Come my child, if you will play your piece well you shall go and embrace the gentleman, who is very fond of little girls who are good." Pleasant perspective. You think to be rid of it by hearing a little bad music; you will be obliged whether you will or not to go and embrace this charming little girl, who, with the aid of her father's handkerchief, is occupied in a corner drying her tears. You must be resigned; after many ceremonies you have the pleasure of hearing: "Ah vous dirai-je, maman? Je suis Lindor, Triste Raison," and other little airs of that novelty executed out of tune, and with an obligato accompaniment of false notes.

After this charming concert you are obliged to endure the promised embrace, and to mingle your compliments with those of the enchanted family. "Is she not truly astonishing?" says the father. "Oh, she is organized for music as few are. She retains all the airs that she hears: . . . She has taken lessons only two years. Her mother teaches her. She is an excellent musician. Have you never heard my wife sing? She has a magnificent voice. Come now, my dear, you must sing something to Monsieur. Come, do not play the child now." You must join your entreaties to those of the husband, who has gone to take down an old guitar, which he spends a quarter of an hour in tuning. Then, mingling his voice with that of his better half, he refreshes your ears with "Fleuve du Tage" or "Dormez donc, mes chères amours," for two voices. Ordinarily one takes his hat after the last couplet and retires, thanking the amiable couple for the delightful evening which they have given him, and never sets foot in the house again. I, who have very irritable nerves, and who, in my quality of musician, hold the music of amateurs in abomination, always take care to inform myself if the people with whom I am about to make acquaintance cultivate music; for, if they have the least taste for exercising that enchanting art—your servant—I will no longer hear them spoken of, I withdraw into myself, and, firm as a rock, I remain deaf to all supplications. You will conceive that, with such principles, I move often. I have never been able to find a landlord who consented to require of my fellow lodgers a certificate of musical incapacity; and as soon as, notwithstanding the listing at all the doors and my windows constantly closed even in Summer, the sound of a piano, a violin, a flageolet, or a voice reaches me, the next day I give leave. I will not speak of the organs of Barbary (hand-organs) and of the hunting horns, which play before the windows of the wine shops: I have admitted long since that it was a plague which it is impossible to avoid in a city a little civilized, and that all quarters of Paris are subject to it.—I have tried the most isolated lodgings; the street organs have pursued me there. I thought at one time to be rid of them; I had rented a small house in the plain of Monceaux; for three days I there enjoyed an absolute silence, when, one fine morning in Summer, I was awakened suddenly at four o'clock by "La generale," which was which was being beaten under my windows. I arose in all haste. Judge of my despair when, putting my nose to the casement, I saw about twenty drummers of the National Guard grouped about my habitation, and making a general rehearsal of all the fla and rrra which could be drawn from that harmonious instrument. I saw surely that repose is not for man on this earth. I moved, I returned to the bosom of the great city. I stop up the chinks of my dwelling, and I try to cork up my ears sufficiently to imagine myself deaf, when there passes in the street any singer or cursed instrumentist. I have become a misanthrope. I am out of temper with the human species from my rising till seven in the evening. Then I go out, and I proceed to l'Opera or l'Opera Comique, and I saturate myself with true music, which has no analogy to the music of amateurs. I take care to place myself in some very obscure corner, in order to be isolated as much as possible; for amateurs pursue you everywhere, and there are those who have the habit of beating the time (nearly always out of time) or of humming with the actors; those people shrivel my nerves, and turn a pleasure into a torment. I am at variance with all my acquaintances who have musical families, and I have preserved relations only with an old retired bailiff, entirely a stranger to the fine arts, at least I believed so.—But the traitor has just broken the last link which bound me to humanity, he has become an amateur, and that without knowing a note of music, and what is worse, he has enticed me into a horrible den where they scrape and blow and scorch the ears and the composers in the most atrocious fashion, all for a hundred sous per month. Listen to the story of my misfortune.

It is not quite fifteen days since my old bailiff invited me to take dinner with him. It was the first time he had invited me, and though he had apprised me that it was un diner d'ami, I should have been in the right to have told him in leaving the table: "I did not believe myself so strongly your friend;" but, as that is but the least of the evils which awaited me on that fatal evening, I will not expatiate too much on that first calamity. The repast terminated, I made ready to quit the chamber without fire and lighted by a single candle (it is from modesty that I say candle), where we had dined, in order to go to the opera to hear Robert le Diable, when my old villain of a friend, retaining me by the skirt of my coat: "Why the devil! do you escape so suddenly? Can you not consecrate to me an entire evening? You imagined, perhaps, that I have not thought of preparing you an agreeable after-dinner? I have reserved a surprise for you this evening; give me time to take my hat, let me conduct you; and if you are not satisfied, you are very difficult to please." I let him do as he pleased. We went out and arrived at the rue des Petits-Champs. "Now we are going to wait for the conveyance, said my bailiff,"—"What conveyance? to go where?"—"My young friend, let me do as I please. I repeat, when you are there, you will be enchanted." After having waited a quarter of an hour in the rain and cold, we saw at last coming in the distance one of those monstrous carriages, which by night announce themselves by their great flaming eyes, red, blue, or yellow. We mounted, I gave my six sous, as did my companion, abandoning myself to my fate, which some presentiment, I knew not what, caused me to dread. After a half hour of progress the omnibus stopped; we descended.—"Where are we?"—"Rue de la Harpe." Singular locality for a pleasure party! We were before a great homely house, very high, very black and very dirty, as were all in the vicinity. "Do you see that light in the fourth story? It is there we are going," said my guide. "I understand." We mounted, groping our way, a very steep staircase, which brought us finally to a door feebly lighted by a night lamp placed on a neighboring shelf, and I read written in great letters: CONCERT. Here I avow my limbs failed me, and without that weakness perhaps I should have yielded to a horrible inspiration of the devil which seized me suddenly. I had an irresistible desire to precipitate my unlucky friend down four pairs of stairs, but virtue overcame it. I contained myself, and contented myself with digging my nails into the palm of my hand, when I heard this new Mephistopheles say to me with a laugh of triumph: "Ha! you did not expect this?"—The door opened before us, and I entered. I felt then within me one of those revolutions very natural to the heart of man. To that mortal solicitude which possesses one at the approach of a great danger, succeeds suddenly that courageous resignation which one experiences when the danger is upon you. There was no longer any means to avoid it. I made up my mind to laugh at my misfortune, and to play the part of an observer, in order at least to be able to put my fellow citizens on their guard against a similar mishap. The first room which we entered had nothing in particular, but the second was very remarkable; in the centre was a piano covered with scores and orchestral parts; desks were disposed around, and against the walls were hung all sorts of instruments from the highest to the lowest. A dozen individuals were already grouped in this saloon. On our entrance there were unanimous acclamations. "Ah! here is M. Vincent; good evening, Monsieur Vincent, what a pleasure to see you, etc." Hand-shakings and felicitations came from all sides to my companion, who knew not which to attend to.—After all these polite actions, upon the assurance that the concert would not commence before an hour, I drew my friend Vincent into a little corner, and here are the details which he gave me in regard to the assembly in which we were.—"This re-union has had an existence of more than thirty years. It is a business which is carried on like any species of commerce. Here, for five francs per month, every amateur, whatever instrument he plays, can come once a week and take part in the overtures and symphonies which are executed. The players are furnished with music and instruments, which you see upholstering this chamber. It is warmed, lighted, and one can bring a friend." "But," said I to him, "what do you come here to do?"—"I? I come to do my part."—"You then play some instrument?"—"Not any, I do not even know how to read music; and here is exactly whence comes the consideration which each one shows me here. I take care to place myself at a desk where there are at least two instruments. The leader of the orchestra is a sufficiently good musician to distinguish perfectly those who make what you call mistakes. As I content myself with making a semblance of playing, he has never remarked me as guilty of such a mishap, and I pass here as being of great ability. You ask me why I come here? It is because it is warm, because it does not cost much and because the consideration which I enjoy gives me pleasure.—The society is besides perfectly composed; they are students, employés, tradesmen, who prefer this re-union to the cafés and smoking rooms, and you will find among them many people with whom you would be charmed to make acquaintance."

While we were talking many people had come in; each one was already at his desk, and for five minutes the leader of the orchestra had been striking in vain on his book with his bow in order to obtain silence. "Come, Monsieur Vincent, we are going to commence. What instrument will you play to-day? Hold, we have some debutants among the flutes, go and help me a little among those young people." My companion cast a glance at the desk where were seated three young gentlemen armed with their instruments. He seized a flute, hanging on the wall behind him, and blowing with all his lungs as one does in a key, he drew from it a horrible whistling sound which might have been heard at the Pont Saint-Michel. "Ah! what a fine embouchure," exclaimed one of the apprentice flutists.—M. Vincent smiled with a modest air; and the symphony began. I did not lose sight of my bailiff, who encouraged his young companions with an air of protection, in the horrible charivari which they performed. The flutes could not succeed in making themselves heard, but during a fest there was an unhappy alto one measure behind, who began to execute a solo which was unexpected. The leader of the orchestra bounded from his seat, all stopped: "For mercy's sake! Monsieur Vincent, pass to the part of alto, we cannot go on without that." M. Vincent did not wait to be told twice. He put down his flute and took an alto. They recommenced and this time nothing hindered. M. Vincent took some tobacco, blew his nose, or arranged his frill, during the piano passages; but when the forte arrived he escaped his empty strings with fury, his companions imitated him, the altos predominated over all the orchestra, and at the end of the piece M. Vincent received the felicitations of the leader of the orchestra and of all the players.

Pity me. I was obliged to hear six overtures thus executed. You ask which ones. That would be impossible for me to tell. I did not recognize even one, though I was assured that they were all by the best masters. At the end of the concert my head buzzed. I was forced to take the arm of my old bailiff in order to return home; I should have been crushed: the noise of the carriages and the cries of garé! no longer reached my ear; I was completely stunned.—Upon entering my lodgings I mounted to the room of my landlord. I paid him what I owed him, I moved that night, and I had my furniture carried out of Paris. At break of day I found myself in a village, where I hope my old bailiff will come no more to trouble me. I have rented half of a little house occupied by a schoolmaster. But I foresee that I shall soon be obliged to transport my penates to other places; as it says in the new law on public instruction, that singing shall form a part of elementary education. I am now alone in the world; the only friend I had has become an amateur of music without knowing a note; how am I to find society now? Several years ago a particular individual demanded in "les Petites Affiches" a servant who did not know how to sing the air of "Robin des Bois"; I demand everywhere a friend who does not love music, who does not know it, and who dreads above all concerts of amateurs. If you ever encounter that rare man, send him to me; believe that he will find in me a devotion without limits; and that for such a treasure, there is no sacrifice which a poor musician could not make.

A Museum of Musical Instruments.

Paris has a new museum, which "Spiridon," writing to the Evening Gazette, describes as follows:

This museum is a collection of old musical instruments formed by Mons. Clappisson, the well known composer, and sold by him to the Government. He assembled something like three hundred instruments, several others have been given since the museum was purchased by the Government, and the collection seems to be in a fair way to grow into an extensive museum. It is interesting as illustrative of the history of music, and from the historical associations connected with many of the instruments. I am not sure that one should not look with even more interest upon a musical instrument, than upon a volume which belonged to some eminent character. The most enthusiastic reader is excited by the book only as the pilgrim at sight of the hallowed shrine; both are passive and above them they move. The musician throws his very soul into the instrument, animates it to a portion of himself and fills it with his own joys, his own sorrows or his own hopes till instrument and performer appear to be one rapt person giving utterance to the o'er-fraught heart. In this way the instrument becomes invested with a particular charm which exceeds most souvenirs in interest. Can one look at Garat's lyre and repress a smile as imagination seems to catch some echo of that divine voice to which Napoleon himself was not insensible? or the harp which belonged to the Princess de Lamballe and feel otherwise than sad at the contrast forced upon the mind between the soft notes of this gentlest of instruments and her most hideous fate?

The collection of pocket violins is extremely curious. There are no fewer than twenty-five of them, and one of them claims (judges agree as of right) to have had Stradivarius for its maker. They are of the sixteenth, seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. I believe the manufacture of pocket violins is decaying, if it has not decayed. They are scarcely to be seen now away from a dancing-master's chair. You know they give the octave above the violin, standing in the same relation to it as the viol and violoncello bear to the bass. There are a great many clarinettes and their kindred the flutes, the beaked flutes and their original bassoons. Beaked flutes are to be seen now only in museums, which is inexplicable, for musicians regret its disappearance from bands; they think its notes softer, mellower, and less insipid than those of the modern flute which dethroned it. There are some curious drums exhibited, from the old Provençal tambourine with its long narrow case, to Sax's new drum which has no case at all, and consists solely of an ass's skin stretched on a metal circle. The interval is filled with barbaric drums, chief among which figures a Tahitian drum made of a portion of the trunk of some tropical tree, which has been hollowed throughout its length (some six feet) and covered at one end with a goat's or a lamb's skin. When this drum is played it is set in a hollow and two or three brawny fellows belabor the skin with clubs. I forgot to mention that the Provençal tamborin is played with only one drumstick; it is thought a difficult instrument. Mons. Clappisson has in his museum the largest gong to be seen out of China. There are likewise to be seen in this collection many varieties of a musical family, which we know best through the hurdy-gurdy, which belongs to a most ancient family. The museum contains hurdy-gurdys of the reigns of Henry IV., Louis XIV. (and which subsequently belonged to Madame Adelaide, Louis Philippe's sister), Louis XV. (made by Louvet, the eminent musical instrument maker,) and Louis XVI. This last reign is represented by a beautiful hurdy-gurdy made for a child. There are, too, bird-organs (serinettes) bound in books, and a wheel orpheon (an instrument something like the harpsichord) in the shape of a three octave volume.

Since I am speaking of the curiosities of the museum, let me add an organ, a church organ, which has even a trumpet stop, contained in a folio volume. You may easily imagine that all the pipes are very short, being in truth little more than reeds; and there are eight instruments in canes. Garat's lyre is a beautiful instrument, admirably painted by Prudhon or Girodet. The museum contains four spinets, which are of great historical interest and most admirably preserved. One is of the reign of Henry II.; it can easily be taken to pieces and packed in a travelling-box or trunk, which is lined with sheet iron. The box is as old as the instrument. Two others were made in the sixteenth century: one of them bears this inscription: "Francisci de Portalupis Veronen. Opus. MDXIII." (the name of the maker and the date of manufacture), which is incrustured in ivory on the instrument. A fourth spinet is of the species called "virginal;" it was made in the seventeenth century and bears the coat-of-arms of the de Penthièvre family. The keys are of amber; the front of the instrument is covered with arabesques of amber surrounded by amber medallions and enamelled flowers, and the whole instrument is gilded. The collection contains two harpsichords of the greatest value. The most valuable of them was made by Ruckers towards the close of the sixteenth century, and it is adorned by paintings executed by no less illustrious artists than Paul Bril and David Teniers. The former is the author of the exterior paintings. The latter painted the front of the harpsichord, and in his very best manner; he represents three musicians in a tavern; two are seated, the third is standing and giving the others the key note. The other harpsichord is made of ebony and adorned with ivory and mother-of-pearl. On its interior is the name of the maker and of the date of manufacture: P. Faby Bononiensis. Opus. MDCLXXXVII. The collection contains, too, five beautiful harps, one made in the Regency, the four others in the reigns of Louis XV. and Louis XVI. One of them was made by Sebastian Erard and is covered with the famous Vernis Martin; on it is the name of the Princess de Lamballe. You may see there, too, mandolins, mandores, sistras, lutes, theorbs and their child, which has inherited the places of them all—the guitar; Italian (of the seventeenth century), French and Scotch bagpipes; oliphants, Roman trumpets of the sixteenth century, French hunting horns of the reign of Louis XIII., church serpents of the fourteenth century, a timbre in the shape of a spinet adorned with Boule, Pan's pipes from many countries, flutes made of all sorts of materials, trumpets of enamelled earthen ware, a sonorous stone from China, a Venetian horn of glass, key-note flageolets (one of the reign of Henry II.), circular violins made of steel plates; Italian, Chinese and French dulcimers; a counter-bass bassoon six feet long; an Italian music box of the sixteenth century, which still plays its round of dances; soprano bassoons of the reign of Louis XVI., psalterions of the reign of Louis XIII., etc., etc. Musical instrument makers may learn at least one important lesson from this museum. It exhibits in a most striking light their disgraceful inferiority to their predecessors in form. There is not a single instrument to be found in this collection which is not immeasurably superior in form to the instruments on sale in contemporary musical instrument makers' shops. Take, for instance, the key-note flageolet of the reign of Henry II.; it is made of ivory, it is covered with exquisite carvings, and it is as graceful an instrument as a Raphael could place in one of his Muse's hands. The Italian bagpipes are of the most delicate forms,—you know how ungraceful the modern are! The old artists were imbued with a taste of style which seems to have made it impossible for them to violate the canons of grace. They themselves were the first to suffer, and they would have suffered acute pain were the objects on which they had expended all their art, trade and mystery, deficient in those essential qualities of grace and style which recommend to admiration the vilest materials and the humblest instruments. Modern instrument makers have not the excuse (which their advocates urge in their behalf) of want of patronage for these exquisite pieces of art. Broadwood at London and (to a less extent) Erard, here, constantly receive orders for instruments which with excellence of musical qualities combine beauty as objects of art, that they may adorn the drawing-room to which they are destined. Unable to make them beautiful, these manufacturers make them rich. Attempts are made to compensate for the absent beautiful form by bribing the eye with lavish expenditure of gildings, and to make heaviness itself seem an advantage by hinting the heaviness is valuable. We, even the least exacting moderns, may waive the right to challenge contemporary musical instrument makers to rival Stradivarius and the other unapproachable masters; but in a mere question of exterior form it is our duty to insist upon successful rivalry with their predecessors. If they cannot supply us with the nectar and ambrosia their ancestors lavished generously, at least let the beaker avouch them for children of their fathers. If their invention can neither be fogged or shamed into activity—let them servilely copy those admirable models.

Paragraphs from Vienna.

BY A. W. T.

May 10.—Here is a bell story. It comes from a newspaper published at Czrnowitz, in the Austrian province Bukowina.

Not long since the following was related to have occurred at Rarancze, a village near Czrnowitz.

An old peasant, a widower with one son and one daughter, both married, recently died, leaving the son in a state of great rage, owing to the father's refusal to change his will so as to favor him—the son—to the injury of the sister. The unnatural son cursed his dead father, and forbade his wife to enter the house to assist in preparing him for the grave. She went, however, while her husband was in the field, and performed this duty. As soon as he heard of it, he rushed to the body, uttering foul language, and was about to tear the shroud from it. This aroused the father from a trance, in which he had to this moment lain. He sprang up, grasped the son by his arm—fell back in a fit and really died. I will omit the details which follow—they are really shocking; the substance of them is, that the fingers of the dead could not be removed from the arm of the son, until, after the lapse of thirty hours, they were dissected off.

The report of this strange occurrence, together with the announcement that a committee of physicians and surgeons had been sent to Rarancze to report upon the matter, induced several persons, among them divers students, to go over from Czrnowitz to the village, to look into the matter, more especially as the peasantry were beginning to believe that the case was one of actual resurrection from the dead for the purpose of punishing a son's wickedness. When the Czrnowitzers reached Rarancze, they received the following explanation.

The bells for the new church of the village were to be cast. That the casting might be successful, and the bells ring out right loud and invitingly, it was necessary, according to an old Bukowina superstition, to put some strange and striking story in circulation. So the people concerned got together and discussed the matter, finally, hitting upon this story of father and son, and sending eight messengers—two in the direction of each of the cardinal points of the compass—to set the story going, and to see that it made a great sensation. "We must give these messengers, in truth, the credit of having done their duty in the premises with great zeal and skill," says the reporter. "At the same time the casting has proved a success, and from the tower of the new church resounds already in silver clear tones, loud and cheerful, the music of the bells of Rarancze."

May 22.—The other day the Fremdenblatt, one of our daily papers, has the following paragraph.

"We learn from London, that the songstress Adeline Maria Johanna Clorinda Patti has entered a complaint, through her next friend, [as I believe the law term is] James William Macdonald, against her father, Salvatore Patti, and her brother-in-law, Maurice Strakosch. The complaint in all its long printed particulars lies before us, but we hesitate, for the present, to publish the same, notwithstanding the genuineness of the document is affirmed to us here in Vienna by competent authority. The defendants are notified to appear before the Lord Chancellor on the 15th inst."

This is "nuts" for the Vienna theatre-goers, for Strakosch seems to have left no very favorable impression here, and taking advantage of this feeling, a certain Zell, who is a fertile writer of burlesques, has prepared a musical-farcical-dramatic drollery called "Abellina [not Adeline], or, a Brother-in-law for Every thing,"—for the Theatre an der Wien—that theatre, which owed its construction to the success of Mozart's "Magic Flute", and for which Cherubini composed "Faniska," and Beethoven "Fidelio," ever so many years ago. There is a popular songstress here, a Fräulein Gallmeyer, at whose benefit on the 16th inst., the piece was produced before a full house. In the Presse it is thus noticed. I have not seen it.

"As a whole, the piece, the object of which is to burlesque the Patti enthusiasm of the Viennese, and the Humboldt of all theatre-fathers, viz., the brother-in-law Strakosch, has not over and above much wit, but the thing amuses through its hors d'œuvres. There are several good hits, songs and the like. Fräulein Gallmeyer, with her hair colored black, to resemble in this respect, at least, the original Spanish maiden, [Patti was born in Madrid, but by no means of Spanish parents], again set the springs of her satire and daring drollery in motion, and the public applauded the popular local songstress, in a manner which might have satisfied all the heroes of art and literature that we now-a-days can reckon up. Herr Zimmerman imitated most capably Carrion's tender, die-away strains, and Herr Swoboda trilled and rouladed excruciatingly an air from Traviata. Fräulein Gallmeyer gained excessive applause. The novelty will evidently fill the house many a night."

To-day, the piece is advertised—being interpreted—thus:

Theater an der Wein. For the ninth time.

Abellina, or A Brother-in-law for Every thing;

A burlesque for the times, with song, in three pictures;

By Zell and Mery. Music by various masters.

Adeline Patti again. The last number of the Blätter für Theater, &c., is responsible for the following:

"On the 16th of May, an English legal document was shown in the various editorial rooms of the Paris journals, and the request made for its immediate translation and publication. In this document Adeline Patti, at present in London, is made to apply to the proper court, with the petition, that she be received as a "Ward in Chancery," until, in February, 1864, she shall complete her 21st year, and that she be released from the tyranny of her father and brother-in-law. It is affirmed, that her father in Paris, before a notary public, in 1862, released forever, all rights and powers, as father, to and over Adeline and Caroline [Carlotta?] of every nature whatsoever, to his son-in-law. Since coming in possession of this document, the Herr Brother-in-law has treated the timid, pretty Adeline as a sort of female Casper Hauser. He keeps 'the child' actually locked up, shut out from all society, makes all contracts without consultation with her, takes possession of all the receipts, drags the golden-voiced nightingale at will about the world, and when, now and then, the sweet-tempered dove attempts to defend herself, inflicts corporeal punishment (?) upon her, such as is only due to proved culprits. Miss Patti now prays the authorities to save her from this undeserved and extortionate white slavery; is ready to prove her allegations, and demands a medical examination, and the privilege of exhibiting the marks of personal chastisement. (!!) She declares farther that in eight months she has earned 60,000 francs ($12,000) but has herself never received a sou of it; further that a gentleman (in Paris, this is supposed to be M. Aguado) has made her an earnest offer of marriage, that he is a man of independent property, and offers expressly to waive any claim to a marriage portion. But, notwithstanding this, she has been taken from Paris to London, with the express object of putting an end to this relation; that all letters to her are intercepted; and, in general, she is subjected to such treatment, that if the honorable court does not soon extend its parental care over her, she cannot answer for the consequence!"

Such is the ridiculous story of the Blätter für Theater, &c. Isn't it "werry shocking," as my old French coffee-woman used to say.

Now comes the Presse of this morning, May 26, and gives the following edifying history:

"Based upon thoroughly trustworthy letters received from London, we are able to give the following explanation of the complaint said to be entered by Fräulein Patti against Herr Strakosch.

"During the past winter in Paris, a person calling himself Baron de Ville, had pursued Miss Patti with offers of marriage, but making no other impression upon her than that of disgusting intrusiveness. Satisfied of his irresistible attractions, the vain fellow really believed that his want of success could have no other foundation than that of a tyrannical guardianship. He followed her to Vienna, where he put up at the hotel Munsch, under the name of M. Mougrémon, but where he never was received by Miss Patti. He thence followed her to London, where, after various vain attempts to see her, he determined to try by means of a legal intervention to help himself, or at least gratify revenge. De Ville had the impudence to present to the court in Miss Patti's name, and, as pretended, by her authority, a petition containing a complaint against her father and brother-in-law, and praying for the appointment of a guardian. The parties interested were summoned, and Adelina declared in Court, that she, far from entering such a complaint, was perfectly satisfied with and happy in her family relations, and was particularly indebted to, and grateful for the kindness of her brother-in-law, Strakosch, who, from her earliest childhood had been like a father to her, and who was her first and only teacher. As to the Baron, she declared him to be an adventurer, with whom she would have nothing to do.

"The 'Baron,' her worshipper—who probably is hardly compos mentis—was heartily laughed at by the audience, received a reprimand from the court, and was condemned to pay the costs.

"The 'Baron' de Ville, or Mongrénon, it appears, wrote to his friend, Jules Briand, an employé of one of the first — barbers (!) in Vienna, requesting him to obtain the publication of a copy of the petition, which was enclosed. Briand did so, and thus the story got into the papers. An action for slander, which Strakosch threatens to bring here in Vienna, may very probably confirm the facts as here detailed before our tribunals."

I hope Strakosch will pursue the matter, for if there be no redress for the abominable lies and misrepresentations, with which the Horibert Rans et id genus omne of novel writers here in Germany and Austria, defame the dead, regardless of the tears and sorrow of the living, it is to be hoped that the muzzle on the press may not be confined to political matters alone, and that in such flagrant cases as this, the authors of the slander may be adequately punished.

The Mozart Catalogue.

(From the London Athenæum.)

Thematic and Chronological Catalogue of Mozart's Works—Chronologisch-thematisches Verzeichniss sämmtlicher Ton-Werke, W. A. Mozarts, von Dr. Ludwig Ritter von Köchel. (Leipzig, Breitkopf & Härtel; London, Ewer & Co.)

The musician of any age or country, be his object what it will, may well regard this thick volume with admiration and reverence, as one of the holy books of his art. Five hundred and more pages are devoted to the titles of the creations of one who did not attain middle age, and whose life was largely devoted to active exhibition; among which works are a "Don Juan," a "Figaro," a Jupiter Symphony! We are not of the company of the idolaters, who can see no fault, no inequality, who will admit no mannerism in the works of Mozart. We hold, with a judgment stated a few years ago in print, that he produced nothing which has not been of its class excelled by some other master of music: an assertion which, however startling it seems, can be sustained by fact. Taking, however, Mozart's works as a whole, the union of form and beauty, of skill, of spontaneous geniality presented in them, has never been exceeded, if ever approached. Their evenness of quality is wonderful. There is probably no one musician who has given such vast and lasting delight; and this, not to the learned and refined only, but to the enormous public, that cares merely for passing sensations of pleasure. Then, we are somehow never tired of hearing about the man. Book comes after book, life after life,—each more tedious than the last (Dr. Jahn's being, let us hope, final in point of heaviness).—yet they are not to be parted with when once taken in hand. In brief, he possessed genius in all the fullness of most exquisite charm, and was even more loveable than highly-gifted; as we remember anew while lingering over this list of treasures, just as if a large portion of it was not known to us by heart! Is it complete even now, splendid as it is in length! We fancy not; and that some of the slighter pieces, which were flung off by him to please his Viennese comrades, or to make the starched men of science at Leipzig stare, are not here included. On the other hand, it is possible that pieces have crept in which are not from his pen—doubts having been thrown on the authenticity of many of the remains sold by his widow after his decease. Complete or incomplete, however, the collection is unique as an example of fecundity, of beauty, of variety. Admirable, too, is the absence of an arrogant and pedantic spirit; and the willingness to be helpful, without thought of self-assertion. Mozart would throw off occasional songs for other men's operas, and additional accompaniments to other men's oratorios. He scored such music of Bach as hit his fancy. He played with the flute or the horn, when some merry and good-for-little boon companion wanted a concerto. He wrote dances (there are many waltzes, by the way, passing under his name that are not here). In brief, like all men of real genius, he was abundant, gracious and versatile; and thus to be ranked with the Michel Angelos, the Cellinis, the Shakespeares of Art, who know themselves to be too great, and feel themselves to be too generous, to be pinched by any narrow fears of compromising themselves, let them condescend as they please.

Probably, in all this wonderful accumulation of music, its least precious portion consists of the orchestral masses and the organ pieces. The former fall short in the devotional spirit, which breathes with such a mighty and earnest pathos in his "Confutatio," from the Requiem,—in his "Ave Verum."—His English worshippers will learn with surprise, that the service so hackneyed in this country, and known as his Twelfth Mass—in Germany as No. 7—does not figure in this Catalogue; or if so—for here is a Mass No. 7 in the same key, and in the same rhythm—with different phrases by way of opening. The organ music, though written for Germany, is apparently slighter than Handel's, which was written for England in days when the German pedals were next to unknown, without the occasional pompous grandeur of phrase so distinctive of Handel.

An unusually large portion of the six hundred and twenty-six works here indexed are in autograph manuscript. For one who notoriously took life so lightly, and wrought so hastily, Mozart's manuscript is not bad; clear, comparatively, if compared with Beethoven's. A well-known varied Andante in G major, for four hands, is before us, from which that fresh and genial composition has been played. It tells, as does Madame Viardot's famous possession—the manuscript of "Don Juan"—that hasty as he was, and careless, Mozart was not too hasty and careless to reconsider himself;—whether he was pouring out such a burning utterance of passion as "Or sai che l'onore," or merely throwing off a trifle for the amateurs and the shops. To-day, we have lived to see, as rule, the temerity of publishing new works on the largest scale simultaneously with their performance,—works, it may be added, not by Mozart, nor yet, even, by Mendelssohn. This manuscript tells its tale of the "midnight oil," or else of the midnight punch, which Mozart's Stanser used to brew for him, when he was busy, in the drops which spot the time-discolored paper. It is here and there smeared, too, as if the diligent author who left his works behind him in Somebody's Luggage had been over the page, to correct it.—But enough of these notes on a Catalogue, wanting which no musician's library of reference can be henceforth rated as complete. We should add, in conclusion, that Dr. Von Köchel's notes and annotations are sensible, to the purpose, and not over-prolix.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, JUNE 6.—The past musical season has been, on the whole, a rich one for lovers of music in New York. The German and Italian opera companies, the Philharmonic and Liederkreis Societies, Mason and Thomas's quartet party, the concerts given by Messrs. Anschütz, Bergmann, Mills, Thomas, Goldbeck, without mentioning the lighter entertainments of Carlotta Patti, Gottschalk, &c., have presented us with every variety of music (excepting the great oratorio form), old and new. Some of the works performed were heard here for the first time; a few for the first time anywhere.

Of operas, we have heard some entirely new to New York. Such were Meyerbeer's "Dinorah," Nicolai's "Merry Wives of Windsor," Petrella's "Ione," Verdi's "Aroldo," and Gluck's "Orpheus."

"Tone" proved successful even to a furore, among the frequenters of the Academy; the causes of this success have been already discussed; the others pleased more or less (even Aroldo!), excepting the greatest beyond comparison—of course we mean "Orpheus," and that proved an unequivocal failure, as might have been almost surely predicted; for this opera requires an undoubtedly great artist in the principal part, a perfect mise en scene, beyond the possibilities of the Winter Garden, and an essentially music and art loving audience.

Mlle. Vestval's performance of "Orpheus" was doubtless modelled after that of Viardot-Garcia, which she must have frequently studied in Paris, but most certainly after it, if we may believe half the raptures of Berlioz, Scudo, Fiorentino, &c., on the wonderful personation of that great artist, who, never handsome, past middle age, and with a failing voice, had yet the power to enchain by the magic of her genius, the attention of enraptured audiences, for upwards of three hundred nights,—audiences in part composed of people who went to Paris from England, Italy, Russia, solely to hear Garcia in "Orpheus." Mlle. Vestval has great physical beauty, yet little feminine charm; she astonishes, but she does not touch or attract. She did not fill our ideal of the poet Orpheus, who, we imagine from his history (be that fact in part or not), must have been somewhat effeminate,—either in person or action; her gestures and attitudes were too ostensibly intended rather to exhibit herself, than the character or composer. Neither was her voice, and especially her school, sufficient for the great music she undertook to render.

Little Madam Rotter was more satisfactory in the single scene allotted to Euridice; she was, at least, honest, earnest, and touching. The scenic effect was mediocre and often incorrect; the modern ballet skirts, parading round the tomb of Euridice, in the first act, were enough to throw ridicule on the whole opera. It is much to be regretted that the right spirit did not preside over this revival; how many people, unacquainted with the score, and knowing no better, will judge of the sublimely simple melodies, the deeply truthful expression, the dramatic effect of Gluck, merely from the manner in which they heard all this rendered at the Winter Garden, and will, perhaps, deem the weak points of the performance those of the great master! May Garcia's self come here one day, and undeceive New York, we pray! Even the critics (Heaven save the mark!) discoursed unknowingly about the "trotting" of this "old foggy" composer across the Atlantic!!

Somewhere about thirty operas, in all, were performed during the season, by the German and Italian companies, including some by Mozart, Beethoven's "Fidelio," Rossini's "Semiramide," which failed from the same cause as "Orpheus," namely, the want of the right women in the right place. Schubert's operetta "The Family Quarrel," by an amateur society; Offenbach's droll trifle "La rose de St. Fleur," by the French company; Mr. Edward Mollenhauer's tragic opera "The Corsican Bride," performed some three or four times, at the close of the season, with tolerable success, the music being light, and wanting in originality, but the whole thing despite its poor libretto, put together with a certain savoir faire, owing, no doubt, to Mr. Mollenhauer's experience as a theatrical orchestra leader, "La Favorita," "Norma," &c., &c.

The list of Symphonies performed last winter is not a short one. Beethoven's No. 1, No. 4, No. 5, and No. 7; Mozart's No. 4; Emanuel Bach's in D; Schumann's two in B. and Bb; Gade's No. 1, Liszt's "Tasso" and "Faust;" Berlioz's "Harold in Italy," and M. Goldbeck's promising original symphony, "Victoria."

Of Overtures, we had naturally a greater number than of Symphonies, old and new composers having figured equally extensively in the list. Almost all were noticeable; among them we must mention Gluck's to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Beethoven's "Leonora" No. 3; Mozart's to the "Magic Flute;" Weber's "Jubel," and that to "Oberon;" Cherubini's to "Medea;" Mendelssohn's to Victor Hugo's "Ruy Blas;" Schumann's beautiful "Overture, Scherzo, and Finale," his "Manfred," and Julius Cæsar;" Wagner's introduction to "Lohengrin," his "Faust" overture characteristic, and that to "Tannhäuser;" Berlioz's "Francs juges," and "Carneval Romain;" Gade's "Michael Angelo," and "Reminiscences of Osean;" Rossini's to "William Tell," and Litolff's "Rocheperre."

Of sacred music, and of that species, the cantata, which belongs par excellence to the concert room, rather than to the church or the stage, we had Sebastian Bach's introduction to "St. Matthew's Passion;" Mozart's "Requiem;" Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," an eight part chorus by Palestrina; Romberg's "Lay of the bell;" the Credo from Liszt's "Graner" Mass; Gade's "Comala;" Mendelssohn's finale to "Loreley;" Weber's "Preciosa" music; Meyerbeer's chorus and melo-dramatic music, written for "Struensee," and other things less noticeable.

It would be an endless task to enumerate the miscellaneous instrumental works,—solos, duets, trios, quartets, sonatas, concertos, &c., heard at the various and varied concerts of the winter; it will be sufficient to say, that from Bach and Tartini, down to the composers of our day, many masters of the different schools were generously represented.

For the future season, we have promises of much and good music. Mr. Maretzek will open the Academy in the autumn, with a company of Italian artists, including Madame Medori, Signor Mazzoleni, and others among the singers who gained such popularity here last season. Petrella, the composer of "Ione," is to pay us a visit, for the purpose of bringing out and conducting a new opera of his own in New York; and writing of this visit, reminds us of a report concerning a more distinguished probable visitor, namely, Joachim, the greatest of living violinists, who, in company with his wife, formerly Mlle. Weiss, the singer, is said to be shaping his plans American. But this sounds almost too good to be true. But if true! and if Clara Schumann would only come with them! Then, Mr. Anschütz's future season of German opera promises to be on a more liberal scale than the past; the three Formes, bass, baritone, and tenor, will be induced, it is hoped, to join the company. The Philharmonic, Arion, Liederkreis, and other societies, are also preparing much fine music for future concerts; so that we may hope, not without reason, to enjoy some of the best that is to be heard, at the performances of resident established musicians alone, setting aside the chances of distinguished visitors, should circumstances prove favorable.

Festivals in Germany.

The London Musical World gives the following list of the various Musical Festivals which will take place, or have already taken place, in Germany, this summer. In Aix-la-chapelle, on the 6th and 7th of September, the First Vocal Festival of the Singers of the Rhenish Association, and Grand International Vocal Competition, under the direction of the Aix-la-chapelle Vocal Association for Male Voices—"Concordia." In Augsburg, on the 1st—3d August, the "Liederfest" of the Swabian and Bavarian Vocal Union, comprising 38 smaller Associations with 1062 members. In Bamberg, on the 25th—28th of July, "Das Fränkische Musikfest" in which 2755 singers have announced their intention of taking part. In Brunswick, on the 13th—15th of July, German "Liederfest" under the direction of Herr Franz Abt; the Vocal Associations of 60 different towns will sing on the occasion. In Darmstadt, on the 16th of August, the Musical Festival of the Middle Rhine. In Düsseldorf, on the 24th—25th of May, the Fortieth Musical Festival of the Lower Rhine—conductors, Herren Tausch and Otto Goldschmidt. In Königsberg, on the 27th—29th of May, the Third Musical Festival—conductor, Herr Anton Rubinstein. At Ochringen, on the 28th and 29th of June, the "Liederfest" of the Swabian Vocal Association. At Ohlau, the Vocal Association for Male Voices will celebrate the 25th Anniversary—date not fixed. At Reichenberg, in Bohemia, a grand Vocal Festival will take place some time during August.

From the same journal we take portions of a letter describing the Düsseldorf Festival, dated May 27.

On this occasion, for the first day of the Festival, the work selected was Elijah, which had been performed only once previously at any Rhenish Festival. The principal solos were undertaken by Mad. Jenny Lind-Goldschmidt; Mlle. von Edelberg (of Munich); Dr. Gunz (of Hanover); and Herr Julius Stockhausen, the smaller parts being entrusted to Mlle. Büschgens (from Crefeld), and Mlle. Pelasusten (from Cologne). The conductor of the oratorio was Herr Otto Goldschmidt, from London, while Mr. Blagrove, also from London, was the leader. The orchestra comprised one hundred and forty-six musicians, and produced a great effect, more especially by the fullness of the stringed quartet. The performance was rendered particularly brilliant by the new organ, played by Herr Weber, of Cologne. The chorus consisted of 781 persons, thus distributed: 219 sopranos, 159 contraltos, 175 tenors, and 228 basses. Thus much for statistical returns, as far as they are to be gathered from every guide-book. I give them as a matter of form. In stating my individual opinion of the performance, I can be short.—To think of telling your readers anything they have not already been told concerning Mendelssohn's work would argue in me an amount of arrogance of which I should not like to be supposed capable. Admiration for Mendelssohn is at home in Berlin, and I have rarely been present at a grander performance than that of Elijah, under Professor Stern's direction, last winter. But what endowed the performance here with more than usual interest was the combination of vocalists who could not be surpassed anywhere.—The youthful charm of Madame Jenny Lind Goldschmidt's voice has disappeared, as no one can be enthusiastic enough to deny. Its character of sweetness has been obliged to pay a tribute to Time; but the lady still retains the most elevated feminine grace; her profound and gentle feeling is still the same as when I heard her, when Jenny Lind, for the first time as Alice in Robert le Diable, in London.—The impression she produced upon me, at that epoch, was one which can never be forgotten, but quite as deep and moving an effect was excited in my breast the other day, by her singing of the air, "Höre, Israel," though two decenniums had nearly elapsed. It is a profoundly pious feeling which steals into my heart, when I hear her sing the air in question; I experience a desire for inward prayer. Mlle. von Edelberg possesses a vigorous contralto of the noblest character, to which is united a very good style. Dr. Gunz was not quite himself, but displayed good musical training and intelligence. Herr Julius Stockhausen sang the bass solos in an exemplary style. Although I am inclined to think the high position of the organ and the softness of its tone not quite adapted to Elijah, I cannot help expressing my deep respect for the gentleman who presided at it.—The ladies entrusted with the smaller solos were remarkable for the pleasing quality of their voices.—The chorus and orchestra were on a level with the work. The first day was a worthy commencement of the Festival. It was impossible not to perceive the reverential earnestness which animated the exponents, who, the audience felt, were conscious what kind of a composition they were executing. If I say that the second day satisfied me less than the first, I beg that I may not be misunderstood. If not equal to the first as regards quality, it surpassed it as regards quantity; there was too much music. I am as great a lover of music as ever existed in the wide world; but to sit and listen to heavy music, for four mortal hours, in a crowded, nay, nearly over-crowded hall, was too much even for me. Here, however, is the programme, so that every one may form his own opinion:—1. "Suite" by Bach; 2. Three Psalms by Marcello (scored by Lindpaintner); 3. "Ode to St.

Cecilia" by Handel (with Mozart's instrumentation), 4. C minor Symphony by Beethoven; 5. Third Part of the Creation, by Haydn.

You will at once perceive that I was not quite wrong in my assertion as to there being too much music. The conductors on this evening were, for purely instrumental compositions, Herr Julius Tausch and, for the others, Herr Otto Goldschmidt. With regard to the execution of the orchestral pieces, I cannot quite agree with the nearly universal enthusiasm; I have heard the same pieces, especially Beethoven's Symphony, played far more effectively elsewhere; but, notwithstanding this, I must acknowledge the care exhibited by Herr Tausch. In the second movement of the "Suite," Herr Ludwig Strauss, of Frankfurt-on-the-Maine, executed the violin solo with praiseworthy correctness. The gem of the evening was Jenny Lind. How inspiring in its effect was the delicacy of her expression in the "Ode to St. Cecilia!" The voice was no longer that of the day previous, which produced in me so pious a frame of mind by its rendering of the air, "Höre, Israel!" It was a voice calling to me from the heavens above. You are laughing again, I know you are, and thinking to yourself: "Still the same incorrigible enthusiastic dreamer as ever!" But you are mistaken. I give you my word that an air from the "Ode," so sung by Jenny Lind, would convert heathens, render free-thinkers devout, and restore misanthropes to the world and human society. I have not much to say concerning the third day of the Festival, when the so-called "Artists' Concert" took place, that is—a concert at which each person rides his or her own particular hobby. Of what was good, I will mention only the best. Madame Jenny Lind-Goldschmidt sang an air from Mozart's Rê Pastore, with obligato violin accompaniment, played by Mr. Blagrove; Herr Tausch executed Spohr's Concerto in G minor; and Herr Tausch, Beethoven's Fantasia with chorus and band; while Herr Stockhausen gave us a few airs, songs, &c.

London.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY. The concerts go on in the even tenor of their way, classical as always under the conductorship of Sterndale Bennett. The programme of the fifth (May 18) had for Symphonies Haydn No. 11 and Beethoven No. 4; for overtures the old Freischütz and Zampa, and a Fantasia Overture, "Paradise and the Peri," by Bennett, written for the Commemoration of the 50th year of the Society last summer, which, it is said, "gains enormously" on a second hearing. This took the place of the usual Concerto. Airs from Haydn and Mozart, and a Valse by Gounod were sung by Mlle. Tietjen's with "all her splendid energy."

Sixth Concert (June 1). Symphonies: Spohr in D minor, No. 2, (composed for the Philharmonic 40 years ago), and Beethoven in F (No. 8). Overtures: Euryanthe, and one in C by Mendelssohn, composed for the Philharmonic more than thirty years ago, sometimes called "the Trumpet Overture," which London critics pronounce "a masterpiece in every sense" and blame the Leipzig professors for not publishing among his "posthumous" works. Beethoven's G major concerto (for piano) was played by Arabella Goddard. The singers were Signor Fricka (properly Herr Fricke), Fr. Liebhart, who sang a bravura air from Mozart's Così fan tutte, and Mme. Lehmann, from Copenhagen, (well remembered here in Boston,) who sang the scena from Der Freyschütz; the Times says, "she has a powerful voice, and is earnest and strenuous in her delivery."

Seventh Concert, June 15. Symphonies: Beethoven, No. 1; Mendelssohn, in A minor. Overtures: Oberon (Weber), and Anacreon (Cherubini.) Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto, played by M. Bazian, "a virtuoso of merit, but not equal to that work," Singers: Mlle. Artôt and Sig. Delle Sedie.

NEW PHILHARMONIC.—Dr. Wyke, conductor. The fourth concert, (Wednesday, June 3), offered two Symphonies: viz., Spohr's Double Symphony in C, and Beethoven's Pastoral; three Overtures: Schumann's to Genoveva, Weber's to Oberon, and Mozart's to "Magic Flute;" a Piano-forte Serenade and Rondo by Mendelssohn, played by Charles Hallé; and singing (airs from Donizetti and Rossini, Rode's Variations, &c.), by Mme. Alboni. The Musical World says:

The fifth and last concert of the season, attracted the largest attendance of the series. The programme, with one exception, consisted of old acquaintances, but of those whom we reckon among our dearest and best. Let the selection show:—Part I.—Overture (Leonora), Beethoven; Song, "Deh vieni non tardar" (Figaro), Mozart; Concerto, for violin and orchestra, Spohr; Aria, "Il dolce suono" (Lucia) Donizetti; Symphony in A major, Mendelssohn. Part II.—Concerto, for pianoforte and orchestra, in F minor, Wylde; Air (Der Freischütz), Weber; Chorus (Jessonda), Spohr; Polacca, "Son vergin vezzosa" (IPuritani), Bellini; Overture (Masaniello), Auber.

The exception to our old acquaintances will be recognized in the concerto of Dr. Wylde, which was introduced by Madame Arabella Goddard, not at the request of the composer, but as a graceful compliment to the director. The concerto in F minor is the work of a thoughtful musician, clearly designed and well developed, often graceful, as often brilliant, and invariably effective. The orchestra is every where well handled, and the solo passages for the piano display both an elegant fancy, and a thorough knowledge of the instrument. Dr. Wylde is not a large producer, but if he had time and turned his attention to instrumental composition we might expect very many good things from his pen. Madame Arabella Goddard's execution of the concerto was splendid from beginning to end. Many of the passages are extremely difficult; but this young lady knows no difficulty.

MUSICAL SOCIETY OF LONDON:—The youngest of the Orchestral or Symphony Societies, with Alfred Mellon for conductor. The fourth and last concert of the season gave Beethoven's C minor Symphony, (the World says: "We have heard it played, if not with more vigor, at least with more refinement;" and this of "the finest orchestra probably ever assembled in a London concert room.") The overtures were those to Jessonda and Tell, and one by Mr. Macfarren to Hamlet, which the same authority calls "an intellectual and thoroughly poetical composition," having a "smack of the so-called character overtures of Beethoven and Mendelssohn,"—yet coldly received, perhaps for want of more rehearsal. Mendelssohn's D minor Concerto was played by Miss Madeline Schiller, (a young lady of German parentage, but born in England, who distinguished herself at the Leipzig Conservatorium); her reception was encouraging. Sig. Delle Sedie sang airs from Stradella and Verdi.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.—The 129th (June 8) was exclusively devoted to Beethoven. The Musical World says:

Even the vocal pieces were his; those quaint and pretty lieder, "The Savoyard" and "The Stolen Kiss," being included in the first part, and the incomparable "Adelaide" in the second. The singer was Mr. Sims Reeves, who treats Beethoven as he treats Handel and Mendelssohn. Madame Goddard played the Sonata Appassionata as it has rarely been played before by pianist or pianiste. She also joined Signor Piatti in the sonata for pianoforte and violoncello in A, the most beautiful of the five which the "immeasurably rich" Beethoven has left. The quartets were those in F and A, Nos. 1 and 5 of the first set (what a first set!), Op. 18. They were admirably given by the new violinist, Herr Japha, Herr L. Ries, Mr. H. Webb, and Signor Piatti. Mr. Benedict—restored, we are glad to say, to perfect health—occupied his usual post as accompanist.

MR. HALLÉ'S PIANO-FORTE RECITALS, opened Friday afternoon, May 14, at St. James's Hall. The Athenæum says:

Mr. Hallé has a sure place in England—such as can be won here only by an instrumentalist under conditions of remarkable accomplishment and progress. Londoners may well be glad that, after two years of exclusive devotion to Beethoven's Sonatas, for his own series of concerts this season, he has recourse to the general library of classical music, and not to one particular shelf of it. Yesterday week, we had Beethoven's Sonata in A, No. 3, Op. 2 (a work which breaks down every classifying theory of manners and styles, being, in some features, as boldly new as its writer's last Piano-forte Sonata),—a Partita in B minor, by Bach,—Mozart's Trumpet

Sonata, Op. 21,—Weber's Solo Sonata in C, Op. 24, the performance of which could not be surpassed for sentiment, lustre of execution, charm of tone and unfaltering power,—two "Moments Musicaux" by Schubert, the second a quaint Hongroise in F minor,—Mendelssohn's "Caprice" in E, Op. 33, this also played to perfection,—lastly, two specimens by Chopin. Better relished the best of music and the best of playing could not be than they were by the large audience assembled.

His second programme was "commanded" by the Princess of Wales, as follows:

Part I.—Sonata in E flat, Op. 29, No. 3, Beethoven; Harpsichord Lessons, G and D, D. Scarlatti; Gavottes and Musettes, in D minor and G minor (from "Suites Anglaises"), S. Bach; Bagatelles, Book I., Nos. 1, 2, 3, and 7, Beethoven.

Part II.—Sonata, in C sharp minor, Op. 27, No. 1 (The Moonlight), Beethoven; Impromptu, in B flat, Op. 142, Schubert; Two Valses, in C sharp minor and D flat, Op. 64, Chopin; "Lieder ohne Worte," Book II., No. 1; Book IV., No. 5; and Book VI., No. 6, Mendelssohn.

THE VOCAL SOCIETIES have not been idle. Mr. Henry Leslie's Choir has given Madrigals, Part-songs, Mendelssohn's Ave Maria and "Hear my Prayer," with songs by Reeves, Mlle. Parspa and others, and piano pieces from Bach and Handel by Arabella Goddard. The Harmonic Society sang Mendelssohn's Athalia, and Handel's "Dettingen Te Deum," May 15. Judas Maccabæus was given at Exeter Hall, by the National Choral Society, under Mr. G. W. Martin, May 28th, with band and chorus of seven hundred. The Creation by the Sacred Harmonic Society, May 29. The anniversary meeting of the Charity Children under the great dome of St. Paul's, took place June 11.

Of course there has been the usual abundant early summer crop of concerts by individuals, virtuoso-ish and classical, annual and occasional, for a summary of which we have not room.

As for the two opera houses, we must be content to resume some six or eight weeks history of them in our next number.

VIENNA. Among the pieces played at the Court Opera house during the month of May were Don Juan, L'Etoile du Nord, Lalla Roukh, the Huguenots, &c. The corner stone of the new opera house was laid May 20; the minister of commerce opened the ceremonies with a discourse, and a Cantata, written for the occasion, words by Steinhäuser, music by Franz Doppler, was performed.

Schumann's "Paradise and the Peri."

FOURTH AND LAST ARTICLE.

The Third Part opens with a chorus of blissful Houriis singing in Paradise, while the Peri is winging her way up to the gate to offer her second gift.

This chorus (No. 18) is one of the happiest and freshest fancies in the whole Cantata. The idea of introducing such a chorus is Schumann's own, and he has probably composed the words as well as the music, of which the English version before us is rather a free one:

Strew with fair garlands great Alla's throne,
Roses entwining, bring gayest flowers,
Till the Eternal's propitious smile
Graciously fall on Heav'n's utmost bowers.
His throne surrounding,
With joy abounding,
Humbly bow before the Lord!

It is of course for female voices, and is in four parts, soprani and alti. There is a wholesome, serene happiness, a clear, perennial purity and freshness in the music. The joyful melody of the leading theme is divided between the two upper parts, which pursue each other in canon, while the alti fill out the harmony. The beauty is bewildering, while you feel the perfect unity; it requires no science to enjoy it, if it did to write it. The instruments go with the voices:—what could they do better? Then comes in a second thought:

Let us forget not those we love,
Wandering o'er the earth in sadness!
Darkness below us, splendor above,
Hatred there, but here love and gladness!
Strew with fair, &c.

These lines are sung by a single voice on each part, in a more thoughtful minor key, while the canon form is dropped. The charm of this middle sentence in the music is worthy to contrast with that of the principal motive (in canon), "Strew with fair garlands," &c., which returns to round off the chorus proper, although the piece is not yet finished. The time is quickened, as the accompaniments break into triplets, and a solo voice calls out in excited tones:

See where comes flying the Peri fair Toward Heaven's gate!

and the rest take up the strain in chorus:

Peri, fair Peri, do not despair,
Faith and Trust will betray thee never.
Seek for the boon,
Thou'lt reach it soon,
What so dear is unto the Lord!

There is a chaste and serious expression in all this; but the next lines, sung by two voices in thirds, in gay, light-hearted triplets, are more suggestive of the common notion of the delights of a Mahomedan paradise:

Let us away to the rosy bowers,
Pleasure bestowing, pleasure receiving,
Kisses partaking, warm kisses giving,
'Mid the cool arbors hanging with flowers.

There is a touch here of the naive Mozart style of gaiety, and you are reminded of Zerlina's wedding day—just for a moment, for immediately, with the next three lines:

See the sun ascending—
Niles never ending
Stays for the best who wait on the Lord!

the chorus comes in with a few bars of most solemn and impressive character, with trombones, all pianissimo, accompanying. As the last chord dies away, a single violin shoots up the scale, at once suggesting the Peri's eager upward flight, and leading into the next number of the music:

19. Tenor solo, followed by Alto solo. Another of those melodious recitations, with beautiful and graphic accompaniment, telling how she listens to the preceding chorus, as she soars up to the heavenly gate, bearing the last sigh of the lovers; how her heart beats high with hope as she hears the sound of the crystal bells from the trees of Eden (bells imitated in the music); but how, after all, her hope is again deceived; the gate stands not open; and then the Alto (Angel) gives her words of comfort, but: "Far holier must be the gift," &c.

20. Recitative of the Peri: "Rejected! Ah! banished," &c., slow and mournful; but breaking forth directly into an earnest, ardent, beautiful Allegro; her whole soul goes forth in it; it is a song of aspiration, so pure and intense that it can know no failure:

No, let me not rest, but wander forth,
Earth's farthest shores to wander over,
From pole to pole seek to discover
This costly prize I would attain,
That yields the highest bliss to me,
When Eden's gate shall open be.
What though it sleep
In caverns deep,
Where darkness reigns—I'll not despair,
But find the precious Jewel there!

21. Air for a Baritone voice, very slow, with a rich, half slumbrous, humble-bee sort of murmur in it, very melodious and sweet. And very original; a song that rewards study; difficult to sing well, yet capable of fine effect when so sung; the accompaniment moving in rich and often strangely groping chords; but the seeming monotony relieved in the middle portion by a running figure in the violas, and afterwards arpeggios. This baritone air may be found dull and heavy; but it is designed to illustrate the poetic description of luxurious Eastern scenery, with its heavy, scented air, as well as the fading rays of sunset "on Syria's land where blooms the rose."

Fair gardens, shining streams, with ranks
Of golden melons on their banks,
More golden where the sunlight falls;—
And then the mingled sounds that come,
Of shepherd's ancient reed, with hum
Of the wild bees of Palestine.
Banqueting through the flowery vales;
And Jordan, those sweet banks of thine,
And woods, so full of nightingales.

It was no easy task, and a bold one, to set this long stretch of verbal scene-painting, all of such richly mingled hues and images, to music; but it is achieved here by the magical touch of genius. Not the less genius, and not the less interesting, if we do have here, as in a few other places, something of that "magical narcotic perfume" which a German critic has ascribed to Schumann.

22. Here we have another of those happy poetic as well as musical ideas, which Schumann has interpolated into Moore's poem. He supposes the Peri, starting earthward on her next search, to be met by four sister Peris, who sing a most delightful, thoroughly original, refreshing little Quartet; a delicious surprise. "Peri, is't true?" they sing; "dost thou to Heaven's gate aspire? Shall sun so bright and starry night no more delight thee? Then take us with thee!" The inquiring piquancy of the little phrases echoed from soprano to alto (each in two parts); the freshness, brightness, quaintness of the harmony; the lively figure in the accompaniment, which goes fluttering off in octave triplets as the voices cease, has a novel and indescribable charm. It falls like a ray of the newest sort of sunshine into the midst of the golden gloom of the baritone descriptive solo which precedes and follows it, relating how sad the soul of the Peri, how weary her wings as she beholds the ruined temple of the Sun.

23. This number, wholly narrative and descriptive, contains the third and last adventure of the Peri and the finding of the heavenly gift. It is neither melody, nor recitative precisely, although a continuous chain of solo pieces. Perhaps the term melodious recitation, which we have before used, will best apply to it. First, the Peri muses over the thought that there may be an amulet hidden in that Temple of the Sun, whose inscription haply she may read, and it will tell her where the charm she seeks may really be found. Then the Tenor takes up "the wondrous tale" in equally wondrous music, changing with all the changes of poetic image, yet with a pervading theme of melody, which passes into a purer, heavenlier key, as it were, and an Alto or Mezzo Soprano voice, where the vesper bell calls to prayer (how tenderly the image of the praying child is given by the lovely music!); then back to the Tenor, who tells the effect on the sinful man; the number ending with the solemn, simple tune of a religious choral, which the man sings, thinking of his own days of infancy and innocence.—We can do scarcely more than cite the words:

Tenor Solo.
Cheer'd by this hope she bends her thither:
Still laughs the radiant eye of Heaven,
Nor have the golden bowers of Eden

In the rich West begun to wither;—
When o'er the vale of Balbec winging,
She sees a child at play,
Among the rosy wild flowers singing,
As rosy and as wild as they:
And near the boy, who thr'd with play
Now nestling 'mid the roses lay.
She saw a wearied man dismount
From his hot steed, and on the brink
Of a small fount's rustic fount
Impatient fling him down to drink.
Then swift his haggard brow he turn'd
To the fair child, who fearless sat,
Though never yet bath day-beam burn'd
Upon a brow more fierce than that—
Sullenly fierce—a mixture dire,
Like thunder-clouds, of gloom and fire,
In which the Peri's eye could read
Dark tales of many a ruthless deed;
Oaths broken, and the threshold stain'd
With blood of guests—the shrine profan'd—
In blackest drops there written all.

Soprano Solo
But, hark! the vesper call to prayer,
As slow the orb of daylight sets,
Is rising sweetly on the air.
From Syria's thousand minarets!
The boy has started from the bed
Of flowers, where he had laid his head,
And kneels upon the fragrant sod,
From Purty's own cherub mouth
Lipping the eternal name of God,
And looking, while his hands and eyes
Are lifted to the glowing skies,
Like an angel child.
Just lighted on that flowery plain,
And seeking for its home again.

Tenor Solo.
And how felt he, the wretched man
Reeling there—while memory ran
O'er many a year of guilt and strife,
Flaw o'er the dark flood of his life,
Nor found one sunny resting-place,
Nor brought him back one branch of grace.

The Men.
There was a time, thou blessed child,
When, young and pure as thou,
I look'd and pray'd like thee—but now!

All this is told quite as much, or more, by the instruments than by the voice. It forms a beautiful connected whole, every detail of which, even to the smallest shade or image, rewards examination. Yet it is not so piquant or so strikingly effective as some portions of the Cantata; it has, perhaps, too much of the "magical narcotic perfume" as of an overlaid atmosphere, and, but for the bright Quartet of Peris, it might, coming so soon after the long Baritone solo, be somewhat wearisome to some ears. But there is in it the charm of a something mystical and sacred. It brings us to the sanctuary, where the Holy Grail is kept.

24. The penitential psalm just sung by the man becomes the theme of a sacred chorus in four parts, with four soli: "Blest tears of soul-felt penitence!" Rich, noble and impressive harmony; church-like and grand, with passages of imitative counterpoint. A refreshing, soul-strengthening piece.

25. The descriptive, mystical, richly accompanied, melodious recitation is resumed again. The Peri muses on the magical power of that "one heavenly drop," the tear of repentance; and then follows in a tender and admiring vein:

Tenor Solo, with Chorus.
And now, behold him kneeling there
By the child's side, in humble prayer,
While the same sunbeam shines upon
The guilty and the guiltless one,
And hymns of joy proclaim thro' Heaven
The triumph of a Soul Forgiven!
'T was when the golden orb had set,
While on their knees they linger'd yet,
There fell a light more lovely far
Than ever came from sun or star,
Upon that tear.
To mortal eye this light might seem
A northern flash or meteor beam—
But well the enraptur'd Peri knew
'T was a bright smile the Angel threw
From Heaven's gate, to hail that tear
Her harbinger of glory near!

At the words: "And hymns of joy proclaim thro' Heaven," we catch as it were the far off angelic harmony, snatches of chorus pianissimo, with trombone accompaniment. The tenor completes the strain alone, leading directly into the jubilant and glorious Finale.

26. The Peri's song of joy and triumph, accompanied by the welcoming Chorus of the Blest:

Joy, joy forever! my task is done—
The Gates are pass'd and Heaven is won!

It is a swift, exciting, heaven-climbing song, full of rapture uncontrollable, springing and falling beautifully as a fountain in the sunshine. The instruments partake of the enthusiasm, and supply bright and stimulating phrases, full of suggestion and sometimes of reminiscence; as for instance, when the Peri compares the worthlessness of all other joys to those of Eden, the orchestra recalls repeatedly, in various keys, and with a rare charm of harmony, a striking passage from her very first song (No. 2) where wistfully she made the same comparison she now makes in triumph. Her ardent, soaring voice keeps on, now alternating with the chorus, now ringing clear upon the top of it. Higher and higher it soars, never weary of repeating the strain, now holding out a long high liquid tone, now disporting itself in shining circles, and climbing at last to the C in alt, before it is swallowed up from mortal ears, with the angelic chorus, in heights of heavenly bliss, beyond where mortal ear or eye may follow.

New Music.

(From Oliver Ditson & Co.)

CHOPIN. Sixteen Polish Songs. German words (from the original Polish) by F. GUXBERT; English version by Miss FANNY MALONE RAYMOND.

It cannot be pretended that these little songs are by any means of equal importance with Chopin's marvellous tone-poems for the piano. Piano music was peculiarly his sphere. Yet the songs are interesting, full of romantic feeling, individual, and have a decided flavor of nationality. They are for the most part very simple too, and must win their way to many hearts. Of those already before us in print we may mention:

No. 1. "The Maiden's Wish." A simple, naive melody, in waltz form, somewhat Tyrolean wistful.

No. 11. "Two Lovers." A dirge, simple, solemn, heartfelt; a song of the soldier dead upon the field and the maiden broken-hearted.

No. 14. "The little ring." Here Chopin himself peeps out. A faint smile, half sweet, half sad, pervades the music. One of the most beautiful and delicate of the set.

No. 16. "Lithuanian Song." This is another very characteristic one; the maiden's confession to the angry mother.

The translator has appreciated the music and her task.

J. STRAUSS. Thermen Walzer, for Piano-forte. pp. 11.

A spirited and luscious set of waltzes, full of pretty fancies. A very good specimen of the gay Viennese dance music, though none of the later waltzes, to our thinking, quite come up to the earlier sets by the elder Strauss.

HANDEL. Song: "O ruddier than the cherry." pp. 7.

This is the famous song of the one-eyed monster Polyphemus in Acis and Galatea; a bass song, though here written in the G clef. A robust, rampant, rollicking air indeed, full of roulades, and a good task for a glib and ponderous bass voice.

CHARLES VOSS. Good Night, Farewell: Transcription for the Piano. pp. 7.

The sentimental serenade-like theme is very gracefully illustrated in a series of delicate variations, forming as a whole a pleasing and refined, if not a particularly original, sort of Notturmo.

MR. J. K. PAINE'S Organ Concert takes place at the West Church this afternoon. His extremely interesting programme will be found in our advertising columns. It embraces some of the noblest works of Bach, Mendelssohn, and that lamented genius, Thiele, who died at the age of 24. Also original compositions, and an improvisation. Mr. KIMBALL, of the choir of the West Church, will sing a couple of bass solos. Such opportunities to hear true organ music are indeed rare.

THE FOURTH.—The music at the City Celebration, in the Academy of Music, was most creditable to Mr. BUTLER, the conductor, and to the hundreds of young ladies, who looked charmingly all dressed in white.

We copy the following (from the Monthly Choir), merely for the purpose of saying that there is no foundation for either of the guesses contained in it. The whole question of who is to open the Great Organ, or who is to be the organist, remains undecided, perhaps is not even yet in order with those whose business it will be to decide it.

We read, with great pleasure, the announcement in the Boston Musical Times, that Mr. W. Morgan, of New York, is to have the honor of first performing on the new Organ imported for the Musical Hall in Boston. We hear now, however, that Mr. Walcker contemplates importing an Organ-player to his own liking, to do justice to his first American Organ. We should hail the advent of an additional "good" Organist, but should feel sorry to have the gentleman in view come across the Atlantic to find out that America possesses at least Organists equal to any emergency, even if the Organ builders of America should prove to be inferior to Europeans—a point which is as yet not settled.

POUGHKEEPSIE, N. Y.—We have the following letter from a source entitling it to credit:

"On Thursday evening, June 25th, a goodly number of the patrons and friends of the Cottage Hill Seminary, were assembled together by invitation of the Principal, the Rev. George T. Rider, M. A., to attend a Soirée Musicale given by the fair pupils, at the closing of the term. The programme would have done credit to a more strictly professional company of performers, and was not only highly creditable in regard to the selection of morceaux, but also in regard to the manner of performance. Among the piano pieces were the Sonata Pat etique of Beethoven, which was very carefully and conscientiously played, though, perhaps, lacking somewhat in breadth of style,—the Air Variée from Lucia by Prudent, a capital performance; and the well-known Duo, for two pianos, from Belisario, by Gorla, which was given with a degree of abandon indicating a thorough mastery of the brilliant difficulties of that composition.

"In the vocal list were included the celebrated Scena ed Aria "Ernani, involami," from Verdi, exhibiting on the part of the young and gifted vocalist a marvellous degree of vocal proficiency; the grand Duo Quis est homo, well rendered, both by voices and piano, and also the humorous Scotch ballad, "Twas within a mile of Edinburgh, given in true ballad style, and with an expression of archness and simplicity truly mirth-provoking. But this was not all. After this surfeit of good things well done, Sterndale Bennett's Cantata of The May Queen made up the second part of the programme, in which the principal female parts were well sustained by two of the young ladies of the school, assisted by one or two male voices in the concerted pieces. The whole performance went off with great éclat, and gave good evidence of the care and assiduous attention paid to the study and practice of music at Cottage Hill Seminary.

"And in this connection let me add a few words. This school is not one of that sort which lives upon a noisy and popular reputation. It is conducted in a quiet and unobtrusive manner, seeking to form and elevate the standard of female character by studies and discipline calculated to promote intellectual strength and power; nor while the mind is expanding is the physical development neglected. Frequent rambles in the fields and woods afford not only an opportunity for the study of nature, but also give a cheerful vigor and elasticity to the system well calculated to enable it to endure the severer studies within the school-room. Nor do salutary influences cease to exercise themselves at the expiration of school hours. Cottage Hill is to each inmate a Christian home, where the gentle spirit of parental care is constantly exercised towards those who may sojourn under its roof."

TRINITY CHIMES, in New York, gave a grand concert on the Fourth. The Sunday Times reports it:

Mr. James E. Ayliffe, of Trinity, gave us, at seven in the morning, and at noon, the following named pieces, which, it is unnecessary to state, were well executed:

1. Ringing the changes on eight bells.
2. Hall Columbia.
3. Yankee Doodle.
4. Old Dog Tray.
5. Grand Medley, arranged expressly for Trinity Church Chimes, by George F. Bristow.
6. Evening Bell.
7. Air by De Beriot.
8. Columbia, the Gem of the Ocean.
9. Last Rose of Summer.
10. Rondo, with Variations in major and minor keys composed for Trinity Chimes, by George F. Bristow.
11. Airs from Child of the Regiment.
12. Star Spangled Banner.
13. Blue Bells of Scotland.
14. Home, Sweet Home.
15. Hall Columbia.
16. Yankee Doodle.

ANOTHER AMERICAN PIANIST ABROAD.—A Buffalo journal says:

Our Buffalo artist, Mr. A. H. PEASE, is, it appears, winning golden opinions abroad. A Berlin paper, speaking of a concert given in that city by Mr. Pease, in May last, has the following:

On Thursday, the 14th, we had the pleasure of attending a matinée given by a young American, Mr. Pease. The programme comprised some of the most difficult and celebrated pieces of the great masters, and at the same time afforded us an opportunity of becoming acquainted with the gentleman's own compositions. Among other pieces played by Mr. Pease was Beethoven's Concerto in E flat, with orchestral accompaniment, also the famous Waltz from the opera of "Faust," arranged for the piano by Liszt.

The performance proved that the performer has attained a wonderful degree of execution and "technic," and we are happy to say that Mr. Pease, notwithstanding the great difficulties he confronted, accomplished his task throughout with great taste and "freshness" of manner. His touch is powerful, and in the piano passages exceedingly delicate. The difficult cadences in the Waltz were played with the utmost nicety. We are convinced that Mr. Pease has made excellent use of the time in which he has studied and of his fine talents. Of the composition of Mr. Pease, we can only say that in our opinion the method and effect of his instrumentation, as well as the originality of the composition itself, as illustrated, for instance, in his "Bolero," do him all honor.

OXFORD (OHIO) FEMALE COLLEGE. We have before us the programme of the Ninth Annual examinations and Commencement exercises of this institution (lasting a week from June 17 to June 24 inclusive), from which it appears that a much higher idea reigns there in the musical instruction, than we commonly find in the large female seminaries. It shows their teacher, Mr. KARL MERZ, to be enlightened and in earnest. Instead of the vulgar, showy trash, which is sung or thrummed by thousands of young ladies, he has fixed the attention of his pupils upon sterling compositions, and is rewarded by finding that they study them with real interest, and acquire a taste and love for them, thus showing what can be done for music in a Western College, despite so many sickening examples.

In the examinations referred to the musical selections were partly classical and partly light and popular; but the classical by far preponderated. Thus we find scattered along the order of exercises the following pieces:

June 17. Beethoven: Sonata, op. 2, No. 3. Chopin: Polonaise, op. 40. Mendelssohn: Song without Words. Beethoven: Polonaise, op. 42.

June 18. Mendelssohn: Rondo Capriccioso. Mozart: Grand Sonata in C (4 hands). Beethoven: Sonata, op. 49, No. 2. Do: Sonata, op. 27, No. 2. Weber: Rondo (4 hands). Chopin: Funeral March. Moscheles: Rondo: "La belle Union."

June 19. Beethoven: Sonata, op. 2, No. 2. Schubert: Song: "The Wanderer." Reissiger: Overture op. 71.

June 22. Mendelssohn: Song without Words.—Rossini: "Tell" overture (4 hands). Mehul: Overture "Joseph" (4 hands).

June 23. Overtures by Weber, Herold and Auber (4 hands).

June 24. (Commencement). Beethoven: Overture to Fidelio (4 hands). Handel: Chorus. Weber: Jubilee Overture (4 hands).

The music during the same week last year was essentially of the same character. The example is worth imitating.

The following six songs are from Balfe's new opera, "The Armorer of Nantes," and constitute, with the others recently noticed, the principal solo pieces:

Jaded, parched, athirst, and drooping. 25
Song of Raoul the Armorer. A half melancholy song, bringing in contrast the loving "welcome," which always greets him at home, with the contest, trouble and toil of life without.

Oh, would that my heart. 25
In nine-eighth time. Glides along swiftly, like the swallow's flight. Graceful melody.

There's one who reard me, loved me. 25
A song of gratitude, by Marie, the ward and love of the Armorer.

Passion's black and murky night. 25
A fierce song, full of fire and vengeance, by the Duchess, who has just discovered the infidelity of Count Fabio.

A Flower is Beauty. 35
A very beautiful song. Key of A flat.

What joy to listen. 25

The Rocking Horse. " 15

The Fife. " 15

Six numbers of Baumbach's "Children's Toys," pieces which can be conscientiously recommended to teachers, as "just the thing" for beginners. Pretty melodies, very easy, and yet each tune has a decided character.

The Postman, or Night Mail Galop. J. P. Clarke. 25

A rattling, bright and noisy thing, introducing, at intervals, the Postman's knock, the flourish of the Post-horn, and cries of welcome at the advent of letters from friends. Easy to those who play octaves readily.

Books.

THE HOME CIRCLE. Vol. II. A Collection of Piano Music. Boards, $2.00
Cloth, embossed, 2.25
Full gilt, 3.00

This fine volume contains about one hundred and fifty carefully selected pieces, and is an excellent collection. To judge of its cheapness, imagine the same pieces bought separately, and afterward bound. The pieces would probably average 25 cents each, at which price the aggregate cost would be about $35, enough to buy seventeen Home Circles in plain covers.—The Piano-forte pieces in the book are acknowledged favorites, and the four-hand pieces will be very useful as well as pleasing to the young players of the family.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being about one cent on each piece. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that it is double.

Half a Dozen of Beethoven's Contemporaries.

Vienna, May 2d, 1863.

MY DEAR DWIGHT:—I have a mind to write you an article with the above heading, in answer to a promise made to a gentleman in Boston, who has oil portraits of just these half dozen musicians. They are Salieri, Weigl, Hummel, Eybler, Gyrowetz, and Gelinek. And thereby hangs a tale, and one of which a part always causes me lively grief. Did I not lose my sleep in consequence, once on a time?

Where is my old note book of 1860? Dates! Dates! Here follow the entries, but amplified of course.

Friday, May 25.—In the afternoon to Herr Salis, who took me to see a certain Herr Mähler, an old gentleman of some eighty-two years. I found a small, handsome, erect old man, exceedingly yellow with incurable jaundice, which I doubted not would soon induce other disease and carry him off. Ill as he was, he was exceedingly agreeable and communicative. Herr Mähler came from Coblenz, on the Rhine, to Vienna, in the autumn of 1803. Though a jurist by profession, (he spent his life as an official of some sort), he was a man of singular genius and great artistic culture. He painted, wrote poetry and set it to music, sang and played. Soon after reaching this city, Stephen von Breuning introduced him to Beethoven, and within a year or two of that time the great composer sat to him for a large portrait, which is now in possession of Mrs. Van Beethoven, the widow of Beethoven's nephew, and of which I am happy to possess an excellent copy. Ten or a dozen years later, Mähler determined to paint a collection of portraits of the then principal celebrities in the Vienna musical world, and Beethoven and the gentlemen named above sat to him. All these pictures I saw, on this, my first visit, but the Beethoven especially interested me. There I saw the real man's any thing but handsome features. I felt at once: That is the true thing, free from any attempt to invest the face with the painter's fancies of what the face ought to be, but is not.

May, 26. Called again on Herr Mähler—he was very sick and sleeping.

28th. Again to Herr Mähler, and had a pleasant and valuable half hour with him.

I was then away on an expedition to Gratz, of which the Dwight's Journal of those days has an account. On my return Herr Mähler was too ill to see any one, and I never saw him again. Afterwards I was making researches in Linz, Salzburg, &c., and was away some six weeks. When I returned the old gentleman had passed away. Feeling delicate about intruding myself upon the residuary legatee of Mähler's property, a woman of refinement, I employed the wife of an artist acquaintance to see her, and (July 10) learned that the price of the Beethoven was 100 gulden, about $40, as the currency then was. My embassy, in the kindness of her heart, thinking to obtain it for much less, gave, as I afterwards learned, the owner to understand, that I could not think of giving so much; while, in fact, that price was no object, could I raise the money, it being just then (if never before or since) rather a scarce article.

July 13th. Wrote to Mr. —, in Berlin about it.

18th. Letter came in reply, authorizing me to make the purchase for a gentleman in Boston.

19th. To the city to close the bargain. Before I reached the house, I met an acquaintance, who among other news told me that two days before Prof. Karajan had bought a fine portrait of Beethoven!—Oh, Lord! my heart went down into my boots!

I went to the house and inquired about it. "Why," said Miss Blank, "Frau F. said you would not give 100 gulden for it, and day before yesterday Prof. Karajan came, looked at it, and asked the price. I told him 100 gulden, upon which he looked at it a few minutes, took the 100 gulden out of his pocket, gave it me, and walked off with the picture under his arm!" What could be done about it! (Mem. Never have a feeling of delicacy again.)

The other six pictures I afterwards secured, had them cleaned and put in order, and two or three of them are very fine portraits indeed, especially Hummel's. But, alas! the Beethoven! Jacobs used to say, "Fortune favors the lucky;" it did not favor your humble servant that time! Mähler copied all these pictures for the Society of Music-Friends here, but the copies do not compare with the originals.

As to the two Beethoven portraits, they have remained unknown thus far, to all who have pretended to give complete lists of likenesses of the composer. The one in question is the only one which corresponds to the mask taken of his face about the year 1817, and this does as well as it could be expected that a painting should correspond to the plaster actually put upon the face. Crawford's Beethoven in the Music Hall might just as well be called Governor Winthrop, so far as any likeness of feature or figure is concerned; or John Milton,—(the poet, not the tailor.)

A. W. T.

P. S. Do not pronounce the Gy in Gyrowetz soft as in 'gymnasium'; give them like the gi in 'give,' Gy-ro and the 'w' like v—Gy-rovets.

Half a Dozen of Beethoven's Contemporaries.

First, a word or two preliminary.

All the world, meaning the readers of this Journal and some others, has heard of Haydn's last appearance in public, March, 27, 1808, when the series of Liebhaber (amateur) concerts for that winter, twenty in number, ended with the "Creation," sung to Carpani's Italian text. On that occasion, doubtless, Beethoven and the half dozen of his contemporaries now in mind, might have been seen together. Beethoven we know was there, and so was Salieri—now fifty-eight years of age, and recently relieved of his office as Imperial Kapellmeister and pensioned—for he conducted the concert. Weigl, Imp. Kapellmeister at the opera, must have been there, for was not Haydn his sponsor, whose name, Joseph, he bore? and was this not the evening before his 42d birthday? Eybler, too; for he was now Salieri's successor as Imp. Kapellmeister, a favorite with Haydn, and also bore his name. He had completed his 43d year a few weeks before. Gyrowetz, now just 45, second operatic Kapellmeister, may possibly have been engaged that evening in the theatre; but Hummel, now in his 30th year, must have been present, for was he not a successor of Haydn as Kapellmeister to the Esterhazys, and was not the then reigning prince of that name one of the principal promoters of this concert? Moreover, he, Esterhazy, sent his own carriage to the suburb Gumpendorf to bring the old composer, slowly and with the greatest care, to the University hall in the Oberbäcker Strasse, where the performance took place. As for Abbé Gelinek, now in his 50th year, he was, of course, there. You cannot conceive of a man, who has nothing hardly to do, but write variations on musical themes, who knows all the musical people, and lives more in the musical than in his professional, in his case the ecclesiastical world,—you cannot conceive such a man not being present, unless confined to his house by sickness.

It is melancholy to see how men become forgotten. Here are six men, not of the highest order, as Beethoven was, not epoch-makers, it is true; all, save Gelinek, worthy the epithet great in their art, and the excepted one very prolific, and at that time to be found in his works on every piano-forte. O! Salieri, when and where, for the last thirty years, has any thing been performed except the opera "Axur," revived some fifteen years ago on a German stage or two for a very short time, and possibly in some church or other a sacred composition or two? And yet he was perhaps the greatest Italian composer living sixty years ago; for Traetta—a forgotten name!—was dead; Cherubini was just beginning; Rossini had not appeared. Of Eybler, how many have ever heard the name, save students of the Roman Catholic Church music? Of Weigl, who knows any thing, but that he composed that delightful sentimental opera, "The Swiss Family?" Who knows now anything of Gyrowetz? And yet symphonies by him were printed in Paris, under Haydn's name! So too Gelinek is forgotten. Possibly some piano-forte "school" may have an example or two from his pen,—but hardly. Hummel has not yet quite sunk into oblivion. Some of his beautiful instrumental music, of the Mozart-Haydn school, and a few of his church compositions still delight, and worthily. Hills are brought low, but the mountain peaks stand unchanged. Handel, Bach, Mozart, Haydn, Gluck, Beethoven, tower as grandly as ever.

One would like to know the feelings with which the Kapellmeisters and composers, then and there present, beheld and shared in paying the honors of that occasion to the old man—the musical father of them all. Haydn had made himself beloved by all, so that no feeling of envy could find place in any heart. But this spectacle! In a city, where rank is to this day a matter of birth alone, the prime minister admitted, just while in office, to society from which his wife and daughters are rigidly excluded!—to see princesses covering the old musician's feet and back with their shawls to protect him from a draught of air; his entrance greeted by shouts of "Long live Haydn!" and the flourish of trumpets usually accorded but to royalty. Some fifteen hundred persons of the highest ranks of society, or distinguished in art, science, and literature, crowding the hall, to hear his work, and look upon his venerable features—was all this an encouragement to, or did it dishearten the younger men, who were now upon the stage of action, which he was leaving forever? Salieri, author of so many operas, then among the most famous on the stage, played alike in Vienna, Paris, and all the principal cities of the continent, may have thought that, twenty years later, some such festival might be arranged in his honor. It required no great stretch of vanity to have thought this; but no such event cheered his last days. The young Hummel, conscious of great talents, may have felt it possible, that he might at some future time attain some similar position in the estimation of the public; if so, he was mistaken. There was one there, and one only, who could have felt that the time would come when he might claim as a right the place in the musical world then held by his old teacher. And the time did come when Beethoven stood before a somewhat similar audience, but as composer and director of his own immortal works, and not as a guest at a festival in his honor, as was old Haydn to-night.

Had he lived to Haydn's age—he died at 56, while Haydn had completed his 78th year a month before this performance of the "Creation"—who will venture to say that in 1849, Beethoven's Oratorio, "Saul," merely sketched [at his death, might not have been the occasion of a festival to the old man's honor, unparalleled in the history of music! He, as he met Haydn at the door, and, with Salieri and others, accompanied him to his seat, as he heard again the familiar music of the "Creation," listened to and joined in the applause,—he had the right to look forward to the completion of some era-making work which should stand, at least, as worthily beside Handel's immortal productions, as this. To him there could have been nothing disheartening. But Weigl, Eybler, and the others?

The "Creation" lives; all that Beethoven wrote also lives—the weak kept afloat by the stronger works—and what strength!

Our "half dozen contemporaries" were not Haydns and Beethovens—but their lives are parts of musical history, and their works, for the most part, are worthy of remembrance.

"Unto every one which hath shall be given; and from him that hath not, even that he hath shall be taken away from him,"—yes, and the possessor of the ten talents gets the poor devil's one. Of nothing is this truer than fame. As time passes away, the man of the ten talents gradually absorbs all the reputation of his contemporaries; he stands out alone, the one representative of his age in popular estimation; his name alone known to any but the scholar and antiquarian; all that his age produced in his department of science, literature, art, carried to his credit. Had no dramatist but Shakespeare thoughts, 250 years ago? Was there no English mathematician but Newton, when he was on the stage of action? Did nobody but Handel write good music in England, from 1712 to 1750? Had John Milton no contemporaries? In one sense he did stand alone; for like Mt. Blanc, he towered into a region above all others; but other mountains are there.

It is peculiarly the case in music, that the few of any particular period carry off all the honors of their time in the estimation of posterity. Books, statues, paintings, are tangible things, and require but to be read or seen, and we all learn to make due allowance for the taste and thousand influences of their age in giving them their peculiarities of form and character. We can compare one man's works more easily with those of another, and form some just conception of the real originality of any one. But few can read music so as to catch its full effect, or even so much of it as to gain any clear conception of the true position of a composer's claims to originality and power; and seldom indeed are works of old masters, save the few epoch-makers, produced, that we may have the advantage of hearing them. Moreover, when the opportunity is given, how many are there, who can feel that some apparently simple movement, performed by some half dozen instruments, often really contains more musical thought, than many a modern piece, which demands all the pomp and resources of the modern orchestra?

In music, as in literature, or in the other arts, there are a thousand thoughts, which are common property; and the composer has not yet appeared, whose every melodic phrase or harmonic combination was original with him. Handel's and Bach's are not the only good choruses of their age. Mozart's, Haydn's and Beethoven's symphonies are not the only good ones of their time. But who now knows of any others? Who now can understand the fact that these masters had contemporaries, as highly thought of, as much admired and honored as they? But, he that hath, to him shall be given!

The operatic composer is the one who has the least chance of enduring fame, and for a thousand obvious reasons, such as changing taste, and because he "has his good things" in his life, while the conscientious, laborious man of genius, who is above sacrificing his principles to immediate success, often, like Lazarus, "has evil things." But, of this class of composers, the most unfortunate for future fame are those who occupy the places which all composers have before them as the objects of their ambition—Chapel-masterships in great opera houses; not so much so in our days, perhaps, as in the past generation, when they were often under obligations to produce a certain amount of music annually. Where are Handel's operas? What would Gluck or Mozart have done, to compare with what they did do, had they been confined, night after night, to the opera house, always rehearsing and conducting pieces new and old, good and bad, and forced to write to any text accepted by the managers, and, "in the spirit (of composition) or out of the spirit," no matter—the music is demanded for an appointed time, and must be ready.

How can you expect a great literary work from the man, whose intellectual faculties are always on the stretch to produce editorial articles for a morning newspaper? How expect grand, enduring works of dramatic music, from men who, like Weigl and Gyrowetz, were at the beck and call of operatic managers, and whose contracts forced them to make music, as the decorators made scenery, for any new piece in hand?

But I do not regard Weigl or Gyrowetz, as men whose native genius was such, as to have given us imperishable works, had they been otherwise situated in life; nor have they probably contributed much to that fame and reputation, which in after years will be absorbed by "him who had;" still their music "was lovely and pleasant in their lives, and in their death they have not been divided," for most of it has sunk into like oblivion.

I do not then write upon these half dozen men as of giants, but hope, nevertheless, that my account of them may not prove unpleasant for hot weather.

Schubert and Chopin.

(From the Vienna Recension).

When the name of Schubert is mentioned, the "Lied" of Germany is presented, in all its irresistible power, before our mind. Whatever else Schubert produced—including the whole of his instrumental music, however it may have been lauded in recent times, and whatever brilliant qualities it possesses—disappears before his Songs.

If we would characterize his peculiarity, we ought perhaps, to call him the creator of the song of civilization grafted upon the old trunk of nationality. In his strains, the tenderest feeling and the most delicate finish are united to a truly national principle, and it is this which imparts to them that indescribable effect which is never worn out, because, while fully satisfying our intellectual requirements and polished taste, it has a touch of that primary feeling, which from the cradle to the grave, binds us to a great whole, to a living community of allied elements.

We know with what power simple folk-melodies work upon men's minds; how, when falling upon our ear in foreign countries, they awaken a deep and sorrowful yearning for home; how they turn our hearts to devotion, and strengthen us in our belief. A similar effect is produced upon an educated man by Schubert's songs. When they are heard, a yearning is awakened for a more beautiful home, the Ideal within our own breast; sorrow for our restrictedness, our weakness, and our corruption is merged into that indescribably sweet melancholy which springs from our glances towards heaven, and the feeling of our capability to raise ourselves to its bright spheres. Our astonishment at being still able to recognize so much that is beautiful and noble as the common property of the human soul, and, therefore, as our own, elevates us above ourselves and renders us blessed.

Schubert's songs have exercised a magical charm which is the property of genial creations alone; Schubert has found in his imagination tunes which display to the human soul its deepest secrets, and—as new and surprising in their appearance, as confidential and homely in their inmost nature—victoriously represent the revelation of Tone in the Beautiful, the highest aim of art. Like Mozart in Opera, Schubert has, in Song, raised the relief of the accompaniment to effective importance. By means of it, he has not only musically enriched song, but, also, by decided characteristic traits, given it an objective power and a varied expression. Without sacrificing the inwardness of the Personal, the melody in this way gained a vigorous epic bearing, and burst through the narrow limits of individual lyrical expression, which, when the feelings are flowing and impetuous, easily succumbs to the danger of monotony or of redundancy. This endeavor, however, by means of the form of the accompaniment to attain more sharply defined character, and variety of expression, has sometimes led the great song-writer astray, and seduced him into harshly outward rhythmical tone-paintings. It is not alone his less important songs which have been injured in their æsthetic effect by this fault. That, moreover, when a man was so productive, as Schubert was in songs, he should publish to the world much which owed its existence more to a strong impulse to give vent to his feelings than to a genial outburst of real inspiration is a fact which cannot astonish any one.

Before Schubert's time, the "Lied" had already been represented by two of the greatest composers of any period, namely by Mozart and Beethoven; but it was Schubert who first applied to it his whole soul and his whole genius; who rendered it a creation apart, and endowed it with the highest significance. Although, consequently, Mozart's "Veilchen," his "Vergissmeinnicht," his "Abendempfindung" stand out unsurpassed, as wonderful and isolated blossoms of musical lyrics, and although Beethoven's "Adelaide" has already entranced thousands, and will entrance thousands more, they are merely detached and independent musical compositions, and not, like Schubert's Songs, taken as a whole, a new and all-comprehensive creation, an entire world of all that the human breast contains within itself of sorrow and delight, of yearning and hope, of dreams and presentiments. After Schubert, again, Mendelssohn and Schumann have written grand songs; with all their originality, however, they cannot conceal the fact that they were suggested by Schubert's style, but they are only isolated productions of subjective feeling, and not the reflection of a great interior world.

What the human voice, employed in song, was to our Schubert, the pianoforte was to the intellectually-gifted Pole, Chopin. In Chopin's tone-poems for the piano, this instrument, always justly valued as one of the most splendid organs for the rendering of polyphonic musical productions, is presented to us as an individuality of altogether peculiar beauty and power of expression. Chopin is a magician to whom the soul of the piano reveals its most secret and most special charms; affectionately has it given itself up to him: whether he toys on the surface, or plunges into the depths below, he always meets with willing reciprocity. If the great instrumentalists of modern times have made it one of their principal tasks to study the individuality of each instrument, and the nature of its peculiar character of sounds, and to profit by them for the production of effects on a grand scale, we may designate Chopin as the man who recognized and developed the independent organ of speech belonging to the piano; by his creations it became an individuality. Chopin's soul was too rich in materials, for an instrument on which we can only sing to satisfy it. It required the power of polyphony in order to express itself fully and freely. But Chopin was, on the other hand, too morbidly irritable to engage in profound studies of, and laborious efforts for, polyphonic instrumental composition; the piano alone was adapted to afford his natural impulses a proper sphere of action, and to receive, in kaleidoscopically changing forms, the stamp of his dreamily enthusiastic imagination. The dreamily melancholy feeling, which was the fundamental principle of Chopin's mind, is prominently expressed in all his compositions, and even restrains his more joyous rhythms. As he is a man of thoroughly noble nature, sighing after the Ideal, but weak, entangled in the sensual charms, and deeply moved by the denials and dissensions, of life, his compositions generally produce on us a poetical but rarely, in an artistic sense, quite satisfactory effect. The uneasiness in them is communicated to ourselves, and we sink, as a rule, into an entrancing dream, the speedy flight of which we anticipate and feel with pain. His melody is, certainly, somewhat monotonous, but endowed with a peculiar, and frequently overpowering, spiritual charm; his arabesques and rhythms are invariably of an exciting nature and form rich and attractive illustrations of his strain.

According to what we have said, it is not the similarity of the intellectual tendencies or the artistic style of these two composers which can or ought to justify their juxtaposition; it is only the fact that Schubert, the song-writer, listened till he succeeded in learning the subjective charm, the personal secret of the soul, so to speak, of the human voice, which, objectively, as an instrument of music displays, more than any other, a cosmopolitan variety and richness of expression and beauty; while Chopin has succeeded in loosening the girdle of the subjective charms most special to the piano, which has willingly served, in its objective significance and capabilities, the greatest masters of the musical art in their most magnificent inspirations.

M. Fétis on Jenny Lind.

We have already given an account of the Lower Rhine Musical Festival, which took place this year at Düsseldorf. Mme. Goldschmidt sang, and old M. Fétis, author of the Biographie des Musiciens, heard her and thus writes of it, "Spiridion" translating.

The chief piece of the second day, or rather the attraction of the festival, was Handel's 'Ode to St. Cecilia,' one of the most celebrated compositions of the old master and one of those heard most seldom. We know the cause of this now. Jenny Lind alone could bring us here this masterpiece, which she has made popular in England. The subject of this ode of the poet Dryden reminds one somewhat of that old composition of the same author called 'Alexander's Feast.' The 'Ode to St. Cecilia's Day' was originally set to music by an Italian composer, now as completely forgotten as his score. Handel took up the text and made a masterpiece of it. Handel's whole score consists of three airs for the tenor, four for the soprano, three choruses and an overture. Really when I think of those little marvels, it seems to me I have seen one of those sanctuaries where some amateur amorously hides one or two pictures which sing triumphantly the glory of the great masters for the beatitude of the owner and for the passionate admiration of those he introduces into the temple. Of three airs for the tenor, the first is the least remarkable; it is a sort of measured recitative, interlinked with a grand chorus, one of those formidable explosions where the majestic serenity of old Handel appears in full splendor. I confess that the remembrance of another air has faded before the originality and freedom of the third air, which is a war song in which the flourishes of the trumpets and the rolling of the drums 'concert' with the voice in the most ingenious manner, others would say, in the most infantine manner, but I hold sincere and grand. The first air of the soprano celebrates upon the lyre the gentle sentiments of the heart and the thoughts of love. Here Jenny Lind revealed herself. The melody, which is full of suave and fresh graces, goes alternately from the voice of the songstress to the sympathetic strings of the violoncello. The charm seizes you; it masters you in that air with the flute which breathes the complaint of an afflicted heart.

Here also, I abandon all attempt to describe the wonders of the struggle which takes place between the voice and the instrument; I would speak, too, of the marvels of mechanism, of this horrible word, mechanism did not remind me of those doll babies with well-wound springs which have attempted to impose on us their exaggerated fame. This air, one of Jenny Lind's triumphs, particularly exhibits in full light one of the facettes of her wonderfully complete talents, I mean eccentric face (I used another wretched word to half-express my idea,) the sure execution, the faculty, the particular instinct which enables Jenny Lind to modify the emission and the management of her voice to suit with the nature of the instrument which accompanies it. To say that she imitates the flute or the violin would be to insult her; but she has for each intention of the composer a variety of accents, of emission and of management of the voice which you may conceive, but which I cannot describe; let me simply hasten to add that these coqueteries of the demi-voice, these audacious flights, these caprices remain grand and broad, there is, always grace, always charm—never childishness.—Imagine what all these things become when other songstresses—I speak of the best among them—attempt to indulge in these excursions! I tremble when I think of it! How many hissing black-birds, how many American mocking-birds have we for one Swedish nightingale? How many Patis for a single Jenny Lind! I now understand the trio of flutes in the Camp de Silesie, and L'Etoile du Nord, I understand Jenny Lind's success in this Tournoy which irritated me to exasperation, I understand how Meyerbeer (a first rate huntsman) found in Handel's Saint Cecilia the idea and even the embellishment of his piquant and original invention. After these enchanting graces comes a peerless page—the intervention of the organ in the harmonious chorus. Jenny Lind gives it a gentle, and at the same time a severe character which gradually rises till it reaches ecstasy's highest flight. The next air is another one of those delicate bits of tracery in which the composer seems sometimes to delight as if to rest from his grand conceptions. A chorus, which is, perhaps, a little too much developed, ends this ode. In it Jenny Lind throws off a triumphal lu kept up with giddy tenacity while the trumpet sounds a long flourish. Two thousand of us rose in a transport of enthusiasm."

The Crystal Palace at Sydenham.

A letter from HENRY WARD BEECHER, to The Independent.

LONDON, July 2, 1853.

MY DEAR FRIENDS IN THE OFFICE:

In a series of days of such rare and exquisite enjoyment as I have had since landing, there are some that stand out with pre-eminence, as, among the spires of a cathedral, high as all are, there yet are towers and spires that shoot up far above the others, and lie pictured upon the sky as you retrace from them, long after the building and its lesser members have sunk down and disappeared. I have just had such a day. I did not believe it possible to put so much experience into one day, or that, after so continuous an excitement of rare novelties and delights, I could feel any more pleasure than I had. But impossibilities are quite possible. I find it out every day! I go as far as I can,—and then go further. I am filled entirely full, and then receive a great deal more? When will it end? Shall I go on, mounting higher, enjoying more, susceptible of more various excitement and capable of bearing it? Drastic excitements, and all which compel volition and labor, tend to exhaustion; but excitements which are sweet-breathed and that raise the mind to that region in which its acts are automatic, involuntary, effluent, seem to nourish rather than exhaust. Your hours are all radiant. You wake into gladness, and fall out of joys into sleep. One may have, even in this life, some conception of that liberty and range of joy toward which we are travelling, when the earthly being dropt, all that is susceptible of weariness is gone, and the spirit springs up, no longer in bondage to sleep, fatigue, toil, or limitation of material conditions!

I have just returned from spending a day at Sydenham Crystal Palace, and that accounts for the foregoing strain. The day was glorious. Everybody had said, "You must go to Sydenham!" I had read descriptions of it. Yet, the meaning of it never dawned upon me till to-day—this most wonderful of all modern English achievements. Even after having been at Chatsworth, one of the Duke of Devonshire's seats, reputed, hitherto, to be the finest in the world for landscape-gardening—Sydenham is still more wonderful. This great Crystal Palace, vast but not massive, springs into such huge proportions with such a fine and almost ethereal structure, that you can scarcely believe it to be more than a picture; or if a veritable building, one which the winds will blow away. It is the very antithesis of castles and cathedrals. These impress you by their solidity. They are mountains of stone, and seem to be durable as the mountains from which the stone was hewn. Against their huge walls has dashed battle and siege, almost in vain. Time itself, that never raises its siege, seems in vain, with wind, and art, and frost, to have assailed many mighty mediæval structures. And when you look upon them, you feel the solidity, the massiveness. But this film upon the sky—this gossamer span last night by fairies, this glittering, luminous, transparent spectre of a palace! Can it be real, durable, tangible?

The grounds on which this ethereal pile is erected are worthy of the vast jewel which they hold upon their bosom. There is every variation of hue and slope. The grass is shaven close, and is as green and velvety as only English grass can be. Cut into its green are innumerable beds of gorgeous flowers of every hue. You are dazed and dazzled at the wealth of flowers, the clumps of rhododendrons, the belts, beds, and ribbons of color, the circles of roses. I have travelled in the prairies of the Great West, and seen the sheets and billows of flowers that stretch with endless profusion there. There are no such wild and extravagant abundance here. It was as if the flower angel had sounded the trumpet, and a prairie of flowers had rushed to camp to be brigaded and marshaled; and now, in ranks and squadrons, in files or companies, they carry their floral lances to this innocuous war of beauty! Lakes, fountains and pools abound. The most gorgeous dream of the Arabian Nights would turn pale and fade out in the presence of this substantial glory of horticultural skill. If I had had time, I should have been amazed at the literature of color spread out here.

Those flowers I had seen, all of them, growing loose and disconnectedly. Here they were gathered into artistic groups by similarities or contrasts. I had seen them a scattered alphabet of beauty, every letter by itself. Here they were composed into words and sentences. My eye drank and was drunk with color. I turned from the grounds to the building, and from it again to the grounds. O happy people, who can come hither so easily! For, the immortal glory of this enterprise is this, that this palace and grounds, that have no parallel or equal in the world, are presented by the wealth of London to the common people! I do not believe that so extraordinary a combination of rational pleasures for every sense and sentiment of man was ever before combined. Not for the government, nor for kings or nobles, not for a rich and refined class, but for the great common people has this miracle of beauty and use been wrought!

Within is every variety of food for bodily hunger, capitally served, simple for those who need or can afford little, and sumptuous for those who choose it. Every provision is made for the incidental wants of the throngs of men, women and children. But now come the marvels. You live in Egypt and walk in the temples. You stand in Greek halls. You see the altars and statues, the Parthenon, the friezes, the gods. You enter a Roman dwelling. All is reproduced as in the days of Augustus. You stand in the gorgeous Alhambra, in a Pompeian house, in the Byzantine court, in the Norman, the early English, the full Gothic buildings or courts. The illusion is complete. Time is dead. The old has come back, and is new. Nay, distance is ended. You seem to be in different ages and widely different countries all at the very same time. You lose your identity, whether you are ancient or modern—whether you are at Athens, or Rome, or Byzantium, you cannot tell. Or is it a gorgeous dream? Is this some sorceress kaleidoscope, whose every turn rattles the elements of various ages and countries into strange conjunctions?

The illusion is increased by the unity of all climates in the vegetable kingdom. Under this glass hemisphere the temperate and torrid zones dwell together in peace. There is room for every thing. As you stand at one end, you look down through a crystal aisle more than sixteen hundred feet, and over this long, luminous path there is no roof until you rise a hundred and seventy four feet in the center, and a hundred and ten on either side of it. Along this vast track are gathered the rarest vegetable productions of the globe, growing in soil, or air, or water. Vines cover the iron columns, and spread out their filmy branches along the connecting rods. Huge pendant baskets, filled with trailing plants, swing in the air at heights that hide their support, and cause them to seem self-supported. Marble-lined reservoirs of water, artificially heated, are covered with aquatic lilies. From step to step, all the way down, you come upon the most magnificently grown shrubs and plants and trees. They line the whole long interior, so that you imagine yourself looking down an avenue of some extraordinary forest filled with undergrowth, shrubs, vines, and mosses. Out of these green mosses, at every step, peep the most exquisite creations of art. There are casts of almost every renowned or beautiful statue in Europe, arranged in long sequence. All the sculpture that you have ever seen in engravings, read of in books, heard of in conversation, meets you in this palace of miracles. The treasures are endless. You cannot in a day even glance at them. You leave more things unseen than you look upon. Every step opens recesses full of wonders. Picture-galleries flow along the sides as if they would never end. The portrait gallery presents you with almost every historic face. Do you need to read of these things? Turn aside into the library with thousands of volumes. Sit down in the Reading Room, which, though several thousand people are threading the building, is as quiet as though it were a lonesome bower in the woods! Or are you tired in eye and foot? Sit down and listen to a very noble band that yonder is rendering classic music skillfully. This marvellous variety gives you rest by change. If sculpture fails, there is architecture; and of that variety running through all the schools of time. Are you weary of this? Try color on the canvas. Do you weary of this? Will you take a walk around marble-bound lakes, or among palms and gigantic ferns, or among clove and cinnamon, pepper and ginger, tea and coffee plants? Or would you rid yourself of company? Go out into the grounds. By some one of the walks you can in a moment be hidden in secluded, leafy covers, or you may seek the lake and artificial island, and see the geologic periods represented in strata, and the ante-diluvian animals reproduced in form, if not in life. From some such stroll I returned and dined. I could not make up my mind whether I was an Egyptian dining at Cairo with the old Copts, or a Greek, or a Roman, or Goth. I never once suspected that I was a Yankee, eating stout English beef and pastry.

This duty done, we go now to the Renaissance Court to see the statues by Michael Angelo! Here are Day and Night, with Julius de Medici sitting nobly above and between them. Opposite is Dawn and Twilight, with Lorenzo de Medici sublimely thoughtful between them. There is the slave, opposite to it the Madonna and child, a Pietà, a Christ, but most grand of all, the Moses! These are of the full size of the originals, and fill you with more pleasure and wonder since they are gathered into one grand company and fill the whole air with the spirit of their artist-creator. While thus walking and musing, the grand organ in the nave is filling all the air with its solemn harmonies! Where else did any one ever gaze upon Michael Angelo's collected sculptures to the sound of grand organ music? We never know to what proportion our joys may rise until we have experienced them in the midst of solemn music. At such a distance that all sense of the material instrument is lost, solemn music seems to be a voice out of the spirit-world. It brings to us a call from the Infinite, and connects us with it. Our joys seem no more mortal. They are related to the eternal and spiritual, and partake of their nature. They are preludes and presences of immortality. The soul takes assurance that its most precious experiences are not transient and perishing. However silenced for a time, joy shall come again, and in the harmony of a better sphere, and roll for ever in undisturbed and inseparable harmonies!

It is true that all these treasures of art are but casts, imitations, plaster statues, plaster architecture, and, if one tries, he can quite destroy the illusion and prevent his own enjoyment. But since they were exact patterns of the renowned works of the world—better than engravings or copies in painting—so like that only by a resolute effort could one break the illusion, why should one decline them or abate his satisfaction?

The best of all, to me, was the sight of such throngs of people—plain, kind-looking, common people—in thousands roaming through the grounds, gazing upon the marvels, watching the fish, peering into the green recesses, and as happy as any body could be, except the children. Of these there were hundreds—schools, classes, families, in groups of four or five, of ten or twenty, and of hundreds streaming through the aisles wild with delight, yet orderly and unmischievous. This whole enterprise, in all its treasures and beauty, is an offering to the common people! More is done for the common people by the piety and wealth of England than in any land on the globe. In America the common people take care of themselves. In England they are, by the political institutions of the country, shut out from a thousand privileges. There is need to give them, from benevolence, that which our people have as of their own right. It must be confessed that the philanthropic natures of Great Britain strove nobly to make up by benefactions the hopeless inequalities of fortune that spring from English institutions.

Gounod's Faust.

From a Liverpool Paper.

Were the marvellous rapidity with which Monsieur Gounod has risen to celebrity considered as an avant garde of future events, it might indeed be supposed that a new musical era had burst upon the country of his birth; but if calm reflection be used in the examination of this wondrous reputation, a more rational inference will be drawn, and for once the insouciant Parisians are themselves the ones to place their composer before the tribunal of strict inspection, determined to "nothing extenuate or ought set down in malice," to tranquilly analyze the real merit of the lately extolled author of Faust. When, four years ago, the French arrangement of Goethe's poem was brought out at the Théâtre Lyrique, the Parisians hailed the advent of new music with the freshened pleasure of those satiated with the continual repetition of a well worn-out stock. The romantic interest of the plot, the manner in which it was placed upon the stage, the gorgeous scenery and decorations, the costumes, the fair hair and German burlesque given to the actors, all combining not only to enhance that interest, but to impart a life-like reality to the scenes represented, wherein Parisian skill in spectacular splendor reached its climax. The singers were of an inferior order, with the exception of Madame Carvalho, who in the performance of Marguerite realized the exquisite conception of her whom the great poet has left as the very type of womanly charm and purity. The opera was very successful, and M. Gounod's name became enrolled among the fortunate musical caterers for the public. Satisfied with the spectacle, charmed with two fine choruses, fascinated with the story and delighted with Madame Carvalho's delineation of its poetic heroine, the Parisians accepted the music without bestowing upon it too severely strict a criticism, such leniency being also in accordance with the theatre, which as of fourth-rate order held forth no pretensions to the fastidious and the exigeants. Four years have passed, during which Faust continued to be played at intervals, the happy run being aided by the prima donna being the wife of the theatrical manager, and her finding in the character of the gentle Marguerite a source for the display of her talent. The unexpected elevation of M. Gounod to European notoriety has, by placing him on a higher standard, also raised the medium through which he is now regarded, causing the qualifications for such a position to pass under the closest review. According to Parisian judgment, M. Gounod is not quite worthy of the rank so suddenly attained; nor is this opinion based upon the natural law of prophets never being duly estimated in their own country, but on a clear and calm examination of his music. Dr. Johnson has defined genius "to be that without which, knowledge is inert and learning useless." The great lexicographer was too large in such a view; but there might, indeed, be a strict application of it with regard to music, which, of all the arts, being the most dependent on inspiration, becomes bald and hollow when only treated through the laws of learning. In Paris M. Gounod is considered a fabricator of music, but not an inspired composer. In the choruses he has displayed two happy ideas—one being the novelty of old men singing together with the shrill treble of old age, the effect produced by the union of tenor voices; the other being the soldiers' chorus, based on a large broad phrase, well carried out, and sustained. That last sentence embodies a full criticism on Faust, for it is precisely because M. Gounod does not carry out and sustain his phrases that his music loses inspired strength, and becomes either insipidly commonplace or utterly incomprehensible. At the commencement of every morceau an idea is implied, exciting hopes that progression will gradually render it distinct and clear; but, alas! disappointment is the only result. A passage full of promising beauty, over which the cognoscenti hang in anticipation of rich enjoyments, is all at once merged into what is flat and unmeaning, through which the composer seeks to display his profound science at the expense of the simply beautiful. This is a grand mistake, and one into which imitators of a school often fall. M. Gounod has endeavored to vie with German musical profundity; but he forgot that in Beethoven and Mendelssohn the depths of counterpoint and the skillful intricacy of harmony were used as means to an end, that end being the richest gratification to the ear, instead of making them serve as learned lessons. Faust would be of use to the persevering student who sought to acquire a full knowledge of the algebra of music; but as the rendering of melody and the true purpose of song, the scholar must look elsewhere. To use one of their own Parisian phrases, the music of Faust is too decouru, too much cut up into little details, without any defined suite. Nowhere is this so provokingly displayed as in the garden duet, which for dramatically romantic situation is of itself a treasure to a composer, and it would seem at the outset as if M. Gounod were worthy of possessing it. The opening phrase is of such exquisite beauty as to gain for its creator undying fame; but just when the enchantment of its listeners is excited, comes the cold bleakness of scientific modulations, which causes the ear to lose itself in unmeaning confusion, out of which again rises, like an oasis in the desert, another passage of intrinsic value, but so brief as to leave no impression in accordance with its real worth. Such floating gems as these would seem to indicate the possession of natural powers, and that were M. Gounod to lay aside his earnest desire to arouse the esteem and respect of the learned only, he might be able to claim the lasting admiration of the general public. That this present furor created by Faust will be of long duration remains a problem to be solved by time. Its creation is of easy explanation, for in the dearth of new music that of M. Gounod has been a thing of welcome to the wearied Londoners, who rush into the engouement for the French composer on the principle, as the Paris critics declare by their own saying, that "in the kingdom of the blind the one-eyed are kings."

Music Abroad.

Paris.

Our readers must have remarked the sameness of the monthly summaries of doings at the Parisian opera houses. For years, indeed we read of the same round of a dozen or two of the more important pieces, with only occasional novelties, mostly of the lighter order. "Spiridon," of the Gazette, tells us that the government seriously thinks of trying to break this spell of monotony, by making theatrical enterprises free to all. He thus describes the evil and the remedy proposed.

At the Grand Opera they play Robert le Diable, Les Huguenots, Le Prophète, Guillaume Tell, from one year's end to another; or, if they revive La Muette de Portici, or La Giselle, they play nothing else. Mark you, all of these pieces are old—the youngest is fifteen years old. At the Opera Comique it is the same thing; Zampa, La Dame Blanche, Le Postillon de Lonjumeau, Le Domino Noir, La Fille du Régiment. At the Theatre Lyrique, founded for "the encouragement of young artists," you find: Der Freyschütz, Le Nozze di Figaro, Orphée aux Enfers, Les Monténégrins. The French Comedy has played four nights in the week Le Fils de Giboyer, and the other three nights, Molière, Corneille and Racine furnish the entertainment. It is still worse at the minor theatres; at the Porte St. Martin and Theater du Chatelet they have been playing Les Pâtures du Diable and Rothomago, "time whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary." And yet with these pieces, which are threadbare, our theatres took in at their doors last year (a "bad year," for pecuniary distress has been universal from the loss of the once great American trade), no less than $2,500,000, and this enormous revenue is monthly increasing with every new rail laid and every additional station built.

The Parisians are not the only sufferers by this state of things. The dramatic authors, the musical composers, the play actors themselves are ruined by it. Managers, of course, do not care for new pieces as long as the old ones fill their houses full. Their interests are all enlisted to persuade them to discard new pieces, which require new scenery, new costumes (expensive things both), and which can give them no assurance against failure. As long as the old actors are not hissed off the stage, they do not want new ones whom they must drill, and whom they must accustom the public to. This state of things is fairly ruining provincial theatres. They have no constantly renewed audience. When a piece has been played four or five times it is exhausted, nobody cares to see it again. If there are no new pieces brought out at Paris, what can the provincial manager do? Nothing under Heaven except to sue out a declaration of bankruptcy.

The remedy proposed to ameliorate this condition of the drama is that sovereign remedy for all public ills: Liberty! There is no situation so desperate—a country may be brought to the verge of ruin by profligate demagogues or by an extravagant tyrant—Liberty will rescue it from the abyss! The present monopoly of the theatres will be destroyed, and any one who pleases to open a theatre may do so. The great Government theatres—the Grand Opera, the Opera Comique, the French Comedy and the Odeon—will continue to receive their annual subsidies; but their theatre may be invaded by any manager: Moliere may be played at Bobino as well as at the comedy; there may be operas and ballets at the Delassements Comiques as well as at the Academie de Musique. Experience has shown that whenever a new theatre has been opened we have had new authors and new actors. Dejazet's bandbox introduced us to Mons. Victorien Sardou. Castil Blaze's opera-season at the Odeon introduced us to Weber. Antenor Joly's lease of the Italian Opera during the summer months gave us Donizetti's Lucia di Lammermoor, introduced us to Grisar (his Eau Merveilleuse was played there after having been refused every where), to Carlotta Grisi and to Anna Thillon. Old theatre goers have a horror of new and untied pieces and actors, and consequently do really militate against the production of new pieces and the appearance of new actors.

Of course "the season," both for operas and concerts is passed, and the account of what is passing occupies less space than the anticipation of what is to come. The same clever correspondent writes:

At the Opera Comique Mons. Montaubry's success in Zampa is very great. The Theatre Lyrique's doors are closed for the summer; Mme. Ugalde sang the swan's song of the season, appearing in Oberon. It opens in September and will give us in the course of the season Mons. Berlioz's Les Troyens; Mons. Gounod's (the well known composer of Faust) Mireille; a one act opera by Mons. Guiraud, (these three are "Rome prizes") and three acts by Mons. Boulanger (for Mme. Faure's first appearance at this theatre); further the revival of these old operas; Mons. Grisar's Les Amours du Diable, Clappon's La Fanchonnette, Mons. Felicien David's La Perle du Bresil, Mons. Victor Massé's La Reine Topaze, Halévy's Le Val d'Andorre, Mons. Rey's La Statue, Mozart's Les Noces de Figaro and Mons. Gounod's Le Medecin Malgré Lui and Faust.

The company will chiefly consist of Mme. Carvalho, Mme. Faure, Mme. Charton Demeur and Mlle. Muret (a favorite pupil of Duprez); MM. Perrot (the first prize of the Conservatory, a bass singer, Ismael and Lutz, (baritones both), and Pilo. This tenor singer was in the army during the whole Crimean war; he rose to the rank of sergeant-major, but he became melomaniac and appealed to Gen. Mellinet to obtain his liberation from military service. I dare say you know that Gen. Mellinet is a great melomaniac himself. The General refused. Mons. Pilo went to the Conservatory and asked for a hearing; he so surprised Mons. Auber that the latter at once wrote to Gen. Mellinet: "France has gallant soldiers enough, but is not so rich in tenors as to warrant you in refusing us this young man." General Mellinet could not refuse this appeal, and the young man is now at the Theatre Lyrique.

London.

THE OPERAS. At the Royal Italian, Adelina Patti reigns the favorite of the season, and at Her Majesty's, Mlle. Artot. The Athenæum, whose opinions sometimes have the charm of novelty, not chiming with the general chorus, thus utters itself about them both in its review of the two operas, May 23.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA. The crowd was brilliant at 'Don Giovanni' on Thursday week. There were the usual encores. The performance was as fine as one as could be expected under the circumstances, where so much rapid preparation of novelty must preclude close rehearsal of known works, and where all the principal artists are not first-rate. A Donna Anna is not found in Mdle. Fricci!—we do not indorse the popular admiration of Leporello by Herr Formes, feeling its want of real dramatic vitality and humor doubled by contrast with the redundancy, without exaggeration of both in the Masetto of Signor Ronconi. The Donna Elvira of Madame Rudersdorff is too boisterously shrewish; cleverly and completely expressed as is the music by her. Then, at the risk of our being burnt for heresy in the cause of Mozart's intentions and of good vocal execution generally, it must be represented that Mdle. Patti's Zerlina is too staccato, its melodies too much broken and tormented with over-accent—musically, too, unfinished entirely to content those who cannot forget Sontag, or Madame Persiani, or Bosio, to whose popularity the lady seems for the hour to have succeeded. M. Faure's Don Giovanni has improved; he is a modest, earnest, real artist, and as such cannot fail to improve.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE. When Mdle Artot began her career only a few years ago in London concerts, it was to be felt by every one who heard her that experience only was wanting to her entire success. A singer so accomplished, both vocally and musically, had not made a first appearance since the coming out of Mdle. Artot's preceptor, Madame Viardot. Since then, stage practice and success have done their work, and the lady, as was proved by her admirable performance in 'La Figlia del Reggimento' on Tuesday, is now something like the best operatic artist before the public;—with a voice excellently in tune, of sufficiently pleasing quality, and thoroughly trained. Mdle. Artot's acting, too, is good; lively, without the slightest grimace or impertinence,—there is youth in it, but no crudeness nor incompleteness. In brief, nothing could be more enthusiastic than her reception, and never was praise better merited. She is one of the few to be watched and listened for, and to be spoken of not after, but with Madame Lind and Sontag, whose performances in Donizetti's prettiest comic opera must have been felt to render the essay of a younger artist in the character of Maria hazardous, to say the least of it.

The month of May closed with three benefit performances for Mr. Lumley, the former manager of Her Majesty's Theatre, which caused much newspaper comment on the conduct of his old friend, the Earl of Dudley, proprietor of the theatre, in refusing him the use of it; so the benefit performances were given, and with great success, at Drury Lane. Great interest was taken in this tribute by the artists; Mme. Piccolomini came all the way from Florence to lend her services, singing in Traviata and La Figlia del Reggimento and the last act of the Favorita. Tietjens, too, was to have sung in Don Giovanni, but some influence withdrew her aid, and Mr. Gye, of the other theatre, allowed Mlle. Fricci to take her place. The papers made much of this matter, universal sympathy being felt for the ex-manager, who had helped so many artists win their fame and fortune, and whose own fortunes had been saved by Jenny Lind.

At the Royal Italian, during the same week, Mlle. Fioretti sang in Martha, "making another step in the good graces of her public by her admirable singing and natural behavior." Then followed Le Prophete, with Nantier-Didiée as Fides, and Mlle. Dettini as Bertha; Tamberlik, splendid as usual, as Jean of Leyden; and for the three gentlemen in black, the Anabaptists, Signors Neri-Baraldi, Polonini and Zelger. Patti, Mario and Ronconi sang together in Il Barbiere; and Patti (for the first time) in Trovatore with Didiée, Mario and Graziani.

We will now briefly sum up the lyrical delights of the two houses ("a plague on both their houses," one might say, while they keep harping upon the Traviata and the Trovatore) for the month of June.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA. Traviata again, and Don Giovanni and Il Barbiere and Martha in the first week, ending on Saturday with La Gazza Ladra, in which Mlle. Patti took for the first time the part of Ninetta; of which let our friend the Musical World report:

Of all the artists who essayed the character of Ninetta in this country—including, among others, Fodor, Malibran, Blasia, Mesdames Grisi, Penco, and Lotti—Malibran and Grisi alone won more than ephemeral fame in the part. Grisi made her first reputation in Ninetta, and many to this day think she never surpassed that performance. When we assert that Mdle. Adelina Patti has proved a worthy successor of Malibran and Grisi, we think we are paying the new Ninetta the greatest possible compliment. The first performance of a character that demands for its realization the most finished singing and the most natural and intense acting can hardly fulfil the highest expectation, more especially when the performer, impulsive and enthusiastic, is liable to be carried away by her feelings. We saw and heard enough, however, in Mdle. Patti's Ninetta to satisfy us that it would become one of the most delightfully attractive impersonations in her varied repertory. She sings Rossini's music almost au lettre, and has evidently made the character her most serious study. Her success was immense. She was recalled after each act, and at the fall of the curtain was received with deafening applause. The part of Pipo was sustained by Madame Didiée, that of the father by M. Faure, that of the Podesta by Signor Ronconi, Fabrizio by Signor Tagliafico, and Gianetto by Signor Neri-Baraldi. On Monday the Prophete was given for the second time. On Tuesday the Gazza Ladra was repeated, Mdle. Patti creating even a greater impression than at her first performance. Don Giovanni was given on Thursday and the Barbiere last night.

The only novelty of the following week was the appearance of M. Obin in Robert le Diable, of which we learn from the same trustworthy source:

The cast differed in three important respects from that of last season, Mdle. Antonietta Fricci, Mdle. Marie Battu and M. Obin replacing Madame Penco, Madame Miolan-Carvalho and Herr Formes in the parts of Alice, Isabella and Bertram. Mdle. Fioretti had been cast for the Princess, and rehearsed it, but at the last moment took it into her head that the music was not suited to her, and (after taking a month's salary) left the theatre and the country the evening before the performance. The part of Isabella, nevertheless, had more than once been played by Mdle. Fioretti at Rome, with Mdle. Cortesi as Alice. Mdle. Marie Battu, however, was by no means an inefficient substitute, short as was the notice she received. Mdle. Fricci's Alice has both strong and weak points, the latter predominating. M. Obin, from the Grand Opera of Paris, where he has held the post of first bass for some years, though nervous at the beginning achieved a decided success. His voice is remarkable both for quality and range; he sings well, and is versed in all the traditions of the character. Having to struggle against a foreign language, M. Obin had "up-hill" work; but as the opera progressed he gradually threw off all restraint, and in the incantation scene created a highly favorable impression. On the whole, M. Obin will prove a great acquisition to the Royal Italian Opera. Signor Tamberlik's Robert was by far the most finished performance; his singing was pure, noble and unaffected, his acting natural, forcible and chivalric.

On Monday the Gazza Ladra was repeated; on Tuesday Roberto il Diavolo was given for the second time; on Thursday Don Giovanni, and last night Il Trovatore—Mdle. Patti appeared in all excepting Roberto.

Then for another week the Prophete and Il Barbiere, and Mansueto, and Don Juan, and Martha, took their turns again, and on Thursday, July 3d, Gounod's Faust was brought out for the first time at this theatre, in rivalry with Her Majesty's, where it had been occupying the stage nearly the whole month. The World merely says of it.

On Thursday M. Gounod's Faust, under the name of Faust e Margherita, was produced, with a completeness and splendor not surpassed in any of those magnificent operatic spectacles for which theatre is renowned. Each of the "tableaux" into which the opera is divided was a masterpiece of picturesque effect, only equalled by the admirable arrangement of the stage business. The chief characters were sustained by Madame Miolan-Carvalho, Madame Nantier Didiée, Mademoiselle Lustani, MM. Faure and Tagliafico, Signors Graziani and Tamberlik: Three pieces were encored—the quaint strophe allotted to the old men ("Nei di di riposo"), in the opening chorus of the second act; the first song of Mephistopheles ("Dio dell'or"); and the martial chorus with which Valentine and his companions celebrate their return from the wars. The principal singers were called on several times in the course of the evening; and at the end of the third act M. Gounod himself was summoned before the curtain. The performance did not terminate until half an hour past midnight. The house was crowded with a brilliant, but not very enthusiastic audience.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE. Here too the month began with the announcement of La Traviata; only Mlle. Artôt was ill, and parts of the "Barber", Trovatore, &c., were given instead. Then came the Huguenots (second time), and the Traviata without fail, and, still continuing in the 'Ercles Verdi vein, the Ballo in Maschera, with an uncommonly brilliant cast: Mlle. Tietjens, Trebelli, Volpini; Signors Giuglini, Delle Sedie and Cassier. Mlle. Volpini, who took the part of Oscar the page, was a debutante and created a marked sensation.

Gounod's Faust—first time in England—was the next nine days' wonder. The first night was a great success, M. Gounod himself being present, who was twice called out. Our friend D., after several hearings, thus remarks upon it:

Faust is M. Gounod's Vathek. He is, in fact, as much the man of one opera as in another sense that other man was the man of one book. Well, then—what is this Faust? Musicians will tell you that as a work of art it is not very remarkable; amateurs insist that it does not to any great extent reveal the faculty of inventing tune; purists will add that its style of harmony and modulations is based upon that of Richard Wagner, that it contains not a single ingeniously constructed morceau d'ensemble (grave objection to a grand opera), that the dramatic, or melodramatic coloring of the whole is borrowed now from Weber, now from Meyerbeer, now from Wagner, now from Verdi, and now from Halévy. But what of all this? True or false, of one or all of the foregoing charges, Faust is the most popular opera of the day; and whatever—but, n'importe; we have now to record another of its successes.

Faust—Faust—Faust—nothing but Faust. Faust on Saturday, Wednesday and Thursday; to be repeated to-night, on Tuesday, and "every night until further notice"—as they say at the theatres. We have heard Faust four times, and, without being impressed by it as with the work of a man of genius or of a great master, can easily understand its almost universal popularity. Music even less characteristic and less pleasing than M. Gounod's would hardly have failed to attract with such a cast as that of Faust at Her Majesty's Theatre. Mlle. Tietjens' Margaret is incomparable; Sig. Giuglini sings the part of Faust to perfection; M. Cassier (if he could but look but a little more diabolical) would be all that is dreamt of in the French Mephistopheles; Mlle. Trebelli and Mr. Santley, as Siebel and Valentine (Margaret's lover and brother), give the highest importance to characters of which little or nothing had previously been made. Mlle. Taccani is a more than respectable Martha; the chorus is admirable; the band beyond praise; the mise en scène in all respects efficient, in some remarkable. Sig. Ardit, by the talent and zeal he has shown in preparing this by no means easy work for representation, has placed himself in the first rank of operatic conductors; while Mr. Mapleson has won and deserved the esteem of his subscribers and the public by the spirit and expedition he has displayed in the whole affair. Then, the book—although poor Goethe cuts but a sorry figure in it—is wonderfully adapted to musical treatment. Every act (there are five acts in all) is based upon a striking and readily-explained incident; every scene is interesting in itself, besides being an intelligible step in the progress of the story; every character is as familiar as the men and women of Shakespeare's immortal dramas; what more could a composer desire?

Faust is to be played on Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, and Saturday, next week. We shall return to it in our next.

Germany.

COLOGNE. A new composition by Ferdinand Hiller, entitled "An Operetta without Words," for piano with four hands, was played by the author and Herr Breuning, at a concert of the Musical Society in May.

AMSTERDAM. In a concert of the Liedertafel, (May 6) was performed a large composition for solo, male chorus and orchestra, called "the Deliverance of Leyden," by Richard Hol. The royal family were present, and the king conferred an order on the composer. Mendelssohn's Paulus was recently performed here.

FRANKFORT. The opera troupe have recently performed "The Sylphs," a charming composition, it is said, by Himmel. In the last representation of the Huguenots three foreign artists took part: Wachtel (Raoul), Fri. Zirndorfer (Valentine), and Fri. Walbach (Marguerite).

BERLIN. The Royal Opera was to remain closed from June 20 to the end of July. The approaching debut of Fräulein Spohr, in the rôle of Alice, is announced. Frau Harriers Wippen lately performed the part of the princess in the same opera (Robert) with great success.

The French, or Frenchy, opera at Kroll's has been giving Martha, Le Dame Blanche, Le Maçon, L'Elisir d'Amore, &c. Mlle. Suvanny did wonderfully well in the part of Adina.

HANOVER. Fräulein Weiss has made a great sensation as Fidelio. Her marriage with Herr Joseph Joachim was fixed for the beginning of June.

DRESDEN. Herold's Zampa, so much in vogue twenty years ago, has been revived here. Herr Tichatschek sang the principal part wonderfully.

ROSTOCK. Bach's "Passion" music (according to St. Matthew) was executed at Whitsuntide in the church of St. Nicholas. The very long work was given unabridged, but the audience listened with attention to the end. The soli were sung by artists from Berlin.

BOSTON, JULY 25, 1868.

Emile Prudent.

The French have lost their great composer-pianist. Yet not great by the highest standard. His compositions, mostly of the modern fantasia, virtuosic order, have had considerable currency along with the like things of Thalberg, Liszt, Doehler, and others. But Prudent comes a long way after Liszt and Thalberg, being in no sense decidedly original, nor the founder of a school. If he has had imitators, it has been at second hand. But the Parisian critics place him very high. It is with allowance for some manifest extravagance that one must read the sketch of his life and merits, which we here abridge from the Gazette Musicale.

He was born at Angoulême on the 3d of February, 1817. According to one of his best friends, M. "Albéric Second," a veil of mystery and romance covers his birth. "One morning the inhabitants of the Rue de Geneve observed in the modest shop of a tuner of pianos, who carried on a small trade in music, an infant but a few weeks old and beautiful as Cupid. Whence came it? No one ever knew; the adoptive father and mother of the child preserved an absolute silence on this subject. His extreme gentillesse, the exquisite distinction of his delicate form, sufficed to prove that he was not the son of the old piano tuner, even had the latter tried to change the public opinion, which he never did."

Another writer says that Emile Prudent's real name was Racine Gaultier; that his father, a piano-tuner at Angoulême, knew something of the mechanism of this instrument, and was his first teacher; and that, having a presentiment of the happy talents of his son, he removed, about 1827, to Paris, in order that he might command for him a good musical education. Emile was admitted into the Conservatoire, where he was an assiduous member of Zimmermann's class. His father and mother, meanwhile, had separated, and Emile went in 1830 to live with his father in the Rue Beauregard, in a house once famous under the name of the Three Pigeons.

At the Conservatoire he carried off the second piano prize in 1831, and the first in 1833. The following year he obtained the second prize in harmony and practical accompaniment. "When I again saw him in the latter part of 1834," says M. Albéric Second, "the old tuner had died two years since of the cholera, and the laureate of the Conservatoire earned his living by giving a few lessons." He made a trade of music until he should be permitted to practice it as an art, and frequently, in the winter, he even played for contra-dances. Tormented by the desire to "produce himself" in another fashion, and to submit his talent to a serious audience, he gave a concert, which, in spite of the aid and encouragement of some good friends, resulted in a bill of expenses. "Then it was," continues this romantic chronicler, "that Emile Prudent conceived and executed a singularly courageous resolution. The very next night he broke the gay Parisian life short off, with its adventures (for he was a handsome youth and perhaps not entirely to blame), and returned to Angoulême, where he devoted himself with such ardor to laborious practice, that he was threatened with paralysis of both fore-arms. A skilful physician of the country, who was very fond of him, sent him, every day for a month, to the public slaughter house, where he plunged his arms to the elbow into the smoking blood of beaves (!) This treatment" (labors, dangers and sacrifices worthy of a greater cause) "soon restored all the suppleness and energy of his enfeebled wrists. During this residence at Angoulême he married her, who is now his desolate widow, after having been the cherished companion, the intelligent friend, and the valiant comrade of his whole existence as man and as artist."

Having laid this groundwork of hard, continuous practice, and deep study of the masters, Prudent bade adieu to his townsmen and settled down at Nantes, where his lessons were immediately in great request. There, slowly and surely, if not as suddenly as Thalberg, he acquired an imposing, but at the same time a modest authority.

Prudent's compositions, as we have said, do not belong to the higher order of really imaginative creations, and cannot claim to be mentioned along with the piano-forte works of men like Beethoven, or Mendelssohn, or Chopin. They belong to the modern virtuosic school; that is, were written more to illustrate the art of piano playing, than from any inward necessity of expression; they are not so much tone poems, as they are clever and brilliant tone-exhibitions. They are perhaps among the cleverest of the attempts to do like Thalberg. This kind of composition—art we can call it only in a qualified sense and as it were by courtesy—enjoys more esteem just now in Paris than in most other great musical centres. Of Prudent's compositions the writer in the Gazette says: "In his Fantasias on Lucia, on the Huguenots, on Norma, in his Souvenirs de Beethoven, he employed the method of which Thalberg was the inventor. He availed himself of the arpeggio with a vigor and a power beyond which there was nothing left; he set the pillars of Hercules for this means of effect, and it was an honor worth as much as another. At the same time he tried his hand at original morceaux, such as 'L'Hirondelle,' 'La Ronde de Nuit,' the Etude in A flat, and he soon showed that he had resources enough in him not to build eternally on other's ground. The credit we claim for the first period of Prudent is, that he began by doing what others did, as well as others did it, often better, and that he thus in a manner conquered the right to do something different. If he changed, if he modified, it was through conviction, and not through impotence. Far from insulting the success of his predecessors, he began with rendering them a full and sincere homage. After which, he saw that one should pass to other combinations, other effects, and he wrote the Concerto Symphonique, the most elevated, the largest work that has issued from his pen." (This was written ten years before his death). "The Concerto Symphonique, in which the part of the piano rivals in importance that of the orchestra, marks the second epoch in the works of Emile Prudent; and around this Concerto, at the same level, though quite different in character, are grouped the delicious morceaux entitled: 'Les Bois,' 'Les Champs,' and the 'Allegretto Pastoral,' which serve as a transition to the third epoch. The author of the Concerto Symphonique, descending from the heights [very grand this!] of this capital work, yielded himself to the inspiration of the musical landscape; and this inspiration shows itself again still bolder, still more brilliant, more ravishing than ever in his last two compositions, the 'Danse des Feés' and 'La Villanelle.'—Within the last ten years this list has been enriched by numerous works, among which we will only cite the 'Chant du Ruisseau,' 'Folie,' the 'Chanson à boire,' 'Les Naiades,' 'Le Chant d'Ariel,' 'La Prairie,' his 'Etudes-lieder,' his Romances without words, and finally his 'Trois Rêves.' A plenty of poetic titles, to say the least. But what hosts of would-be geniuses cover the counters of the music-sellers, and fill the advertising sheets with just such dainty seeming subjects! Prudent's perhaps are among the best of them; but will one of them be remembered as long as the least thing of Chopin, Mendelssohn, Schumann, Schubert, and the few of real inspiration?

Prudent, the Gazette continues, never was, or wished to be any thing but an artist, and it was a fixed idea with him to elevate French art to as high a pitch as possible, and make himself the chief thereof. "This idea he had almost entirely realized, and he was, without contradiction, the French pianist the most capable of sustaining the parallel with the great foreign pianists. No one represented better than he the school, which, if he had not created, he had at least raised and ennobled."

As a teacher he had formed a multitude of eminent pupils, and last year, when a place became vacant in the Conservatoire, he was designated by M. Auber to be its occupant. Still he was not appointed. He had given concerts with success in France, Italy, Spain, Portugal, Germany, and England; and he had the intention of going to Russia, and even of visiting America as soon as peace should be restored; but the fatal disease attacked him at nine o'clock one morning and before night he was dead.

Emile Prudent is described as "one of the best men to be met with; he had a lively wit, quick in reply, words brief and pointed; his mouth wore a smile of raillery; his eye was clear and piercing; and when, by a familiar movement, he threw back his handsome and abundant black hair, he discovered a large and pure forehead, in which his rare intelligence was easily divined."

Mr. Paine's Organ Concert.

The lovers of real organ music among us are not many. There doubtless would be more of them, had the ear and mind and heart been educated, if only by familiarity, by frequent hearing, to some clear apprehension and appreciation of the Fugues and other noble works of Bach and Handel. With the overwhelming strength of a great mass of human voices, in an Oratorio, the same essential musical structure, the polyphonic and Fugue form, makes a grand and quickening impression on the largest crowd of listeners. But the same essential music, the mere musical idea, as a pure Art creation, divested of imposing accessories, presented through the simple medium of an instrument, even as grand and church-like as the organ, appeals only to the finer sense and informed apprehension of the more musically educated, or to such natures as are predisposed to sympathy with the greatest and the deepest things, whether in Art, or poetry, or human life. Yet a mere organ concert may attract and may amuse a crowd, provided that it abdicates the nobler essentials of the true organ character, and condescends to clever competition with other dazzling shows and nine days' wonders; provided the organist will show off all the fanciful and pretty "stops," imitate all sorts of instruments, even the orchestra itself, parody (it may be unconscious of the parody) Lisztian and Thalbergian feats of prestidigitation, doing the same things with the feet as well as fingers, and limit himself to those flashy compositions which are to Bach, what sputtering fireworks are to the light of sun and planets everlasting in the heavens, or such sentimental trifles as might find their full expression on a hand-organ. Truly it is a waste and sacrilege to erect these grand Temples of Harmony, if the uses thereof are to be so trivial. The grandest organ ever built is but a poor ambition, unless it shall be made the organ for the utterance of the grandest music. But in communities where neither musical nor spiritual experience is very deep or real, it cannot be wondered that the "showing off" of the organ and the organ-player should interest more people than the best music ever written by the greatest genius in accordance with the genius of the instrument. The mass are carried away by the singer more than by the song, by the instrument rather than by the musical idea which has the proper divine right to use it.

No wonder, then, that an earnest musician like Mr. PAINE, does not have the West Church crowded, or even half filled, when he announces one of his solid programmes of the most admirable organ music. Yet audience he does not lack, such as a young artist may be proud of. On Saturday afternoon, July 11th, in the softening and sober light of the nearly finished summer day, a couple of hundreds of attentive listeners sat in the galleries and remoter pews and corners of the old church, yielding up their thoughts to the solemnizing and refreshing influences of Bach, for a long and tranquil hour or two. It only needed to be one hour later into twilight to make it perfect. This was the programme:

1. Fantasia and Fugue, in E minor.....J. K. Paine.
2. Improvisation.....Handel.
3. Bass Solo.—Arm. arm ye brave.....Handel.
4. Trio Sonata, in C.....Bach.
5. Passacaglia, in G minor.....Bach.
6. Bass Solo.—Fall of Zion.....Pachelbel.
7. Toccata, in E flat minor.....Thiele.
8. Choral variation, "Christ, our Lord, to the Jordan came.".....Bach.
9. Andante from an Organ Sonata.....Mendelssohn.
10. Toccata in F.....Bach.

Mr. Paine's own Fantasy and Fugue is one which he had played to us before, and the impression which it then made by its clear, large and imposing character was fully confirmed. His improvisation was upon the softer and sweeter stops; a well conceived, musing cantabile strain, tender and chaste in feeling. The Trio Sonata by Bach is one of the six which he had not played before in public; the first movement of a bold, open-faced and honest character; the Andante exquisitely delicate and subtle both in form and feeling; the Finale (Rondo) brilliant but full of matter. The Passacaglia is certainly a most unique and interesting composition. It is "a form of ancient dance music, in which a slow and solemn theme, eight bars long, is repeated continuously in the bass, while free variations are carried on by the other parts." The first and simplest of these variations have a singular poetic charm, entirely original, which is kept up in those that follow, although they grow more and more complicated and difficult. Some of Bach's cadenzas and embellishments are imaginative and fairy-fine enough for Chopin, only never suggesting aught of sickliness. He was one of those who had plenty of nerves, and of the most sensitive, but was always master of them.

The Toccata by Thiele—a young man of a rare gift for the Organ, who was cut off at the early age of twenty-four, and is always mentioned with respect among the musicians in Berlin—was a free, bold, fanciful production, full of fire, and of a certain depth and energy of feeling that made one think at times of Beethoven. It was his last composition and is esteemed his best. It did not suffer in Mr. Paine's able rendering.—The Choral Variation, of which Bach has left so many examples, is one of the most beautiful and touching forms of organ composition. A flowing accompaniment is carried on all the time both above and below, limpid and cooling to the sense as running water, while single lines of the Choral tune are given out at intervals upon a mysterious sounding heavy reed stop, with most imposing effect. The Andante by Mendelssohn was lovely, in pleasing contrast with the other good things, thoroughly individual, and probably appreciated by a larger number than most pieces in the programme. The Bach Toccata in F is that bright, free, glorious one, which has proved a favorite in Mr. Paine's former concerts,—a sort of thing to make you happy, like the presence of a bright, unceremonious, great-hearted friend,—while it displayed to great advantage the organist's rare mastery of his instrument, especially his pedal playing.

The two bass songs were effectively and tastefully delivered by Mr. KIMBALL, a member of the choir of the church in which the concert was held, who has a solid, manly, true bass voice.

We hope Mr. Paine will persevere in the good work of offering to our public better organ music than it yet knows how to appreciate. By dint of repetition and familiarity, and with so important an auxiliary as the magnificent Organ now in process of erection in our city, Sebastian Bach, will yet become a presence and a power among us.

La France Musicale (Paris) says: "They write us from New York that, at the close of the winter, the Harold Symphony of Berlioz was executed, with great success, at the concert of M. Carl Bergami (meaning Bergmann). There is no chef d'œuvre that has been received with more enthusiasm by the true dilettanti of New York, than this celebrated Symphony." The "true dilettanti" were of course the Frenchmen and others of French musical affinities. Their opinion or feeling is not to be taken for that of all the well-informed, appreciative music-lovers in New York. No one for a moment will suppose that the constant nucleus of the Philharmonic subscribers, any more than such sterling classical musicians as Mr. Scharfenberg, Mr. Timm, Mr. Hoffman, Mr. Burke, Mr. William Mason, Mr. Bergmann himself, could find as much in a work of Berlioz as in a Symphony of Beethoven or of Mendelssohn. Even some, who plead for the performance of new works as well as old, and who hail Berlioz as a genius in his way, couple their praise with most important qualifications; thus the musical critic of the Times after the concert referred to, wrote:

It is not easy to express a liking for Berlioz's muse—so strangely does it oscillate between the extreme of raving eccentricity and of colossal, but entirely inconsequential magnificence. His genius belongs to a sort of musical deluge, and what you find in it is interesting as a phenomenon of nature, like the megatherium or the ornithomycus paradoxus.

It is impossible to say why he has so much tail or so little fin, and one can readily believe that in a moment of excitement he could climb a tree or dive to the bottom of old ocean with equal facility. But that he has genius, is demonstrated by the fact that a number of respectable notorieties have been engaged for several years in stealing it. Berlioz has supplied the school of the "future" with the few ideas of which it can boast, and this work of "Harold" contains the materials for a dozen Liszts and Wagners. It is somewhat more coherent than others of the composer's large works. The plan is thoroughly dramatic, and the one idea of keeping the personality of Harold constantly before the audience, whilst the orchestra presents a dazzling succession of scenes in which that unhappy individual is a spectator, if not a participator, is excellently maintained by means of the Viola, representing the hero. Nor is the work destitute of the tangible merit of melody, although it is for broad and startling combinations of instruments, happy conceits of coloring, and massive and overwhelming effects of sonority, that it is most remarkable. It is in these latter respects that we perceive the hand of the master, and the daring invention of a man of genius. To say that the work is one of the most interesting of its sort, is feebly to express the pleasure that its fine performance on Saturday night afforded to the audience.

Doubtless not a few, too, in that audience would dissent from even this praise; where this writer finds "ideas," they can see nothing but effective, startling, or "colossal" treatment. On the score of originality in general, we think that Wagner would have a heavier vote than Berlioz; while as against any of the great classical masters, the Beethovens and Mozarts, all of the three candidates would have to count as "scattering."

RICHARD WAGNER has taken summer quarters at Peusing, near Vienna, where he is working upon new operas.

ADELINA PATTI is engaged for a series of concerts at Wiesbaden, Mannheim and Frankfurt, in the month of August.

An unpublished Magnificat, written by HANDEL, when a young man, by desire of Cardinal Otoboni, has recently been performed in London. Only two copies exist—one the property of Queen Victoria, and the other of the Sacred Harmonic Society of London.

A letter from Königsberg says: "A very comical scene has just occurred at our theatre. Mdlla. Janaschek, one of the most celebrated actresses in Germany, has been giving representations at Königsberg. The other day she was taking the part of the Maid of Orleans in Schiller's tragedy, and in one scene in the last act, while she escapes from prison, she has to seize as she flies the sword of one of the English cavaliers who guard her. At Königsberg all military parts are played by Prussian soldiers. The man whose sword the Maid of Orleans was to take happened to be acting for the first time, and was completely ignorant both of Schiller and the Orleans heroine. When the actress, in running past, snatched at his weapon, he resisted and said loudly, 'No, I don't give up my sword.' You may imagine the laughter with which this was heard, given, too, in a Prussian patois which contrasted singularly with the elevated language of the tragedy. The actress, to whom the sword was necessary to finish her part, became irritated and took it from him by force. In doing so she wounded her hand, without, however, much mischief; but at the end of the spectacle she declared to the director that she would not play again in Königsberg."

CARL ANSCHUTZ, instead of going abroad himself, has sent an agent by the name of Meyer, to engage singers for his German Opera troupe; whereat one of the New York itemizers conjectures that there will be two German operas here next winter.

It is said that the score of a lost opera, "Maria Stuarda," by Donizetti, written at Naples in 1834, and there suppressed by the censorship, has been recovered and will be produced so soon as an artist can be found able to support the heroine's part.

The leading musicians of Brussels have sent in a report to the government on the question of pitch, announcing it to be their unanimous judgment that the diapason ought not to be lowered. This is directly in the face of the prevailing tendency throughout Europe.

MADAME ANNA BISHOP gave a concert in Portland, on the 4th, for the benefit of the Sanitary Commission.

VERDI's "Forza del Destino" was very successful in Rome. In Madrid, the composer received 25,000 francs for conducting the rehearsal of his opera.—The imperial theatres at St. Petersburg cost the czar, last season, a million francs, and he means hereafter to be more economical. Singers therefore turn their backs on St. Petersburg.

The Beethoven Monument in Heiligenstadt is the title of an elegantly printed pamphlet (published by the Typographical, Literary, and Artistic Institution of Zamarski and Co., Vienna), which gives us a representation of the Monument, and the surrounding country, details of the erection and uncovering of the Monument, and a musical appendix containing a "Cantata for the uncovering of the Beethoven Monument, set to music for four male voices and accompaniment, by B. Randhartinger." The profits of the pamphlet will be devoted to the fund for keeping in order the space around the Monument.

Heiligenstadt ("Sanctus Locus" in old deeds, and therefore not to be written "Heiligenstadt") is a neat village, resembling a small country town, of 215 hearths, and 4,500 inhabitants, who, for centuries, have produced excellent wine, and who take their agricultural and horticultural produce to Vienna, which is close to them. Beethoven resided here on several occasions in the summer, and on a favorite spot on the banks of a brook, under a group of hazels, in the avenue which leads from Heiligenstadt to Nussdorf, and which is now called the "Beethoven-gang," or "Beethoven's Walk," stands the simple monument: a colossal bronze bust, upon a marble pedestal, tapering off towards the top. It is surrounded by an iron railing, erected by the Verschönerungs-Verein (Embellishment Association) of Heiligenstadt. The bust is modelled and cast in bronze by the Baron von Fernkorn. The monument was to be uncovered on the 22nd June, weather permitting, and delivered over, by Dr. Anton Heidmann, the President of the Association, to the parish of Heiligenstadt, on the condition that the inhabitants would take care that it should be protected, and the hazel trees under which the great master so often used to sit be preserved as long as possible.

At the ceremony of uncovering the Monument the Cantata we have mentioned above was to be sung, and a speech, written by Dr. L. A. Frankl, spoken by Herr Förster of the Imperial Theatre. The speech is printed, with a number of pieces of poetry, etc., in the pamphlet, and contains, among other things, the following passages:—

"Let everyone who was a contemporary of immortal men be proud of the fact! We ourselves were, and that, too at a time when the tongue was compelled to be dumb, and when war was waged upon the free expression of the mind in our own native land. Then it was that the music of the modern Titan undertook to sing men's indignation, and give utterance to the hymn of Freedom, so that men's hearts and minds should not unlearn and forget them!"

In the evening there was to be a grand concert to celebrate the occasion in the Park Saloon. After an excellent prologue (also printed) by Joseph Weilen, there is to be a performance of compositions by Beethoven, carried out by Helmesberger's Quartet, Herbeck's Gesangverein, the Männergesangverein, &c.

Among the poems, one called Beethoven's Kirmess relates a trick played by the master and three joyous companions, while L. A. Frankl recounts another anecdote to the following effect, founded upon a Heiligenstadt tradition, and, as far as we are aware, hitherto unpublished.

It appears that, on a winter's day, Beethoven, totally unconscious of the frost and snow, wandered up hill and down dale till he arrived at a small hollow in the road. Here he stayed completely absorbed in his thoughts. A cart, laden with wood, came up a little time afterwards, but the driver stopped his horses. Two more carts followed, and, not being able to pass the first, were, of course, brought to a stand still. Meanwhile, Beethoven remained totally unconscious of the obstruction he was causing, for the idea of the Eroica had just struck him. The second and third carters halloed out and asked the first why he did not proceed, but he only made them a sign to be silent. At last Beethoven resumed his walk, and the first carter, turning to the others, said—"That was the first musician in Vienna—I did not want to disturb him. At present you can drive on. Come up!" the last apostrophe being directed to his horses.—London Musical World.

HAYTER'S CHURCH MUSIC.—A collection of Psalm and Hymn Tunes, Chants, Services, Anthems &c.

By A. U. HAYTER. Organist at Trinity Church, Boston, and formerly at Hereford Cathedral, England. Cloth, $2.50
Boards. 2.25

Mr. Hayter has filled most acceptably for twenty-five years, the office of organist at Trinity Church, and has prepared for the choir, during that period, a large quantity of excellent church music. He now selects the cream of his manuscripts for publication. The book is the most valuable collection of sacred music that has appeared for many years; not that it is better adapted for the use of choirs all over the country than others, but the music is of a high class, harmonious, satisfying to the best musicians.

There are in the collection a large number of tunes equal to the best of the old English tunes, which they resemble in style; also a number of sentences of the general character of Mendelssohn's "Sleepers, wake,"; also some fine anthems and chants.

The music has mostly a simple rhythm, and is in choral or ecclesiastical style throughout, the effect being produced by the splendid harmony.

I. GYROWETZ.

INTRODUCTION. Interest of the subject.—German Music eighty years ago.—No "Musical Public"—The People's Theatre.—G's Reminiscences.—Relation between Noble and Composer.

Vienna, May 10, 1863.

MY DEAR DWIGHT:—I send you, herewith, the beginning of the proposed articles upon "half a dozen of Beethoven's contemporaries," and have selected ADALBERT GYROWETZ to lead the way. The foundation of the sketch is a Biography, written about fifteen years since, at the instance of Ludwig August Frankl, one of the leading belles-lettres writers of Vienna, and published in 1848.

I have long had the idea of giving the readers of your journal a short biography of this now forgotten composer, who died in 1850, because it is interesting in itself, but more especially, as it is one of those personal histories, which exhibit to us living pictures of the musical world at the close of the last century, when that world hardly extended beyond the limits of the nobility of birth, and the few wealthy persons of taste and culture. Eighty years ago, music was a luxury of the higher classes; the great public was not expected to know, that any thing higher than dance, military, and comic operatic music existed. Rarely was any thing written for the people, certainly not in the higher forms of instrumental music. The people's music was in general supplied by composers whose names musical history ignores, and consisted of the lightest of the light in melody and harmony, or of arrangements from the works of the greater composers, no copyright protecting Haydn or Mozart from having their greatest compositions plundered to any extent.

It was one of the remarkable facts in Mozart's history, that he should have consented to compose an opera for a cheap, low people's theatre; but he did so, and the wonderful music to the "Magic Flute" is the result.

I have, within a few days past, met with a report upon the productions of one of this class of theatres, during the month of March, 1795, the Faberbräu theatre in Munich. Passing over the comedies and tragedies, probably lamentably and comically represented, here are those in which music had a greater or less share in the attraction.

On the 22d, "The Lost Son, an excellent drama after the Parable, in 4 acts, by the celebrated Herr Zimmermann, with a funeral cantata." The characters are Ananias and his two sons, Jonathan and Phineas; his grandsons Sopborn and Benjamin; Nabason and Javor, swindlers from Babylon. The afterpiece was "The improvised Comedy." The director says upon the playbill: "We wish to-day to edify you, and at the same time move you to laughter." What the funeral cantata was, we are not informed.

On the 25th the Bible again furnished the subject of the play, viz., "John, the much loved disciple of the Lord, or, the Might and Dignity of Christianity, a drama in 4 acts with a choral song by the celebrated Herr Zimmermann, dedicated to the memory of the first Christians and early Christianity." The play bill had this Nota bene: "We shall endeavor, so far as possible, to imitate the costume and spirit of that time."

But the great event of the season was the production on the 29th of March and April 1st, of, 1st, the Prologue, "The Revelation to Nature a spiritual drama with music and song," a duodrama, characters, Nature and Revelation, in form of a pilgrim; and, 2nd., the grand drama:

"The Death of Jesus, prepared from the well-known and admired 'Messiah' of Klopstock." This drama is divided into "two contemplations," the second being given on another evening.

Here are the dramatis personæ.

Caiaphas,	First	} Messenger.
Hannas,	Second
Philo,	A maid servant,
First	Hierod,
Second	Pilate,
Third	Roman Captain,
First	A Soldier,
Second	False Witnesses,
Third	The Youth of Nain,
Jesus,	Maria,
Peter,	Mary Magdalen,
John,	Ciddi, raised from the dead,
Judas and the other	Rachel,
Disciples,	Jamina,
Nicodemus,	Salome,
Lazarus,	Portia,
Joseph,	Female Slave.

From the play bill:

"The choruses, which will be sung to-day, are mostly by the well-known great man, Herr Rosetti; the other vocal pieces and the musical accompaniments are also all and several by great masters. Between the acts the orchestra will play, 'The Seven Words of the Saviour,' by Haydn. As to the rest, the directors, having received the all-highest special permission of his Electoral Transparency, have spared no expense to be able to give, not only the performance of to-day, but those which will follow, all having for their object our edification and the inflaming of our Christian zeal, with that dignity which is due and peculiar to the celebration of the establishment of our religion; they hope also a remunerative audience."

April 2d. "The Expiatory Offering, a spiritual prologue, with music and song." After which, "The Death of Jesus, Second Contemplation."

April 6th. "Lazarus, or Celebration of the Resurrection, a biblical musical drama in 3 acts, prepared for this theatre, with a quite new music by Herr Gleisner." The play bill contains remarks, says the correspondent, "very edifying and Christian."

The introduction of the "Seven Words,"—the original symphonies, not the vocal arrangements now known,—may seem to indicate a better condition of the peoples' music, than I have above described; but I was speaking there of a period, before Mozart, Dittersdorf and others had written masterpieces, of a character such as to render them equally acceptable in the theatre of the noble, and in that of the lower classes. The history of the growth of the musical public remains to be written; in England it grew up earlier than in Germany, thanks to Handel; in the latter country, it hardly goes back beyond three generations.

To return. When Gyrowetz was young, the accomplished musician depended mainly upon the patronage of the so-called great; as in England, a few generations since, an author depended as much upon his dedication to some vain nobleman for his pecuniary reward, as upon the sale of his book; and his (Gyrowetz's) reminiscences are a valuable contribution to our knowledge of this relation between noble and composer. This was hardly more true in Austria, than in other countries. Look at Handel, the guest of the Duke of Chandos; Bach, Kapellmeister at the insignificant court of the Duke of Weissenfels; Mozart, struggling with poverty because he would not condescend to accept such a place; John Peter Salomon in the service of Prince Henry of Prussia; Haydn, musical factotum of Esterhazy, and so on. The great nobles of the last age, and especially when the temple of Janus happened to be shut, on retiring to their castles and chateaux, "when the season was over," easily became the victims of tedium, and their private theatres, their concerts, and their chapels (on Sundays and Saints' days) were their principal sources of home amusement. Hence, a brilliant young composer, particularly when a man of culture and education, was a godsend, and was as gladly welcomed, and as hospitably entertained, as a cultivated northerner or foreigner on some vast Southern plantation,—in days gone by, thank God!

Gyrowetz was an old man, over eighty years, when he wrote his reminiscences. There are very few dates given, and these I find singularly confused. This is one reason why I have not contented myself with a mere translation. Even the date of his birth does not correspond with the time of certain events which he relates. For instance, he gives Feb. 19, 1763 as his birth-day, and says afterwards, that he, when Mozart produced his (Gyrowetz's) symphony in a concert, was about eighteen. Now in 1781 Mozart had not yet settled in Vienna. The "1763" may be a misprint for 1765. Gerber says Gyrowetz was born "about 1765." Dlabacz says 1767. The Neue Berliner Musik-Zeitung in the notice of his death, 1850, says he was 84 years old, which would give 1766; and Frankl gives a date which would make 1762 the right one. My observation in all my researches leads me to put no trust in dates given by old men, when they cannot or do not refer to some other authority than their memory; and I shall, therefore, correct, so far as possible, such errors as I may detect, in silence. To me Gyrowetz is a very interesting character; will he prove so to others, is the question.

Adalbert Gyrowetz.

CHAPTER I.

His Bohemian Birth and Parentage.—Early Musical Manifestations and Studies.—First Love and Affliction.—Enters University at Prague.—State of Music there.—How Artists travelled.—Engaged as Secretary to a Musical Count.—Writes Symphonies, Quartets, &c., which become fashionable.

Johann Hübner in his "Complete Geography," third part, anno 1763, just a hundred years ago, declares Bohemian Budweis to be "a cleanly, large and strong royal city, with good walls and bulwarks, and which could be made into a real fortress. Gold and silver are found there, and in the river Moldau are also pearl muscels."

One of the elders of the Commune of Budweis was — Gyrowetz, who took to wife the daughter of Apothecary Götz, "a pious, domestically educated woman," and begat three sons and a daughter. The youngest child was Adalbert, the mother's favorite, born Feb. 19, 1763. (?) The father was also director of the choir (regens chori) in the principal church, and used to take the child, when he was four years of age, into the organ loft on Sundays and festivals, where, seated on a footstool, the little boy beat time to the music of the mass, perfectly happy in the enjoyment of what even then was his supreme delight, music. The first step in the child's regular musical education was being taught to sing, and his sweet alto voice soon became prominent at all the festivals of the church and other musical occasions. Then came the study of the violin. He was in a very short time able to play all ordinary music at sight, and by-and-by began to play in the concerts at Budweis. "If any where in the neighborhood a church festival was to take place, the boy was invited to play a concerto. Those of Stamitz [forgotten name!] were his favorites, which at that time were the most popular, and quite the mode—just as is usually the case in music—that which is new is thrust forward, and no one cares for the old."

[Poor old Gyrowetz! when he wrote this sentence, he had lived to see himself and his music old and cared for by none of the generation then on the stage.]

Then he studied the organ and thorough-bass with Heparnorsky, organist and composer in the church (where the elder Gyrowetz drilled the chorus), and while yet a boy, accompanied all kinds of church music, and attracted the attention of the public by the rich and changing fancies of his voluntaries. His first visit, when still a child, to the city theatre, was to the performance of an operetta. The effect of the small orchestra, in the overture, was so great upon him, that he fairly screamed with delight—not much to the edification of the rest of the audience—and, after the performance, came home intoxicated with the music. The old man dwells with evident satisfaction upon the reminiscences of his boyhood:—upon the six years of his gymnasium course, after the proper elementary studies at home, at the end of which he stood at the head of the school, and gained the highest premium; upon his contests with the other pupils for rank, both in recitations and in "writing compositions" (if I understand him rightly); upon his birds'-nesting with other boys, his object being to get young birds to tame, in which his success was such that they would obey his call, when flying about in freedom; upon his being invariably chosen one of the generals when the school-boys played war, and the like.

But during all this time, music was the leading occupation of his leisure hours; he enjoyed copying it, and began, too, to compose serenades, which his fellow pupils used to sing evenings with applause; and litanies, Salve regina's, hymns, antiphonies and so on, which his father found useful for his choir at vespers. A favorite style of composition with him was that of hymns in four vocal parts, with an accompaniment of wind instruments, which gained great applause.

The boy fell in love too, and this love made him wondrous pious, so that he would kneel for an hour at a time, praying God to give him soon some such position as would enable him to marry the magistrate's daughter. The girl died, and the poor boy "became so melancholy, that he did nothing but visit graves, and seek solitude. As the maiden lay upon the bier, a sort of sweat appeared about her lips; this he wiped away with a white handkerchief, which he preserved for many and many a day."

The vacations were usually passed at Gmunden, that lovely spot at the outlet of the Traun lake, where the steamboat is taken as one goes from Linz on the Danube to Iachl, and where an older brother was established as burgomaster. "There, partly by the beauty of scenery, partly by the kindness and amiability of the inhabitants, among whom were many right lovely maidens, he was so inspired, that very beautiful musical thoughts sprang up in his mind, which led him to write his first quartets and several songs, that really seemed to flow from a pure and youthful heart; and they seemed also to have made a very agreeable impression upon those who heard them."

In the quartets, Gyrowetz played the first violin, and had the good fortune to have good players for the other instruments. These first quartets were accidentally carried away by a travelling merchant into Spain, whence it was reported that they became popular, but Gyrowetz never saw them again. In Gmunden music was on a good footing, so that the masses of Haydn and Mozart were performed in the church; hence the youth breathed there also that musical atmosphere which surrounded him at home.

At length the gymnasium course was ended, and with his six years Latin in his head, the small sum of money which his parents could afford, in his pocket, the youth, now at most not over seventeen years of age, started off for Prague, with four of his fellow pupils of the gymnasium, there to enter the University, and study the civil law. The five young students lived together, very economically, appearing at first to have incurred no unavoidable expense, save that of lessons in French. But no economy will prevent a limited sum of money reaching its limits, and young Gyrowetz moved into the family of a gardener, named Laxa, receiving lodgings and board, in return for lessons on the violin given to two young Laxas, and for assisting them in their school studies.

"In his leisure hours, Gyrowetz employed himself as ever, with music; that is with copying or composing, and thus passed some years. He conducted the orchestra in certain private concerts, played the violin very well, and besides other things, composed minuets and waltzes for the band of the imperial artillery, which had such success as to be played for several years in the halls of Prague. He was also passionately fond of the theatre, so much so indeed as often to part with articles of clothing, to raise the amount of the entrance fee."

Music in Prague at that time was very flourishing. The orchestra in the theatre excellent, the church music very good, especially in the Cathedral of St. Veit, where the elder Kozeluch was regens chori, in the St. Nicholas Church, where Maschek directed, and in the St. Jakob in the old town, where a distinguished organist, Senger, played. Strobach—who afterwards conducted Mozart's operas there—was the first church and theatre Kapellmeister. There were other fine composers and performers, and the nobility were great patrons of the best music, many of them having cultivated the art practically.

And so the young man lived, dividing his time between his pupils, his music and his jurisprudence, until at last he fell ill of an intermittent fever, spent three months in the hospital of the Charitable Brethren, and left it, too weak to go on with his studies, had he had the pecuniary means of doing so, which he had not.

One would like to find some means of getting at Gyrowetz's age at this time; but there is no allusion in his reminiscences to any fact which can aid us—the non-allusion to Bondini as head of the theatre shows only that the date is before 1784. How great a space of time his "some years" in Prague covered, we are all in the dark upon; but that they must have been both pleasant and intellectually profitable there can be no doubt.

Prague is still striking to the traveller as a queer, quaint old town. How much more so must it have been eighty years ago, before the days of railroads and the "march of improvement!" It was then a journey from Prague to any other place, or from anywhere to Prague. It was something, in those days, to be the capital of a kingdom, even of a small one, and Prague was capital of Bohemia, a land of some importance and weight in the world. The old city, though much smaller in population than now, was of far more comparative importance. One travels now from Berlin to Vienna, via Dresden and Prague; but not so then, for men at that time journeyed to these two cities, now but way stations between more important points. The nobility and the rich had post horses, and their own bought or hired carriages; the poorer classes rarely journeyed beyond the neighboring villages, or to the next provincial capital, and, when they did, they made their way on foot, or with the aid of the common carriers by whom the commerce of the country was carried on. Theatrical companies passed from place to place with their own wagons and animals, like travelling circuses now, and many an allusion in the novels and tales of the last century finds herein its explanation. Artists very commonly travelled in the train of some prince or noble; the number was not great of those who could travel in their own equipage. Gluck, called to Italy or Paris to bring out an opera, would have the means given him to travel respectably. So too Mozart, going to Munich to write Idomeneo, or to Prague to compose Titus.

At certain seasons of the year, young Gyrowetz would see a great concourse of strangers. At one time, when merchants and traders congregated from all quarters; at another, when the Bohemian nobility assembled at their capital, and the political and fashionable "season" began.

But, as a rule, there would be little to call his thoughts out into a world lying beyond the walls of the city and its theatres, and music would fill up the hours not devoted to his duties as tutor and student. That the young man at this time had an excellent practical musical education, is clear,—like Joseph Haydn when at the same age.

But out of money, and in feeble health, Gyrowetz must give up his jurisprudence and seek a situation, which will give him a subsistence. His musical attainments introduced him to the Count of Fünfkirchen, who engaged him as secretary. The Count was a passionate lover of music, and engaged no official or servant who could not play an instrument, thus keeping up an orchestra of his own. The opportunity was a rare one for a young composer, and the new secretary knew how to improve it. His first compositions were what in those days were named in musical catalogues "Parthien," corresponding to the "Suites" of Handel and Bach's time. These works were for brass instruments, and were played in summer in the open air; they pleased so much, that he increased the number to twelve, and was induced to try his powers in still higher walks of composition:—half a dozen symphonies, serenades for wind instruments, symphonies concertantes, and finally an opera, both text and music. The latter work he sent to Brunn, where Wenzel Müller then was Kapellmeister. It was returned, with the remark, that the work was not suited to the Brunn stage. [This reference to Müller gives a hint at a date, for his service in Brunn began in 1783 and ended in 1786.]

Count Fünfkirchen spent his winters usually in Brunn, capital of Moravia, whither his secretary accompanied him. The Count's praises induced the Moravian nobility to produce Gyrowetz's symphonies in their weekly concerts, with full orchestra. They were immediately ranked with the best of that period, gained the author high credit, and the advice to try his fortune in Vienna. Besides that sort of acquaintance which a private secretary could make among the nobles, Gyrowetz found two musicians in Brunn, to know whom was of great advantage:—a locally very distinguished violinist, Sauerz, of whom he took lessons for several months, and Gravani, Kapellmeister at the Cathedral, an earnest solid and profound musician, zealous for the truly classical church music, the masses of Haydn and Mozart, then new and not yet in great number, were given there "with great precision." As to the taste in "elegant music"—as G. expresses it—the works most in vogue just then, were the quartets of young Pleyel; the symphonies of Dittersdorf, Hofmeister, &c.; the sonatas of Kozeluch, Maschek, and others,—names now forgotten almost, but at that time as well known in London and Paris, and as much the mode, as in Brunn and Vienna.

In the theatre, Müller gave alternately opera and the spoken drama. The finest concerts were in the house of Count Troyer, a fine player of the horn, and the grand protector of music there; one who spared no expense to keep it in a flourishing condition. His two sons followed his example, Franz being a virtuoso on the English horn, and Ferdinand a remarkable player on the clarinet.

CHAPTER II.

G. in Vienna.—Acquaintance with Haydn, Mozart, &c.—Anecdote of the latter—Mozart's kindness.—Giarnovich. —Prince Esterhazy.—G. enters the service, Musical and Diplomatic, of an Italian Prince.—Parting with Mozart.

At length, Gyrowetz, his finances being in a good condition, through the kindness of Count Fünfkirchen, and well provided with letters of recommendation, journeyed to Vienna.

Two allusions in the interesting reminiscences which follow, serve to fix the date of the visit with reasonable certainty, viz., the performance of one of his symphonies in one of Mozart's six concerts in the Mehlgrube—for the only series of six in that place, which I find in the authorities, were given in January, February, and March, 1785; and his meeting Dittersdorf at von Kees's concerts—for Dittersdorf's Oratorio of Esther was performed for the "Widows' and Orphans' Society" in 1785; his "Job" the next year. The probability—almost certainty—is, that Gyrowetz came to Vienna in 1784; his meeting Göthe proves him to have been in Rome in 1786; and his saying in connection with the production of his symphony, "at that time he was about 18 years old," if the date of his birth be correctly given by him—is a mistake of several years. But when he wrote he was trying to recall events of "sixty years since." But to the reminiscences:

In Vienna, Gyrowetz was introduced into the house of Herr von Kees, who was known as the first musical amateur and dilettante in Vienna, and gave social concerts twice a week at his dwelling, which the most distinguished composers and virtuosos then in the city were in the habit of attending.—Joseph Haydn, Mozart, Dittersdorf, Hofmeister, Albrechtsberger, Giarnovich, &c., &c. Haydn's symphonies were performed there. Mozart for the most part played upon the pianoforte; Giarnovich, then the most famous violin virtuoso, generally performed a concerto, and Madame v. Kees sang.

It happened one evening, that Mozart was late at the concert, and he was long waited for, because he had promised to bring Madam a new song. Several servants were sent out to hunt him up. At last one of them found him in an eating house, and prayed him to come immediately, for every body was waiting and enjoying the new song in anticipation. Mozart then remembered that he had not composed the piece, told the servant to bring him a piece of note paper; having received it, he began then and there to write, and, as soon as finished, took it to the concert, where all were in liveliest expectation. After some good-natured chiding for his long absence, he was most joyfully received. At length he took his place at the piano forte, and Madam sang the new song with a tremulous voice indeed, but it was enthusiastically received and applauded.

At these meetings, Gyrowetz had the good fortune to make the acquaintance of Vienna's most favored masters, by whom he was received and treated in the friendliest and kindest manner. "The best natured of them all seemed to be Mozart; he fixed his eyes upon the still very young Gyrowetz, with such a sympathizing expression of countenance, as if he would say: 'Poor young man, you enter now for the first time the path of the great world, and anxiously await the events of the future, which fate may have in store for you!' This look made a great impression upon the feelings of the young man, and his heart clung to Mozart from that moment. Haydn smiled somewhat sarcastically; Dittersdorf was serious; Albrechtsberger seemed quite indifferent; Giarnovich, a Ragusaner, was rather gloomy, but still quite good-natured. He was born on shipboard in the waters of Ragusa, having in fact no fatherland—but as he was born in those waters, he was generally called 'the Ragusan.' True, he was the most splendid violinist of his time, but not much master of composition, and therefore besought Gyrowetz to set his ritornels and accompaniments for him, which he did, and for which the virtuoso was duly thankful. And thus lived the young man in Vienna, employing his youth with persevering industry, in the higher culture of his talents, in visiting the splendid curiosities of the city, and the most distinguished composers and musicians, in order to hasten his progress through their hints and advice."

To this end he visited Mozart, by whom he was received with the utmost kindness; encouraged by his affability and good nature, Gyrowetz besought him to glance at his youthful works, the six symphonies, and give his opinion of them. Mozart with real humanity granted his prayer, looked the music through, and promised the young author to produce one of them in a concert in the Mehlgrube—of which he was giving a series of six by subscription—which promise was fulfilled on a Thursday. The symphony was performed in the concert hall of the Mehlgrube by the entire theatre orchestra, and received universal applause. Mozart, in the goodness of heart born with him, took the young artist by the hand, and presented him to the audience as author of the symphony. This was Gyrowetz's first public appearance in the artist's path in Vienna, at which time he was about 18 years old. (?) He sold these first six symphonies to his Transparency, the Prince Kraczkowicz, who was a great lover of music, and had his own complete orchestra, with Herr Zizler as director.

The prince had the six symphonies immediately rehearsed, and performed in a concert, to which his Transparency, Prince Esterhazy, and other grand cavaliers and music-lovers were invited, who found them good, and praised them highly. Esterhazy expressed a desire to possess them, and besought Kraczkowicz to give him a copy. The latter had them immediately copied by experts, and gave them, elegantly bound, to Esterhazy, who had them rehearsed and often performed by his own orchestra, led by a certain Tost, "and had much joy therein."

On his way to Pressburg, where he made a visit of a few days—it would seem in the summer of 1785—Gyrowetz stopped at Haimburg, and was presented to Count Batthyani, who also had his own private orchestra, and who purchased the young composer's six symphonies for a handsome price.

Returning to Vienna, he there awaited whatever good chance fate might have in store for him, depending for subsistence partly upon his compositions, and partly upon the kindness of his three brothers. There was at this time a prospect of his being taken into the service of Prince Schwarzenberg, who had an excellent musical establishment, but this was prevented by the intrigues of the first orchestral director. It proved to be no loss to him, for just as this hope failed, the Countess Breuner—her husband was Austrian Ambassador (?) in Venice—then in Vienna, received a letter in behalf of a Prince Raspoli, requesting her to engage a young man for his service, who was both a fine violinist, and fitted by education to act as his secretary. Knowing that Gyrowetz had studied jurisprudence—his violin playing needed no recommendation—the Countess applied to him to know if such a situation would be agreeable! As in those days Italy was the promised land to the young musician, as it now is to the painter and sculptor, and it had long been Gyrowetz's ardent wish to travel thither, he accepted the offer with joy, made his preparations immediately, and paid his parting visits to the many friends he had made in Vienna.

"The day before his departure," says he, "he met by chance the good and noble-hearted Mozart, to whom he again paid his compliments. When he heard that Gyrowetz was really going to Italy he said to him: 'You happy man! Ah, if I could only go with you, how happy I should be! Look you, I must go now and give a lesson, to earn something!' These were the last words he ever said to Gyrowetz. With tears and a hearty pressure of the hands they separated."

La Marseillaise in the French Revolution.

The following passages, from the curious work by Castil-Blaze, "L'Académie Impériale de Musique" are not without interest. In the face of many conflicting opinions, it is difficult to give full credence to the pretty anecdote that tells us how Rouget de l'Isle, in a single evening, wrote the words and music of this famous hymn. Such happy inspirations are possible, but they are rare; and musical as well as literary biographies incline us more and more to believe in the justice of the well-known axiom, that genius is only another name for industry and perseverance.—Yet it is a pity to spoil a romantic story; so we will leave Rouget de l'Isle the benefit of the doubt, and believe, if we can, that the likeness between his hymn and the German air was an improbable, but still possible, accidental coincidence. Hear Castil-Blaze:

"Mme. de Montesson, who was privately married to the duke of Orleans, caused an opera house to be constructed in her hotel in the rue de Provence.—Here the lady figured successfully as authoress, actress and songstress, until the death of the duke in 1785. Here was heard, for the first time in France, a little German air and chorus; an air that ten years later, in 1792, made an immense sensation with the help of the new words that were given to it by Rouget de l'Isle, an officer of genius and education. Gluck's recent triumphs had raised German music to the highest degree of public esteem and admiration, when Julien, Senior, a violoncellist belonging to the Italian theatre, brought out this fine German air at the concerts of Mme. de Montesson. The noble assembly applauded and graciously received a lied that then simply gave its aid to tender and affectionate sentiments, and that did not appear to possess the energetic, almost brutal fierceness, which the thousand-voiced people lent to it, when it was subsequently sung as the Marseillaise."

He afterwards speaks of "La Parisienne":

"Casimir Delavigne wrote words to a miserable German air, unworthy of the country which gave it birth; Nourrit executed this song, and endeavored to fire it with the energy and animation which it did not possess in itself. This air, La Parisienne, in G, with a melody eternally returning to the third of the key, was found monotonous in the extreme; it was almost as bad as an air composed on a single note! 'La Marseillaise' was brought to light again (this was in 1836). Its melody had been corrupted and degraded by musicians who had noted it down without having heard it as originally sung; but they were not satisfied with having rendered trivial the finest passage in the call to arms,—with having made those crawl whom the republican hymn presents to us marching with haughty pride,—with having taught an entire people to sing incorrectly the German canticle which they had adopted as their finest patriotic song;—a medal was struck in honor of Rouget de l'Isle, author of the words, and this lying bronze reproduced 'La Marseillaise', blotted and spoiled by the errors of these ignoramuses! It is singular that Germany has furnished us with airs for two revolutions. The last, in 1848, was content to sing the old repertory over again."

Theatrical managers, on the lookout for novelties, might take a hint from the following account of the production of 'La Marseillaise' at the opera in Sept. 1792.

"Gardel and Gossec produced 'La Marseillaise' in action on the grand stage of the opera, in an intermezzo, entitled 'An offering to Liberty.' This famous German hymn, with Rouget de l'Isle's words, which had rung throughout France, now triumphed in a more brilliant manner on the stage. A crowd of soldiers, women and children, and twenty well mounted cavaliers, hurried on the stage at the first trumpet call. Varied and picturesque groups were formed at the conclusion of each verse. The last, 'Amour sacré de la patrie', was sung slowly, in a low voice, as a hymn, by women alone, while the spectators, actors, and even the horses, knelt down with one accord before Liberty, represented by Mlle. Maillard, placed on a little mountain, a necessary accessory in such ceremonies. It was really a fine sight to see the noble chargers, right and left, obediently bending the knees, while their riders saluted with arms and colors. At the pause before the last 'aux armes!' the voices and instruments ceased, and a long silence ensued. Then the loud cries of the clarions called on the defenders of the country; the tocsin sounded; twenty drums beat the alarm; cannon reports were heard in the distance; the actors rose, brandishing their arms; the cavalry formed on the sides and summit of the mountain; and an overwhelming crowd, rushing on the stage, with arms and torches, trumpeted forth in vigorous chorus the refrain, 'aux armes, citoyens!' This dramatic effect was inconceivably grand and inspiring, and obtained a success that beggars description."

This dramatic effect was produced two years later, on a colossal scale in the open air, by order of the National Convention, in celebration of Jourdan's victory. An army of musicians was employed, as every male and female singer and instrumentist in Paris had been commanded to assist. But at the moment when prolonged peals of cannon mingled their thunder with the final chorus, the five hundred thousand auditors, electrified by so prodigious an effect, imagining that the always secretly dreaded counter-revolution was let loose, were seized with a panic, and precipitated themselves in disorderly masses over and through every boundary; an immense loss of life was the result.

Music in St. Petersburg.

From the Niederrheinische Musik-Zeitung. (Translated for the London Musical World).

It may, perhaps, be interesting, from the following programmes of the ten concerts given in St. Petersburg by the Musical Society of Russia, and which took place last season, under the direction of Anton Rubinstein, to learn something of the direction pursued by concert-music in the native land of Glinka, Onlibischeff and Rubinstein himself. Any notice of the Italian Opera, which is the same here as everywhere else, would probably be superfluous and wearisome.

Here are the programmes in question—First Concert: Mendelssohn's overture to the Hebriden;

Fantasia on Russian songs, for orchestra and chorus, by K. N. Liadof; pianoforte Concerto in D minor, by J. S. Bach; Schumann's music to Manfred; Beethoven's Symphony No. 4.—Second Concert: Beethoven's overture to Coriolanus; Hymn for contralto with chorus, Op. 96, by Mendelssohn; D major Symphony by Mozart; F minor pianoforte Concerto by Chopin; songs with the piano; Overture to Russian und Ludmilla, by Glinka.—Third Concert: "Rhapsodie Hongroise" (scored by Ch. Schuberth), Franz Schubert; Chorus from the oratorio of Jephtha, by Handel; Concerto for violin by Viotti; Symphony movement by Gusakowsky; Chorus (a capella) by Carissimi; Symphony in E flat major by Schumann.—Fourth Concert: Overture to Anacreon, by Cherubini; Cantata, "Bleibe bei uns," by J. The Conservatory was opened under the direction of Anton Rubinstein, on the 8th September, 1862. The number of pupils of both sexes this year is 175, including persons of various ages and of all classes of society without exception. The pupils are taught everything relating to the musical art, in addition to which those who desire it receive instruction in Russian, German and Italian language and literature, history, geography, mathematics, religion, calligraphy, and music-copying. The inclusive terms for each pupil are 100 roubles annually, payable in two half-yearly sums of 50 roubles each in advance. The pupil is at liberty to leave the Conservatory at the end of six months, if he chooses. There could not be a public examination this year, but there was a private one, which augured excellently for the future.—The Moscow Filial Society, also, has every reason to be satisfied this year; there, too, certain classes have been established, such for instance as a vocal class, and an elementary class. The first thing the directors of the St. Petersburg Conservatory wish to do is to found similar branch establishments in the most important cities of the Empire; but their project must remain in abeyance until the Conservatory can turn out musicians capable of conducting the concerts and fulfilling the duties of professors in the schools the parent society wishes to found.

London.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.—The fifth season terminated on Monday night with a concert for the benefit of Mr. Arthur Chappell, who, as founder and director of the Monday Popular Concerts, has deserved as well of the musical public as any spectator ever contributing to its entertainment. The audience was just as crowded and brilliant as that which filled every part of St. James's hall at the concert on the Monday previous, for the benefit of Mr. Sims Reeves, who, as a public favorite, yields to no contemporary. In the books of words was inserted an address to the patrons of the Monday Popular Concerts, so much to the purpose, and so free from every taint of puffery and self-laudation, that we have no hesitation in giving it increased publicity:—

"On terminating the fifth season, the director merely deems it expedient to tender his thanks to the musical public for the continued and liberal support with which his undertaking has been honored. The Monday Popular Concerts were instituted in 1859, and the first performance took place in St. James's hall on the 14th of February in that year. During the first season 14 concerts were given; during the second, 27; during the third, 23; during the fourth, 27; and during the fifth (including this evening's entertainment), 29—the largest number ever combined in one series. These, with the addition of 11, held in Manchester, Liverpool, &c., under the same direction, made 131 concerts since the commencement. The director believes his kind patrons will be gratified to know that the season just expired—in spite of disadvantages more or less prejudicial to every public speculation—has been as uniformly successful as the last. He is thus enabled to proceed with a conviction that the permanency of the Monday Popular Concerts is guaranteed upon the firmest and most substantial basis, and to announce that they will continue to be carried on in the same spirit in which they were begun. The 132nd concert will take place early in November.—St. James's Hall, July 6, 1863."

The fact of 131 performances of any kind of music, on a regularly defined plan, having taken place within so short a period, and having attracted audiences averaging from 1,500 to 2,000, is in itself unprecedented. Still more remarkable, however, does it appear, when it is remembered that the instrumental part of the programmes has been always exclusively devoted to the chamber music—quintets, quartets, trios, sonatas, fugues, "suites," &c.—of the great masters. For these there had never been supposed to exist a really "popular" audience; but Mr. Arthur Chappell has convincingly proved that such an audience was to be found, not merely from time to time—at a spurt as it were—but for nine months in the year. True the fame of the Monday Popular Concerts has spread far and wide, and people come from all parts of the country to hear them; yet their staple support is indisputably centered in the capital and its environs; and it is to the population of London that the director must mainly look for the permanent prosperity of his institution. Four years ago, even the quartets of Haydn and Mozart—to say nothing of those of Beethoven, Mendelssohn, and other masters—were known only to a select few. Amateurs played them in private (how, for the most part, we need hardly say); and a distinguished circle was persuaded into a love for them, more or less real, by the indefatigable Mr. Ella, whose Musical Union has been in an equal degree an advantage to his subscribers and himself. Now, however, these noble works of art are being gradually revealed to that large "mixed" multitude which forms the real, if unacknowledged moral strength of the commercial metropolis of the world. Mr. Chappell should (and doubtless will) bear in mind that the object of his concerts is not to divert a jaded minority, to whom every thing is to a certain extent familiar, and to a certain extent a bore, but to instruct and entertain the great middle class of the community. Experimentalizing with new works, from unacknowledged pens, would, on his part, be the worst policy. He must carefully train his patrons to be connoisseurs—which they can only arrive at through gradual stages; and the way to do this is to introduce to them, year by year, those works which the best judges have admitted to be "classical." The programme of Monday night, for instance, contained a superb quartet by Haydn (in B minor—No. 2, Op. 54), with which it is probable not 10 persons out of the 2,000 present were acquainted. Ought such a work to be consigned to oblivion because it was written three quarters of a century ago? Assuredly not. When the audiences of the Monday Popular Concerts are well versed in Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Spohr, and Weber (Handel and Bach understood), they may be fairly asked to decide upon the merits of some contemporary work, even by a hitherto untried hand—but not till then. Musical compositions do not enjoy the same advantage as paintings, which may be seen, and poems, which may be recited or read, with, on the whole, a fair average chance of being understood. Scarcely one person in a thousand is capable of reading, or deciphering at first sight, a musical score; and the sole means of appreciating the merits of a composer is to hear his works performed by competent artists. Thus the true "classics" of music labor under a serious disadvantage, and as they are calculated to exercise as healthy an influence as those belonging to other departments of human ingenuity and industry, any institution which, like the Monday Popular Concerts, is instrumental in spreading a knowledge of and a taste for them, merits the good opinion of all who believe that the manifestations of genuine art are intended for the good of mankind at large.

The programme on Monday night consisted, for the most part, of pieces with which these admirable entertainments have made the public familiar, and was, therefore, judiciously prepared for such a special event as the director's benefit and last concert of the season. The quartets were Mendelssohn in D (Op. 44), and Haydn in B minor—already alluded to. The players were MM. Leopold Auer, L. Ries, Schreurs, and Piatti. M. Auer, a violinist, though young, of the very highest rank, made his first appearance at the Monday Popular Concerts on this occasion, but—considering the applause bestowed upon his performances—assuredly not the last. For solo he selected Beethoven's Romance in F (Op. 50), which he played admirably—to the irreproachable pianoforte accompaniment of Mr. Benedict. There were (as usual at the director's benefit) two pianists—Madame Arabella Goddard and Mr. Charles Hallé—both of whom have played prominent parts at these concerts from the beginning. Each performed a solo—Madame Goddard the popular suite de pieces by Handel, containing variations on the "Harmonious Blacksmith" (encored); Mr. Hallé a selection from Beethoven's charming Bagatelles (re-called); and the two joining in the brilliant duet for two pianofortes, composed by Mendelssohn and Moscheles, on the Gipsy March from Weber's Preliodes, which, though written more than 30 years ago, is as fresh and vigorous as though it had been written yesterday. The other instrumental display comprised the well-known Prélude, Sarabande and Gavotte, for violoncello, of John Sebastian Bach, which Signor Piatti (who was of course the violoncellist) has rendered as popular as the "Harmonious Blacksmith" or the "Moonlight Sonata." The singers were Madame Sainton-Dolby, Miss Banks, and Mr. Sims Reeves. Madame Sainton gave Cherubini's "O salutaris hostia"—the piece, by the way, in which she made her début at the Philharmonic Concerts—and Haydn's "Spirit Song" (encored); to Miss Banks were allotted Schubert's and Shakespeare's "Hark! hark! the Lark at Heaven's gate sings" (encored), with another "Lark" by the Russian Glinka; to Mr. Sims Reeves, Mozart's "Dalla sua pace" (encored), and a charming new song—"Sing, maiden, sing," by Professor Sterndale Bennett (encored). Mr. Benedict was accompanist at the piano forte. Altogether this concert was one of the most delightful and well conducted musical entertainments ever given in St. James's hall—or, indeed, elsewhere.—Mus. World.

OPERA.—The next promised novelty at her Majesty's was Weber's Oberon, with really a famous cast viz: Tietjens, Alboni, Trebelli, Volpini, Louise Michal, Bettini, Santley, Gassior and Sims Reeves, who had been especially engaged for the part of Sir Huon, but who first made his appearance as Edgardo in Lucia (July 8), of which the Times says:

A better choice could hardly have been made. It was as Edgardo—in 1847, when the late M. Julien opened Drury Lane Theatre as an English Opera—that Mr. Sims Reeves first gained a reputation with the English public as a dramatic vocalist. Since then, he has, through assiduous perseverance, backed by singular natural gifts, risen to the highest rank in his profession, and acquired a mastery of so many styles that he may at this moment be fairly cited as a singer, in varied accomplishments, without a rival. The artist who shines as Mr. Reeves has shone in the great oratorios of Handel, Haydn, Mendelssohn, and Spohr, who sings the "Death of Nelson," or "The Bay of Biscay," as well as the elder Braham, who is thoroughly at home in the chamber music of Mozart, Beethoven, and the other great composers, who imparts an irresistible charm to the humblest English ballad, and who at the same time makes such a figure in the loftier walks of Italian opera as to place him side by side with the most eminent representatives of that particularly attractive school, exhibits a versatility of power, a variety of resources, and a pliability of talent of which but few instances can be cited. It is not, however, our present task to dilate upon the qualifications to which the great English tenor is indebted for his extraordinary popularity, and the esteem in which he is held by musicians. We have merely to record, in a word, the entire success of his performance of Edgardo at Her Majesty's Theatre. His conception of the part was admirable, and his execution of the music faultless. Seldom has an Edgardo appeared entering with more earnestness into every situation, making more of every point, embodying, in short, with more poetical completeness the character of Lucia's chivalrous and romantic lover. To say nothing of the duet with the heroine, in the first act, and the renowned "Fra poco"—delivered with exquisite feeling—in the last, the Contract scene (finale to Act II.) was a masterpiece of dramatic singing, the famous "Maledizione" being declaimed with a passionate intensity that brought out all its meaning. The audience were enthusiastic, and recalled Mr. Reeves at the end of every act,—twice, indeed, after the third and last.

Mademoiselle Titiens has, perhaps, never sung the music of Lucia more brilliantly, or acted the part with more genuine truth and sensibility.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.—The eighth and last concert of the present (the 51st) season took place, June 25, (Hanover Square Rooms). The programme is subjoined:—

PART I.—Symphony in C, No. 1; Mozart. Aria, "Pieta, Figliore;" Stradella. Fantasia Appassionata, Violoncello; J. Rietz. Aria, "Deh, vieni," (Nozze di Figaro); Mozart. Overture (A Midsummer Night's Dream); Mendelssohn.

PART II.—Symphony Eroica; Beethoven. Duetto (La Favorita); Donizetti. Sonata Pastorale, accompanied on the Piano; Tartini. Overture (Guillaume Tell); Rossini. Conductor—Professor Sterndale Bennett, Mus. D.

"The Philharmonic Society, (says the Daily News) has existed more than half a century. During that long period it has pursued its primary object with undeviating consistency and uniform success. This object has been the cultivation of orchestral music by the study and performance of the symphonic works of the great masters. With this view an instrumental orchestra was formed and organized—a band at that time unequalled in Europe; and it is an unquestioned fact, that within a year or two of the commencement of its labors the symphonies of Beethoven, the great colossus of the orchestra, were generally known and better understood in London than even in any part of Germany, the land of the composer's birth. But the attention of the Philharmonic Society has not been confined to the works in existence at the time of its foundation. It has kept pace with the progress of orchestral music; and it is to the direct encouragement and stimulus given not only to the genius of Beethoven, but also to his greatest successors, Spohr and Mendelssohn, that the world owes some of the greatest of their works. But the Philharmonic Society, in thus bringing forward new compositions, has been careful to ascertain that they were worthy of being brought forward. This, which has been a cause of the society's success, has often been made a charge against it. The society has been accused of neglecting its duty of encouraging young (and especially native) composers by performing their works. The answer plainly, is, that the society has never acknowledged such a duty. Its purpose has always been to make the public acquainted with the greatest works of art through the medium of the best possible execution. The programmes of the Philharmonic Concerts during the last fifty years show the production of many orchestral works—symphonies, overtures, and concertos—by English composers; but none of these were admitted till it was ascertained by careful trial that they were worthy of the honor. Many have refused, and hence much irritation, resentment and blame on the part of the aggrieved composers and their friends; but the society, in spite of obloquy, has adhered to its principle of action, and it has been well for the society itself, and the progress of music in this country, that it has pursued a firm and consistent course. Of late years circumstances are greatly changed, and the Philharmonic Society has to contend with difficulties unknown before. The progress in orchestral performance has been greater than in any other branch of the musical art. Formerly, the Philharmonic Society stood alone; now it has more than one rival, and there are other orchestras not inferior to the Philharmonic. It has also to contend with that formidable difficulty—cheapness. The public can hear the music performed at its concerts, given elsewhere, for a quarter of the money. For these reasons the fall of the Philharmonic Society has often been predicted—by its enemies with exultation, by its friends with apprehension. But enemies and friends have been disappointed alike. The Philharmonic Society stands its ground against the utmost efforts of competition and rivalry. Far from sinking into decay, it is now stronger, richer, more active, more vigorous in its management than when it was five-and-twenty years younger."

KÖNIGSBERG FESTIVAL. The musical festival which took place in this far northern outpost of German civilization, last June, must have been one of the most interesting of the many German festivals of this summer, at least judging from the programme. It was arranged under the auspices of the Musical Academy of the place, being the third which it has given at intervals of two years. A Berlin paper has the following account of it.

The executants consisted of the numerous chorus, and the instrumentalists of the Academy, besides the additional forces of the Sängerverein, local orchestras and amateurs, as likewise a contingent from four provincial towns. The solos were sung by Mlle. Anna Becky, from Berlin (a pupil of Stern's), soprano; Mlle. Pochmann, from the theatre here, contralto; Herr J. Schild, from Leipzig (a pupil of Herr Götz's), tenor; and Herr Simons, from the opera here, bass. All the ladies and gentlemen named executed their task very satisfactorily. The place in which the performances came off was the Muscovite Hall (which holds more than 5000 persons) in the Royal Palace. The acoustic qualities of the hall were good only as far as the middle of it, but then it was at most only two-thirds full.

The proceedings of the first day, under the direction of Herr Laudien, began with the setting of the 100 Psalm by Handel, a somewhat stiff, but, for all that, very sterling contrapuntal work. It produced a rather cold though elevating effect, and acted as a vigorous musical introductory speech. Beethoven's Ninth (Choral) Symphony followed. The first two movements, allegro and scherzo, were, unfortunately, taken at somewhat too rapid a pace. . . .

The last movement with chorus passed over, wonderful to relate, without the usual ill-luck, nay, more, with a certainty for which the members of the various Königsberg choruses, who executed this part of the programme without the aid of singers from other places, and the conductor, deserved praise. After this, Mendelssohn's "Walpurgisnacht" appeared almost like child's play; there seemed to be no difficulties in it, and all the vocal part went splendidly. The orchestra, however, was not always in tune.—The effect of the work was exceedingly favorable.

On the second day we had detached orchestral pieces, solos, and choruses for male voices. The "Suite in D" by Sebastian Bach, and Cherubini's overture to Anacoreta, opened respectively the first and second part of the concert. The pieces executed by the Männergesangsverein, under the direction of Herr Hamma, were Schubert's "Nachtgesang im Walde," and Schumann's "Glück von Edenhall" (Uhland). Beethoven's G major Concerto, for piano and full band, played by Herr Anton Rubenstein, afforded the public a great treat. Mlle. Anna Becky sang Beethoven's oft-heard air, "Ah, perfido!"—

When shall we have a new concert air? I wish a prize were offered for one! Herr Schild made an excellent selection in the air, "Nur ein Wunsch," from Gluck's Iphigenie auf Tauris. To wind up, Schumann's duet for two pianofortes, "Thema und Variationen," was performed by Herr Adolph Jensen (1st part), and Herr Anton Rubenstein.

On the third day, Herr Rubinstein conducted his own oratorio, Das verlorenen Paradies (Paradise Lost), founded upon Milton. The work produced an electrical effect—as might have been expected, a universal feeling of enthusiasm having been previously spread through all the musical circles of the town by the members of the chorus during the rehearsals, which, by the way, were admirably conducted by Herr Laudien. The first part contains the division of good and bad into the hosts of Heaven and Hell, led on by the Archangels and Satan; the second part portrays the Creation, and the celebration of its beauty; while the third depicts the fall, the banishment from Paradise, and the repentance of the sinful pair. The chorus has a great deal to do; Satan, "a voice" (that of God), as well as Abdiel, have, however, important parts. The composer-conductor—who was warmly greeted at the conclusion—expressed himself in terms of unqualified praise, especially to the chorus.

BADEN-BADEN.—Viewed from a musical point of view, the present season will, perhaps, be the most brilliant ever known. In all probability there will be produced three new operas: Nahal (or Narhal), a fantastic opera in three acts by Ed. Plonvier, music H. Litolf; La Fille de l'Orfèvre, grand opera by M.M. Lery and Fousier, music by Edmund Mombrière; and Volage et folâtre, comic opera by M. F. Louvage, music by J. P. Rosenhain. In addition to these novelties, La Colombe, by M. Gounod; Béatrix et Bénédicte; and some half-dozen other operas will be performed.

EMS.—The season has commenced under brilliant auspices. The Kursaal is already filled with the élite of European fashion. At the concert on the 9th June, there were upwards of 1,200 visitors present. The following artists are engaged for the concerts in August:—Mmes. Cabel, Arlot, Rosa Kastner, M.M. Servais, Vivier, Batta, Alard, Haumann, Blaes, Sebeau, etc.

DRESDEN.—The hundredth anniversary of Mehul's birth will be celebrated by a special performance of his opera, Jacob und seine Söhne.

STAGE-STATISTICS IN GERMANY.—According to the Sigmal, the number of persons employed in the various theatres of Germany, amount, in round number, to the sum total of 6000. There are more than 200 towns which boast, at least for some months in the year, of possessing a theatre. There are 23 Court Theatres, to which may be added two enjoying subventions from government, namely the Neustrelitz Theatre and the Oldenburg Theatre. All the other theatres are private speculations. Berlin possesses eight theatres; Vienna, six (or now, since the burning down of the Treumann theatre, only five); Hamburg, four; Munich, four; Dresden, Hanover and Cologne, one each. There are German Theatres in foreign countries; Amsterdam and Rotterdam have two each; while Gothenburg, Paris, St. Petersburg, Riga, Reva, and Helingsfors have one each. The extreme points in the Austrian dominions where German Theatres exist, are probably, Hermannstadt in Transylvania; Esseg, in Slavonia; Cilli, in Styria; and Lugos, in Hungary. Switzerland has German Theatres in Basle, Berne, St. Gallen, and Zurich; and America, in New York, Cincinnati, New Orleans, San Francisco, etc.—There were far more than a thousand "starring" engagements of a short duration at the above mentioned theatres in the course of a year, and the number of novelties produced exceeded nine hundred.

The Music Hall Organ.

This great work, really one of the world's wonders in its way, is now rapidly day by day growing up into magnificent completeness in the place, where it is destined ere long to astonish and delight both eye and ear. It may well be imagined that it is a great work, when it is considered that it is costing nearly five months' labor of one of its builders, with four of his own workmen, besides an assistant of the makers of the case (or organ-house, as the Germans call it), with a strong group of carpenters, merely to set up what has already cost the greater part of seven years in the construction.

Few persons have a conception of how much goes to the making of a Great Organ, or of what a complicated wealth of ingenuity and patience, results of experience handed down for ages and still accumulating, happy strokes of genius to get over difficulties, are contained in it. Fewer still are ready to accept the fact that this organ of the Boston Music Hall is on so large and so complete a scale, that it cannot with certainty be said that any organ in the world, with the one exception of that in the Münster at Ulm (by the same makers) exceeds it in size; and that it is actually much larger than the famous ones at Haarlem and Freiburg; in fact larger than the great one in St. George's Hall, Liverpool, which nominally shows a greater list of stops. We do not, however, make the assertion absolutely that our organ has but one superior in size; since it is not a very easy matter to agree upon a common measure of the size of organs; one of sixty stops may, by the superior power and grandeur of these stops, be really greater than another that has ninety. We have hitherto been under the impression that the new Organ had at least three or four rivals or superiors in size in the Old World; but, on more careful inquiry, we are truly at a loss to find one, besides its own elder brother there in Ulm, which can with certainty, and before such critical comparison as we have not the means for, be pronounced greater, or as great, in point of magnitude; while, in respect to excellence of workmanship, perfection of design, the number of the latest and best mechanical inventions which it embodies, the admirable distribution and harmonious apportionment of its contents,—in a word, in power to answer (under fit bands) all the true demands which music ever made or can make on an organ, there are abundant guaranties that it is the best work which has been produced or can be produced by the organ building art down to this day.

We are not at liberty, nor is it yet the time, to enter into any full description of this work, the crowning work of E. F. Walcker & Co., of Ludwigsburg. But we will give some general outline of its contents.

1. It has a grand and rich foundation of Pedal stops or registers, all running through, from the great C, to F, two octaves and a half, or 30 notes. The pedal windchests support 20 distinct registers, three of which are of 32 feet tone (one open, full length, with six of its greatest pipes in pure tin displayed in two great central towers in front; one with reeds; and one a mixture of five ranks reproducing the ground-tone (32 ft.) from its harmonics); besides six 16 ft. stops, six 8 ft., and so on. Six of these stops, however, are separately classed as Piano or Soft Pedal, and are placed in the Swell box, among them two of 16 ft.

2. The First (or Great) Manual (all the manuals run from 8 ft. C to a in alt, 68 notes), contains 25 stops, of which four are of 16 ft., seven of 8 ft., with due proportion of fifths, thirds, mixtures, &c.

3. The Swell, which is the second Manual in importance, has 18 stops, (besides the 6 already mentioned in the Pedal). One of 16 ft., seven of 8 ft. &c.

4. The Third (Choir) Manual has 15 stops; one of 16 ft., seven of 8 ft., and so on.

5. The Fourth (or Solo) Manual has 11 stops, including a 16 ft. Bourdon; an 8 ft. Gamba of pure tin; an Æoline of singular delicacy and beauty; a Vox Humana; Vox Angelica; Corno Bassetto; Gemshorn, &c.

Here we have a total of 89 speaking registers. (The Organ at Ulm has 100; that at Haarlem from 70 to 75; that at Freiburg about 60.) These are of every variety of fine and reed stop, wood and metal—in most instances the purest English tin. But it is comparatively easy to run up a great list of stops; the richness, truth and grandeur of this organ lie in the fact that it has so ample and superb a substratum of great bases, such a plentiful abundance of unison, sub-octave, octave, super-octave stops, to balance and absorb fifths, mixtures, sesquialters, &c., so that they shall not arraign out with half discordant prominence, but dash with piquancy and richness the well-proportioned mighty pyramid of sounds, built up upon the model of Nature's own harmonies, which we know are generated with the vibrations of a single deep ground tone.

We might speak of the proportion of the reed tones to the others, of the full band of reed stops, symmetrically complete in itself, while the rest of the organ, apart from the reeds, makes up a complete whole; of the marked individuality, as well as the absence of mere sentimental fancy, in all these several registers; of the exhaustless means of coupling and combining one class with another, or with several, or with all; of the great crescendo and diminuendo pedal, whereby from a single soft stop may be brought in, one by one, all the voices of all five departments of the organ, and vice versa, at the will of the performer; of the separate swell and tremulant for the Vox humana and the Physharmonica; and of other admirable resources, too numerous to mention, and which the expertest organist will only by much searching and much practice fully find out. And still there will remain the organ house, the case, with its superb architectural symmetry, its costly carvings in black walnut of colossal caryatides, columns, arches, its St. Cecilia, and bust of Bach, and boy angels playing instruments, and all the wealth of more minute and delicate designs and groupings,—in itself as great a triumph, perhaps, of the art of decorative architecture, as the interior mechanism is of organ-building.

While the music-makers are not doing much to speak of in this dog-day weather, the music-dealers are taking counsel together, conspiring as well as perspiring, so that music will most surely increase and be multiplied. The annual meeting of the American Board of Music Trade (an assemblage of publishers from all parts of the country), was held at the Tremont House, in this city, on the 5th instant. Going to press a day earlier than usual, on account of the National Thanksgiving, we can only say at present that the business meeting was, very naturally and wisely, considering the towering rage of the thermometer, just now a sworn foe to all business and music, adjourned for a day to allow the members to seek rest, cool breezes, and whatever else pertains, at Point Shirley.

THE BELLS OF ANTWERP might be called the bells, so closely do they keep up with the latest fashions. Witness the following from a correspondent of the Evening Post (our own Verdi-loving "Trovator," if we mistake not):

The noblest music in Antwerp is rained down from the famous spire of the cathedral, where over eighty bells have for two hundred years or more chimed from their home amid the stone lace-work of the tower, over the roofs of the quaint, clean old city, and far over the flat green fields "marked by long rows of poplars" which border the Scheldt. Once a year—in the month of February—the city authorities select the music, and during 1863 the chimes play at every hour a selection from Verdi's "Lombardi," at the half hour strains from Gounod's "Faust," while shorter passages mark the quarter hours, and even each five minutes is remembered in a few silvery tones. Last year the "Fille du Régiment" and "Si j'étais roi" provided the music, which falls from the spire of the Antwerp cathedral as delicately and sweetly as the "angel footsteps that tinkled o'er the tatted floor."

Here is another "Belgian giant" of a story:

The skeleton of a musician (there was a copper tube by his side) has been dug up at Blankenberghe, near Brussels. The skeleton was eight feet long and had been buried for 6,000 years—so it is supposed.

OPERA NEXT SEASON. The Philadelphia Evening Bulletin has the following:

Already arrangements have been made by the Directors of the Academy of Music of this city, which promises that the next musical season will be a very brilliant one. The house has been engaged for the month of November by Carl Anschütz, who will bring with him a German company much better than that which gave so much satisfaction last season.—He has an agent now in Europe in search of several first-class artists. Immediately after the German season, Max Maretzek will begin an engagement of a fortnight or more, with his very fine opera company, which has made such a sensation at Havana and New York. The great dramatic vocalist, Mme. Medori, and the young and splendid tenor, Mazzoleni, will be of the company. The opera of Ione, or "The Last Days of Pompeii," by Petrella, will be in the repertoire of the company, besides several other operas never heard here. Petrella, it is said, has written a new opera, which will be first played in this country. As to the subsequent engagements of the Academy, we are not informed that any have been made. But November and December will certainly give us rich musical treats. Mr. Grau is in Europe, seeking artists to add to his company, and we presume they will visit Philadelphia in the course of the winter.

A New York paper says:

Mr. Julius Eichberg, of Boston, the composer of the "Doctor of Alcantara" and "Rose of Tyrol," has been in New York during the week, winning friends by his genial face and gentlemanly manner, as he had before done with baton and score. We commend him to the kindness and courtesy of such members of the press and of the musical profession as he may meet, confident that the advantage in the acquaintance will not be all on his side. We learn with pleasure, by the way, that Mr. and Miss Richings will probably bring out both the operas named, at an early day, in an engagement in N. York; and with no less pleasure we understand that Mr. Eichberg has in hand not less than two other light operas, one at least of which may be expected to be presented to the musical public within the coming year.

IZYDOR LOTTO. We had the pleasure, when we were in Leipzig (March, 1861), of listening to this remarkable young violinist, who is now astonishing the Londoners. Old professor Moscheles, who sat by our side at the time, remarked that nothing else that he had ever heard approached so nearly to Paganini. The Illustrated News of the World, July 11th, says:

The remarkable success recently achieved by the young Polish violinist, M. Lotto, at the Crystal Palace concerts, constitutes one of the leading topics of conversation in musical circles. M. Lotto made his first appearance on Saturday, the 13th of June, and created such an extraordinary sensation that the directors secured his services on the spot for two more of the Saturday Concerts, and subsequently engaged him to play every day for an entire week; thereby not only proving their sense of his merit, but showing that he was an unusual attraction. Probably not one of the company who attended the concert at the Crystal Palace, in which the young violinist made his first appearance, had ever heard the name of Lotto, or had ever seen it before they read it in the announcements. It was natural, therefore, that inquiries should be made as to who and what M. Lotto was, and that curiosity should be largely excited. We are enabled to lay before our readers a brief sketch of M. Lotto's career from his earliest youth.

Izydor Lotto was born at Warsaw on the 22nd of December, 1840, and is consequently twenty-three years of age. His father was a musician, and belonged to the humbler ranks of life. Before the little Izydor was four years old he displayed an extraordinary precocity and aptitude for music, and his father gave him all the instruction that lay in his power, principally directing his studies to playing the violin, of which he himself was a professor. Izydor learned rapidly, and at eleven years of age had excited astonishment and delight in all who heard him, not only by the brilliancy and perfection of his mechanism, but by the purity of his tone, the freedom of his bowing, and his great command of expression, most uncommon in one of his years. By the advice of his friends—who, it may be added, subscribed more than words towards the advancement of the young violinist—Izydor's father sent him to the Paris Conservatoire, where he studied under M. Massart, the celebrated professor of the violin, for several years. At the age of twelve, when his first year had just been completed, Izydor carried off the first prize for violin-playing, an honor which can be only estimated at its full value by a knowledge of the number of competitors who enter for the Conservatoire prizes and the amount of talent displayed at the trials.

At the age of eighteen Izydor Lotto had finished his education at the Conservatoire, which, in addition to his violin-practice, comprised studies in harmony, counterpoint, fugue, and composition. His violin-playing had already won the admiration of all the connoisseurs connected with the great musical establishment in the French capital. His future was now in his own hands, and, determined to try his fortune in the world, he set out on a tour through Europe. He first made the circuit of France. Thence he went to Germany, Holland, and Belgium, and subsequently proceeded to Spain and Portugal. His progress was attended everywhere with honor and emolument. He was decorated with the Order of Merit by the Duke of Saxe-Meiningen and the King of Portugal, and was appointed solo violinist to the King of Portugal and the Grand Duke of Saxe-Weimar.

MR. LYMAN W. WHEELER, who went from here about three years ago, to pursue his musical studies in Italy, has just returned to this city. He appeared at La Scala Theatre in Milan, with decided success. So fine a tenor will be an acquisition to our next musical season.

GOUNOD'S "FAUST." We have already copied various opinions of this now famous opera,—among others that of Davison in the Musical World (London). What the same Davison saith in the Times thereof, is also worth reading:

Thanks to Mons. Gounod, the French, or rather Parisian, idea of Faust—Goethe's Faust, not the legend which a greater composer (Spohr) than Mons. Gounod set to music half a century since—is making its way throughout the length and breadth of Europe. The Germans themselves are becoming more and more familiarized with the chief personages, the startling incidents, and even a portion of the philosophic thought of that grand poem, that wonderful effort of imagination and of art, which alone has placed them, as an intellectually productive people, on a level with the nation that owns Shakespeare and Milton among its sons; and this, through the instrumentality of a French lyric melodrama, no more like the Faust of Goethe than the Otello "put in music" by another composer (Rossini) greater than Mons. Gounod is like the Otello of our own immortal bard. A more striking example of the influence of music over the mind and intelligence of modern Europe could hardly be cited. Had the original piece concocted by Messrs. Michel Carfé and Jules Barbier been translated and brought out in Germany as a mere drama, it would not have been tolerated. The spirit of intellectual nationality would have cried out against it as a desecration. But the muse now most courted in the land of beer and pipes and metaphysics—the gentle Enterpe—was enlisted to excuse and sanctify this sacrilege by the aid of her melodiously persuasive tongue. A lyre was suspended to the neck of the maimed Goethe; and lo! he was metamorphosed into a wandering minstrel, hobbling while he sang, but singing with such eloquence that his compatriots were induced to overlook the defect in his gait for the flow and smoothness of his numbers. After making the Greek Sappho more or less of an infliction, the Medecin malgré lui of Molière a sombre lyric comedy (an opera malgré le mélodrame), Philémon et Baucis prolix shepherds, and Mon-Lewis's too famous romance a dull pasticcio, Mons. Gounod conceived the happy idea of taking the French Faust as the subject of an opera, and thus a bond from the most respectably unpopular, to become the most respectably popular of actual French composers. Never was a series of quasi-failures (the free translation of succès d'estime) more triumphantly redeemed by an éclatant succès—a success which even the subsequent lugubrious hebraisms of the Reine de Saba, in setting which Mons. Gounod can scarcely be allowed to have exhibited the wisdom of Solomon, were unable in any way to disturb. However musicians and musical connoisseurs may differ—and differ they do—with regard to the merits of Faust, it is unquestionably the opera of the last ten years which has found the greatest number of admirers; not excepting even Signor Verdi's Il Trovatore, with which, we feel no inclination to compare it.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, JULY 23.—We had on Wednesday evening, here in New York, a performance which, for the extraordinary bad taste showed in the selection of pieces, deserves notice. It was a Grand Organ Exhibition and Concert, gotten up for the express purpose of showing off an extremely fine organ, just built by the Messrs. Odell Bros. of this city for the 25th St. South Baptist Church. I give you first the programme as printed—there were some alterations made in the evening—and shall then make a few remarks:

Part I.
Organ Overture.....	Rossini
Quartet, Miss C. Colman, Mrs. E. H. Jones, Mr. H. Tucker and Mr. C. Tucker.
Grand Sacred Organ Fugue (sic). With an introduction in C sharp major, composed for the occasion and performed by Robert Elder, Organist of the 16th St. Baptist Church, N. Y.
Ballad.....	A. P. Cooklin
Organ Variations by.....	Wm. A. King
"Thy mercy, O Lord!".....	Wm. A. King
Sung by Miss C. Colman, accompanied by Mr. King.
Part II.
Organ Fantasia.....	Wm. A. King
Quartet, Miss Colman, Mrs. Jones, Mr. H. Tucker and Mr. C. Tucker
Brilliant Variations on.....	R. Elder
American National Air.....
Rejoice Greatly (Handel).....	Miss E. Colman
Voluntary, Organ.....	J. Wesley Pickering
Ballad.....	A. P. Cooklin
Finale, America. In which all are invited to sing.

The programme speaks almost sufficiently for itself. I shall not therefore need to consume much of either your or your readers' valuable time in remarks.

To notice first the "Organ Overture by Rossini." This was played by Mr. Wm. A. King, a gentleman well known in New York and much favored by the people generally, for his emphatically sweet style of organ playing.

We would in charity suppose that it was merely for the purpose of showing off the fine qualities of the instrument (its quickness of speech, smooth and equable voicing, lightness and evenness of touch, &c.) that this Overture was played, did not the rest of the programme forbid such a supposition. In the statement that the piece was an Overture, and moreover one by Rossini, everything that need be said with regard to its unsuitness for the organ is contained. We pass on to the next: A Quartet. Whether the Messrs. Tucker here mentioned were any connections of the celebrated Dan Tucker who "sang for his supper," does not appear. Certainly, if Dan sang no better than these gentlemen, he deserved to be sent supperless to bed. So much for the singers; (Miss Colman we notice below, and as we could not hear Mrs. Jones, we can say nothing of her;) now for the Quartet itself I will only say of that, that its first three bars were the first three bars of "No one to love," note for note, both melody and harmony, and that this strain was repeated again and again to the most sacred words.

Next came a "Grand Sacred Organ Fugue" (we are not responsible for the spelling), with an introduction in C sharp major. As far as we could discover, it was all introduction. We looked carefully for the Fugue, but had a very unsuccessful search. Once we thought we had it. Something was played that sounded like a thesis, but the antithesis was not forthcoming. Like chaos, the whole production was without form and void. This wonderful effusion was encored. The organist responded by playing something, the commencement of which put us violently in mind of the air with which Agouste and Caron did all sorts of wonderful and impossible tricks with their violins at Jane English's theatre lately. The air referred to runs thus:

This enchanting introduction led into "Home, sweet Home," with a staccato accompaniment and Thalbergian variations; not that Thalberg wrote them; they were miserable imitations of his style.

The Ballad which followed was a very neat composition, in true ballad style, with a very pretty though rather hacknied sequence founded on the seventh, in the middle of it. It was very nearly spoiled by the accompaniment being played on the organ.

In place of an intended "Improvised Prelude and Fugue in the style of Bach," wilfully miscalled on both sets of programmes "Organ Variations" (which miscalling, we are credibly informed was the reason why Mr. Rohjohn withdrew his name), we had a Voluntary, occupying about 7 minutes, from a Mr. J. Wesley Pickering, which, if improvised, contained some rather ingenious imitations reflecting great honor on him. This, being really good, was suffered to fall to the ground with scarcely a simple mark of applause. During the performance of this voluntary, Mr. Pickering produced a novel though by no means agreeable effect by pulling out the Twelfth without the Fifteenth, thereby giving us a series of consecutive fifths anything but pleasant to an educated ear. This was probably a mistake, as the offending stop was stopped off after a very short period of torture.

The next thing on the Programme was a Soprano Solo composed by Mr. King. A fearfully secular composition; containing one passage that was much like the often murdered, "Hear me, Norma," and several others that seemed to have been tenderly pruned from various operas, and carefully grafted on to this unfortunate solo. This Solo finished the first part and ourselves both at the same time; for we could bear no more and consequently left the building in disgust.

We had wanted to hear what sort of work Miss Colman would make of the "Rejoice greatly" from the "Messiah," which, as all your subscribers must know, is an immensely florid and trying solo. On looking back—mentally—we are not sure that it was not just as well that we came away; as from her rendering of the Quartet—or rather her part in it—and solo above-mentioned, we think that our absence saved us a considerable amount of internal swearing.

The above is a fair representation of the first part of this precious concert. The second part was doubtless a worthy mate to the first,—could we have stayed to hear it. Don't you think our musical constitution here in New York needs attending to; when out of a concert of 13 pieces only one among them is good? Yours very truly,

ADALBERT GYROWETZ.

CHAPTER III.

G. goes to Italy.—Music in Venice.—Florence.—Enters upon his duties as Secretary and Musician in Rome.—Makes the acquaintance of Goethe.—Their days and evenings.—Leading musicians in Rome.—The Pope's Choir.—G. composes quartets and hears of them in Paris.—Studies with Boroni, and astonishes his master.—Longings for Naples.—Breaks with his employer.

The young musician went on to Venice, where he was to remain in the palace of the Countess Breuner, until Raspoli should come and take him formally into his service as Secretary and teacher of music. The Countess had a small orchestra, led by a very good virtuoso on the violin, named Kletchinsky, and she was also a fine player on that instrument; there was therefore a great deal of good music in the house. Some of Gyrowetz's compositions were performed and many compliments paid him.

Its condition, he says, was very mediocre. In the churches, instead of grand and solemn voluntaries, nothing was to be heard on the organ but songs from operas, or rondos from quartets and sonatas. Evenings, when the people were collected on St. Mark's place or about the coffee-houses, all sorts of charlatans exhibited themselves, some playing various instruments, others exciting laughter by their drolleries, and others even producing comic operettas, and adding to the fun by their bag wigs, swords and old fashioned garb. In summer it was the custom to go in gondolas to Mestre, where at 10 P.M., a comic opera would be performed, and where every sort of fun and amusement went on until morning broke, when the visitors came back by daylight to sleep a few hours. There was rarely a performance in the theatres in summer, and then only when some roaming company appeared and gave a few pantomimes and bad operas. The best that one could hear was an occasional quartet in some private circle, or a sonata for the pianoforte; beyond this there was very little music. The Conservatorium for girls sometimes gave a concert, but almost exclusively vocal. Some talented composers resided in Venice, but they were mostly away when Gyrowetz was there, fulfilling engagements in various Italian cities.

At length Raspoli appeared, and employer and employed seem to have been equally pleased with each other. Gyrowetz took all pains to please the prince, and was in return treated more like a friend and teacher, than servant. On leaving Venice they journeyed to Ferrara, Padua, Vicenza, Bologna, Pisa, Leghorn, Lucca and Florence, where they made a longer stay. The prince introduced Gyrowetz into the first circles everywhere, as an artist, and thus, young as he was, he gained a wide reputation. In Bologna he was even made an honorary member of the Philharmonic Society. "Here he learned," he says, "that Rossini received his first instruction in composition from the Abbé Martini."—a curious instance of lapsus memoriae, as Rossini was not then born!

Soon after his arrival in Florence he was introduced to the then celebrated Improvisatrice, Signora Correa, where he met Nardini, the greatest violinist of his day, pupil of Tartini, who had the kindness, old as he was (born in 1722) to play a violin sonata to the young man. "The purity and firmness of tone and the scientific command of his bow, were the principal excellencies of Nardini's playing, although he could also perform very difficult passages with extraordinary bravour."

"Moreover, Gyrowetz visited the great gallery of art, in which the most beautiful masterpieces both of sculpture and painting were to be found, among them the Venus de Medici. A park, celebrated for its beauty, and a beautiful theatre, called the Pergola, belong to the attractions of this city, which has a situation of wonderful beauty, and is surrounded with lovely gardens and the finest summer houses, called villas."

"Music was pursued with more zeal and thoroughness in Florence, because the German school had a much greater influence there than in the other Italian cities, and several German masters had settled there. The remark is to be added, that in Florence, when visiting the galleries and sights, it is forbidden the servants to take any thing from visitors, on pain of losing their places."

From Florence the prince and his retinue journeyed via Siena to Rome, where was the family seat. Here, in the Palace Raspoli, Gyrowetz had his apartments, wherein he found a piano-forte provided for him. And now began in fact his duties, which were confined to the prince's daily practice of the violin for some hours, and the occasional writing of a few letters. As both the French and Italian languages were now pretty well in his power, the secretary's efforts were quite satisfactory. The rest of his time he had to himself, and employed it in part in amusement, partly in viewing the curiosities of the city. He made many acquaintances among the artists then there; among them the German painters, Rosa, Dies [Biographer of Haydn], Müller, and the French, David, St. George, Le Grand, in whose company he often dined, at a German eating-house then kept in the Strada Trinità, near the piazza di Spagna. Here there was much talk of art, matters at home, and personal adventures. Here also his friends thought proper to teach the still young Gyrowetz to smoke tobacco, to which he at first had no objection; but the very first whiffs from the pipe made him so sick as almost to cause fainting, whereupon he smashed the pipe and threw it away, and never touched one afterwards.

Soon after this pipe business, "came to Rome the already celebrated writer and poet, Goethe, whom the Grand-Duke of Weimar had sent to Sicily to examine and describe the wonders of nature there, (?) which, besides other things in the highest degree remarkable, consist in part of battle pieces and other pictures in relief, formed by nature herself upon the faces of the rocks, as perfect as if drawn and chiselled by the first masters!" (?) [Gyrowetz does not pretend to have seen these wondrous works himself.]

Goethe remained, however, for some time in Rome, and Gyrowetz found opportunity to become well acquainted with him. [Goethe was then in his 38th year. He entered Rome Nov. 1, 1786.] "And so it happened that he saw the curiosities and antiquities of Rome in company with Goethe, clambered up many an old ruin, almost with danger to life and limb, and so spent most of his leisure time with him, in looking and creeping through the fallen monuments of the past, and in admiring many an artistic treasure. They examined the baths of Caracalla together where they passed from spot to spot, walking on the broken mosaics, and where the halls were still to be seen, in which the gladiators performed, and where other amusements were provided for the people. Pieces of ancient musical instruments were sometimes found in these ruins, which gave occasion for many a conversation upon old and new music, their condition and practice, in which Goethe proved that he possessed correct views in relation to works constructed on sound principles and regularly wrought out; and that he did not share the opinions of those, who hold all music—regular or not in construction—to be classic, if only through bizarre and crude ideas, noise and din, or confused modulations, it sounds strange to the ear, and who hold such compositions to be new, simply because from their want of rule or system they sound so to them—a matter in which so many seemingly sensible musicians have grossly deceived themselves."

"Having finished viewing and examining some portions of the multitudes of antiquities, and evening drawing nigh, Goethe and Gyrowetz would join a sort of club, where they met quite a number of artists and authors. They seated themselves in a circle in the midst of a large chamber, a kettle of live coals in the centre, which, for it was already winter, protected them from the cold (after the manner of the Romans), and brought them, in a figurative sense, nearer together. Goethe took the lead. The conversation was upon all sorts of topics. Each related the remarkable events of his life. Adventures and the accidents of life formed the topics of their narratives, until the evenings were well advanced, when refreshments were served—bread, cheese, dried sausage and such like cold meats, to which beer, brewed by a German brewer in Rome, was added. In this manner, the evenings passed away very pleasantly, [no doubt!] and at two or three in the morning the company separated, each going to his own lodgings, to rest and prepare for the coming day. This mode of life was kept up [by Gyrowetz, it is to be understood] until Goethe left Rome, and went on to Naples, early in February, 1787."

Gyrowetz had also at that time a longing desire to visit Naples, and privately labored to gain the means of indulging his wish as soon as possible. Meantime he made the acquaintance of the principal musical artists of Rome—among them, the Pope's Chapelmaster Boroni, Chapelmasters Anfossi, Bianchi, and several violin virtuosos, Policia, Capanna, &c. String quartets were now often played, which had been rarely to be heard in Rome, because of the little taste there for this kind of music, the vocal being almost exclusively cultivated.

"That of the papal choir was always ranked first, notwithstanding an old voice was sometimes to be heard croaking with the rest, not producing the pleasantest of effects, and often injuring the entire effect; still it was always very imposing to hear such a body of selected vocalists, thoroughly used to the performance of canons, antiphonies, and other forms of ecclesiastical music—all in the so-called canto fermo."

During his prolonged stay in Rome, Gyrowetz employed himself very industriously in composition and embraced every opportunity to attain higher and higher perfection. It was then that he composed his first six quartets, which in process of time gained great reputation, were published by Imbeault in Paris, and ran through seven editions in a very short time. The remarkable fact in relation to this work was, that Gyrowetz down to the close of his life never could learn how or by whom his quartets came to Paris; for they were engraved without his knowledge, and it was long afterward that he first learned that they and some of his symphonies also had been published there. He had allowed but a single copy of the quartets to be made, and that was for Countess Breuner, while on a visit in Rome, where she heard them in a private concert to which Prince Raspoli invited her. It is possible that, after her return to Venice, the Countess or her violinist Kleczinsky, may have sent them to Paris.

The acquaintance with Boroni had been made through Prince Raspoli, as Gyrowetz desired to study vocal composition with that master. The first task which Boroni gave his pupil, was to write an air upon Metastasio's words: "Sogna il guerrier le armi, il Pescatore le reti." In composing it G. sought both in the ritornel and in the air itself to depict the character and feeling of the whole. As Boroni examined it, his features seemed to express a feeling of astonishment, and after a while he broke out with these words: "Cosa Voi volete imparare ancora?" (What more do you wish to learn?) Probably, adds Gyrowetz, the German style and instrumentation were to him something new, and hence his astonishment. He then praised the work, and especially the picturesque and characteristic expression of the air—which was not always to be found in Italian opera. The young man was afterwards often with Boroni, and was always treated with distinguished politeness.

So all things conspired to add to Gyrowetz's desire of going on to Naples, there to complete his musical education, and make himself thorough master of counterpoint and the severe school of composition,—the more desirable to him, as up to this time he was forced to consider himself rather as a dilettante and natural composer, never really having had a master in this branch of the art, but having produced all the works then published through his natural talents.

At length, unable to restrain his impatience, he talked on the subject with Raspoli. The prince seemed greatly surprised, expressed dissatisfaction, from that moment changed his treatment of Gyrowetz, and finally began to demand menial services of him. Of course this was not long to be borne, and the secretary demanded his dismissal, which was unwillingly granted. Provided with letters of introduction, he left Rome and went to Naples, alone and, now for the first time, self-dependent. Before entering upon his new career, however, as he tells us, he wrote to his father and sent him 12 ducats, as a proof of his filial affection.

G. in Naples.—Paisiello's liking for him.—San Carlo and the other operas.—Meets Goethe again, who shows his knowledge of music.—Musical discussions with Paisiello and Guglielmi.—Low State of Music in the Churches.—G. studies Counterpoint with Sala.—Quartet Parties.—A Russian Bear.—The Last Penny.

Arrived in Naples he had soon the good fortune to make, by accident, the acquaintance of an honorable and kindly Swiss merchant or trader, who gave him counsel in his inexperience, and aid in establishing himself and becoming acquainted with Naples, its life and customs. As a rule his letters of introduction secured him a kind and friendly reception.

Now let the hero of the story again go on with it.

"He was received with particular kindness by the celebrated composer and Chapelmaster Paisiello, who ever afterwards treated him with the greatest attention and distinction. He looked through some of the young man's compositions, expressed his entire satisfaction, and met the wish for farther instruction in vocal composition, by imparting much useful information upon that subject and upon theatrical music, which in later years was of great advantage to Gyrowetz. Paisiello took such a liking to his pupil, as to have him present at all his rehearsals, and there teach him how a Kapellmeister should conduct himself in rehearsal and in general in practising new work.

"Upon his first entrance into the theatre San Carlo, Gyrowetz stood as if thunderstruck, astonished and struck dumb at its vastness and dazzling splendor, and the magnificence of the decorations. And now he heard the orchestra, consisting of nearly a hundred performers, and producing a wonderful reverberating effect. He seemed to be transported into a new world, and knew not what first to admire—everywhere such splendor, magnificence, glory!

"At that time, Madame Labraune was prima donna in this theatre, and her husband, one of the most famous oboe virtuosos, was engaged in the orchestra, in which were other virtuosos on divers instruments, so that this orchestra was one of the most celebrated in Europe. The same opera was often given for months together, until some new one took its turn; and if this did not please, the old one was again brought out and kept on the stage until a successful one was found. Gyrowetz remembered that a single opera by Guglielmi, "Sisera and Deborah," ran through two years with general applause. And so it was also with the ballet, for which the most celebrated dancers of both sexes in all Europe were engaged. For the ballets, there were special composers engaged, who had to consult with the ballet masters, and deliver new music expressly composed for the pieces.

"The second theatre in Naples, at that time, was the Teatro Nuovo, in which no serious operas were given, only Opere di mezzo carattere, or semi-serious. The orchestra here, as in all but San Carlo, was of the second rank, and just then the wind instruments were particularly bad—so much so, that on one occasion, when an air from Mozart's "Figaro" was introduced into an opera by a certain Mandini, these instruments caused it to be hissed from the stage. This theatre was open on alternate days with the San Carlo, and was looked upon as theatre 'of ease' for the first singers.

"A third, called the Teatro dei Fiorentini, was opened daily, in which comic operas were exclusively given; the Molinara, La bella piscatrice, Locanda, Paisiello's Barbiere di Seviglia, &c., &c. One of the company here was a very famous buffo—Cassacelli—such a favorite that the audience burst out laughing if his voice was but heard behind the scenes, and his appearance upon the stage was always greeted by the stormiest applause, while his every motion was clapped with enthusiasm. One of his favorite parts was in the Filosofo immaginario of Paisiello. This opera was long forbidden, on account of certain too great freedoms, but, being somewhat altered, it was again permitted and drew large audiences.

"There was also a fourth theatre, called the Carlino, in which nothing but comic performances in the true Neapolitan folks'-speech were given. This was the theatre of the populace, whither the so-called Lazzaroni came in crowds, and joyfully sacrificed their few grani (small copper coins). People of a higher class have also found amusement there, and paid frequent visits—so it goes in the world, we all love variety.

"It was at this time, that Goethe returned to Naples from Sicily, [May, 1787] and came across Gyrowetz on the promenade, al giardino Reale, where they often met and walked up and down together, talking, besides other topics, much upon music and the condition of the art in general in Italy. Goethe showed that he possessed a great knowledge of music, and gave it as his opinion, that the old Italian masters paid more attention to introducing contrapuntal figures, and in their music thought more of the singers than of the orchestra. The old masters, too, avoided covering up the voice by loud accompaniment, and especially by a too free use of wind instruments.

Paisiello said once, in a musical conversation that the composer should employ his wind instruments only here and there as an ornament—like bouquets on a festival table.

"A story was also told, that in course of a talk upon music, in a company of Chapelmasters and operatic composers, one of them complained that the same style and manner was always kept up, and no progress was made; upon which old Guglielmi, sprang up, and screamed in his falsetto voice: 'No, no, God forbid! It will not do for us to press too far onwards, we must seek to keep the public to a temperate enjoyment of music; for if we go on too fast and too far, the public will also add to its demands, and as its exactions rise by degrees even higher, what will be the final result? The theatres will have to be closed, because the public at length cloyed, will no longer possess any taste, and leave the theatres unvisited.'

"So they used to talk until late in the night when each went his own way home."

At that time, a Herr Hadrava, member of the Austrian Legation, arranged a series of concerts at the house of his minister, Baron Thugut, to which both Goethe and Gyrowetz were invited. As the latter entered, he found Goethe standing quite alone and unnoticed by a door, which led into the large saloon. He went immediately to Goethe, and told him he ought to go forward into the room, and not stand there so out of the way. The poet thanked him politely, and prayed to be left there in peace: he could hear every thing, and did not enjoy going into the great world. In general, Goethe's manner was at that time very friendly—indeed rather shy and humble. [Had his recent experience with Frau von Stein anything to do with it?] He did not remain much longer in Naples, and soon departed for home. [But instead of going directly home, he returned to Rome, and remained nearly a year there].

At this period, Gyrowetz usually employed the day in viewing the sights of Naples, of which the immense number of churches formed no inconsiderable part, and thus came to hear very much of the church music then and there in vogue. Sometimes he found it very good, but for the most part it was very mediocre—as the music director of the church happened to have distinguished himself by his compositions or not. Each church kept the annual festival of its patron saint with great formality and splendor, the principal feature being the production of a new mass by some composer, for which he was paid a certain sum, he having the privilege of selecting the performers. In the evening a small display of fireworks concluded the ceremonies. The number of these festivals was so great, that many a Chapelmaster in Naples was able to obtain the necessities of life by the proceeds of these masses alone. The first ecclesiastical composers at that time were Sala and Anfossi; other Chapelmasters, who composed operas, Paisiello, Cimarosa, Guglielmi, Bianchi, Generali, Giordaniello, &c., seldom troubled themselves with mass music. The hearing of so many of this class of compositions awoke a desire in Gyrowetz to employ his talents in that direction, and he determined, as soon as his means would allow, to obtain a teacher in counterpoint and labor with zeal and perseverance; but just then it was impossible, as his finances were decreasing, and he found himself compelled to study money matters rather than musical science. As he was now beginning to be known, he tried a subscription for his quartets, and his success placed him above want for some time. There came to Naples just then, one of his former Vienna acquaintances, a young German merchant, named Bray, a great lover of music, who took a daily lesson of him on the violin, and had a quartet party at his rooms almost as often, playing the second violin himself. He was very generous, and his kindness enabled Gyrowetz to take his master in counterpoint. Sala was then the most celebrated contrapuntist in the city, and teacher of that branch in the Conservatorium della pietà—at that time the best of all the music schools in Naples. Sala was then far advanced in years, but rejoiced to have a young German as his pupil, who had already made considerable reputation as an instrumental composer.

Sala began with his pupil at the very beginning—with the scale—but as the latter had of course a thorough knowledge of chords, progressions, &c., they passed very rapidly on to contrapuntal exercises in two, three, and four parts, and then to canon and fugue, in which branch of the art Master Sala was a distinguished and most excellent teacher. The old gentleman had the kindness, after each lesson, to take Gyrowetz with him in his walk on the Molo, or out towards Vesuvius, and while walking, the pupil must repeat from memory what he had just learned at the lesson. When studying fugue, he had to learn by rote all the elements of a fugue, —theme, inversion, modulation, imitation, augmentation, diminution, &c., &c., to the colla,—so as to be able to recite them in order. "That," says he, "was an excellent method, which is to be recommended to every student of composition."

Gyrowetz's mastery of the violin was of great advantage to him, in obtaining him paid employment at quartet parties and private concerts. Thus he came to know a certain Ferri, owner of a land estate, who had quartets at his house three times a week, and who soon had the young German as a daily guest and regular performer at his music parties; and by placing his quartets upon his list, gave a new impulse to the reputation of Gyrowetz and his works.

Another patron of chamber music, then in Naples, was a Russian grandee, who had frequent quartets at his house, performed by paid musicians, of whom Gyrowetz was usually one. This man seemed to think the musicians his servants, and was continually finding fault, and indulging his whims, regardless of all rules of common politeness. On one occasion he attacked Gyrowetz in this manner, quite without cause. The artist rose from his seat, laid down the viola, which he was playing, and walked out of the house without a word. The Russian was thunderstruck. "Probably he was accustomed in Russia to see everybody bow to him, and bear his tomfooleries in all humility; but the young German thought otherwise, and showed him that artists in Germany are not used to bear the follies and whims of the great with indifference and meekness; and that they know how to stand up for their rights, and the respect due them, in the presence of any one who undertakes to insult or humble them without due cause given!" Of course the other artists were delighted that Gyrowetz had the courage to give the Russian serf-owner a lesson.

Spite of all his exertions, Gyrowetz's pocket would grow empty, and upon the grand Neapolitan festival, the birth of the Virgin, Sept. 8, [1787] he spent his last money, a few grani, for a bit of cheese and a bunch of grapes, his only dinner. Next day his circumstances improved. A Mr. Wasing, an English wholesale merchant, residing in Naples, whom Gyrowetz had known for some time, lent him money and relieved him from his necessity; nor was this the only time, as the recipient of his bounty gratefully confesses.

Grétry.

From the Brussels Guide Musical.

"You are a musician," said Voltaire to Grétry, "and yet you are a clever man! This is too unusual for me not to take the liveliest interest in you." It has never been possible to reproach great composers with being deficient in wit—it is sufficient to cite those now alive—and Voltaire's epigram proves only one fact: In his time, as at present, there were plenty of persons who would talk at random on any subject. But could any one say to Grétry: "You are a clever man, and yet you appear to be desirous of proving the philosopher of Ferney in the wrong. You are one of the best French composers, and yet it is about your art that you talk strange nonsense." We will now proceed to give an explanation of this contradiction, and then enter into an examination of some principles developed by Grétry, and adopted by him as his guides in opera.

The first volume of his Memoires, ou Essais sur la Musique, was originally published in 1789. He says he wrote it only as a relaxation from his usual kind of work. He has set down in it whatever a sentiment of art revealed to him while he was composing, and he considered all the more strongly that it was his duty to do so, because a hundred times he had felt inclined to take up the pen "when a thousand pamphlets upon music fomented dissensions among artists much more than they advanced the progress of art." He wished to leave his manuscript to his children, but his friends urged him to publish it at once, on account of the new principles contained in it, and because, speaking incessantly of his art, and communicating unreservedly his ideas in conversation, he ran the risk of appearing after the lapse of twenty years nothing but a plagiarist.

It is the first volume which is the most valuable. We find in it a historical sketch of Grétry when a youth, details concerning his opera, and explanations of the principles he followed in musical composition. In the two other volumes, published in 1796 (Pluviose, Year V.), he proposed to develop, at greater length, his ideas on the music of the stage. Being convinced that an exact acquaintance with the human heart is indispensable to a dramatic composer, he desired to spare young artists the trouble of going through and reflecting on a large number of books, and, at the same time, to furnish them with a theory on the musical expression of character and passion. He felt convinced that, to produce at the outset a lyrical masterpiece, a composer of talent need only have studied harmony and the fugue, and have read his (Grétry's) treatise.* That Grétry was endowed with great delicacy of feeling and judgment is a fact which the first page we open of his scores will prove; but it is no less true that, if we cut out all the repetitions, useless assertions, and common-places from his Memoires, especially the last two volumes, we should have only a very slender stock of just and sensible remarks left. The first cause of his errors was his exceedingly weak constitution. Ever since the age of fifteen, he was subject to spit blood, and this infirmity was only provoked or increased by the labor of musical composition. Not wishing to give up his favorite occupation, he was obliged to observe, all his life, a severe regimen, which enabled him to attain an advanced age (72), but did not free him from his attacks of hemorrhage and his morbid susceptibility. This was so much the case that he could not bear great heat any more than north winds, or read aloud for five minutes.

He gives us his last two volumes as the result of six years' work. He asserts that he has reflected for a long time upon the musical system, but adds that he has pursued no study save that of the human heart; that he has followed his instinct alone in reasoning upon the passions, and that it is most frequently by natural inspiration, rather than by erudition, that he has spoken of physical and moral causes and their effects. Now, when a man has done nothing all his life except turn his attention to the practice of musical composition, it is not sufficient for him, if we would solve the most difficult problems of art, to pass a few years of his old age in reasoning "by instinct," in a very delicate state of health, especially when heavy domestic woes, such as the successive deaths of his three daughters, help other things in robbing him of his calm serenity of mind. His morbid irritability was the principle cause of a fact which will be remarked through his entire work; it is almost impossible for him to entertain a correct idea without spoiling it by exaggerations, of which we should suppose only the most ignorant or the most foolish person capable. To find proofs of this, it would be sufficient for us to open his book at random; we will select one instance, not because it is the strongest, but because it is one of the most curious. His fundamental principle when composing for the voice was to follow the inflexions of spoken declamation. But, having discovered that an expressive air may be written without words, and that very appropriate ones may afterwards be supplied, he predicted a complete revolution in opera, a revolution of which he obtained the first idea from Haydn's symphonies. "A hundred times," he says, "I have suggested for these symphonies the words they appear to require."

The following is what he proposed. The author should at first versify only the words of the recitative, and write in prose those of all pieces of measured singing. The musician should write his work for the orchestra alone, drawing his inspiration from the general meaning of the words. When the symphonic score is completed, it should be performed, and those portions which do not obtain the approbation of the audience be re-written. A second trial should then be made. After each piece, the author should read the words to enable those present to judge whether the music is in keeping with them. Then only the vocal portions and the verses should be considered. All the instrumental parts should serve in turn, when required, to furnish the vocal parts. I leave Grétry the task of explaining the advantages possessed by this new system. If he did not put it in practice himself, the reason was, he informs us, "because in the case of every composer who has devoted his attention especially to vocal music, a symphony often costs more trouble than the most difficult scene." It is to the composers of instrumental music that he recommends his plan. "I am pointing out to them," he says, "the means of equalling, and, perhaps, surpassing us in dramatic art."

Grétry owns that he has not read many books, but we are not long in discovering, that he is imbued with the doctrines of Emile and of the Contrat Social. He professes, indeed, deep admiration for their author. "Of what good," he inquires, "are our cold moralists, when we can meditate on J. J. Rousseau? His works comprehend the whole system of morals; and although we do not, perhaps, find in them a single idea not known before his time, every thing appears new, on account of the correct application of principles." Unfortunately, that which the master could not teach the pupil is that deep moral and religious sentiment which resists all doubts; that energetic and independent individuality which is only more finely tempered by the conflicts in which it engages. Grétry was unable to preserve himself from the contagion of the materialist scepticism of his time, and his ideas offer a strange and often contradictory admixture of the theories of J. J. Rousseau and of those belonging to the school of sensualism. He continually opposes nature to society. "I have never seen," he says, "more than two men; the man who acts according to his own sensations, and the man who acts according to others. The former is always true, even in his errors; the latter is simply the mirror in which are reflected the objects on the stage of the world. Here we have the man of nature, the estimable man, and the man of society."

He defines the man of nature as "one whose only requirements are to provide himself with nourishment, make love, and sleep." "Government," he says again, "forms men's morals.—It is self-love which originated all systems of morality. Our disposition and our inclinations are the result of our organization and of the nourishing aliments which keep it up." "Death is the dissolution of our being to form fresh beings. Animals are only machines; they live as though in a continual dream." "The ministers of religion have cast discredit upon its temple; the temple of the Divinity is the entire world, and the most sacred form of worship is that which gives to social order the degree of perfection which God exhibits in his works to us."

After reading hundreds of wearisome pages, possessing no sort of value, we cannot help feeling a sentiment of deep grief on perusing, at the end of the second volume, the account of the death of Grétry's three daughters. When, with a bleeding heart, the unfortunate father has given us a detailed account of his loss, he does not know how to reproach himself for not having taken greater precautions to secure his children's health; he tells us that he experienced a sentiment of mute despair, of concentrated rage, and that he paid "a long tribute to nature" by shedding floods of tears; he informs us that "nothing equals the courage of a woman who loves her husband in her children; that it is like a tontine of love always profiting those who survive." It is, however, impossible for the disciple of J. J. Rousseau to be or to remain a complete materialist and atheist. "Our instinct," he says in his third volume, "is revealed in a sentimental philosophy, which comprises all that truth which we seek with so much trouble." He appears disposed to admit in man an immaterial principle; he recognizes the necessity of adoring a supreme Intelligence, different from the instinct of matter, and directing the universe by general laws. "But," he adds, "am I eternal as Thou art? Alas! I dare to desire it, in order to preserve the hope of returning Thee eternal thanksgiving. Flattering hope! crushing doubts!"

In his continual anxiety to follow nature, Grétry could not turn his attention to search for any other theory of art than that which, despite its want of solidity, was then generally adopted. According to him, the fine arts are only an imitation of nature; even architecture finds the models of its angles, its columns, its architraves, and its buttresses in the hollows of mountains. It is not an exact imitation, in order that art may not be confounded with nature; but "it is a charming falsehood, which presents nature agreeably to us. Truth in the arts consists principally in flattering our senses. The object of the arts is to please man; to charm him, and console him in his miseries." The mode in which Grétry had pursued his musical studies was calculated to increase his errors. He changed his master several times, and, on each occasion he did so, had to begin again. He felt persuaded that this was the best system of instruction, and followed it with his daughter Lucile, the authoress of Le Mariage d'Antonio. Besides this, treatises on harmony were then lost in mathematical calculations, and offered the composer nothing but arbitrary theories, refuted every moment by practice. Hence the singular notion of obtaining musical beauties by a license, that is to say, by the violation of a rule, a notion still to be found in many treatises, when simple good sense tells us that it is the rule which is, of necessity, badly constructed.

Grétry firmly believed it to be "demonstrated" that mathematical science is the first source of harmonic combinations. He determined to give a proof of this himself, and the notelets with which he sets about his task is very curious. If you object that a sonorous body emits only a perfect major chord, he will reply: "The perfect minor chord is deduced from it by analogy."—"But the scales?" you will observe.—"All notes besides those of the perfect chord have been added to fill up the void, like so many which would re-enter the sonorous body."—"But the sonorous body gives out many more notes than those of the perfect chord."—"Your sonorous body can only be cracked (fêlé) or badly proportioned."—"But the divisions of a chord give us the seventh and other notes as well."—"Such harmony is too enigmatical to be the base of a system."—"But the scale of the sounds of a horn is the same. All the notes of a horn, except those of the perfect chord, are only a kind of falsetto."—"But the chords?"—"Are all derived from the perfect chord by the addition of accidental notes. The perfect chord is in nature alone." In a word, Grétry stands no more on ceremony in simplifying musical theory, than children do in drawing, when they represent a man's head by one circle, his body by another, and his limbs by so many straight lines. In spite of this, however, he published, in accordance with the ideas developed in the third volume of his Mémoires, a Méthode simple pour apprendre à préluder en peu de temps avec toutes les Ressources de l'Harmonie. Grétry appears to have been incapable, from his physical and moral constitution, of justly appreciating any thing which did not agree with his own ideas on musical expression. In spite of the way in which he recommends the study of the fugue, and in spite of the suggestions he gives for its employment on the stage, he owns that while admiring the fugues of Handel he seeks to find song (chant) in them, with the same impatience that a lover seeks his mistress in a thick wood. He says that he cannot long endure the finest organ played by the most skillful organist, and compares this instrument to a monotonous speaker possessing a beautiful voice. He lays it down as a rule that religious music ought to be distinguished for a vague character, in opposition to the precise expression of music which is declaimed, because he says, "every thing, either mystery or revelation, not within the reach of our human comprehension, forces us to feel respect, and, for this reason, excludes all direct expression," as though, because it is religious, music ought to be as incomprehensible as are the dogmas of the Trinity and that of the Immaculate Conception. The manner in which he speaks of the various instruments would be sufficient, without his scores, to prove that he did not possess much genius for instrumentation. The method discovered by Erard for swelling and diminishing the sounds of the organ strikes Grétry as being "the philosopher's stone of music," and he believes that the organ will end by replacing in theatres an orchestra of a hundred musicians. One last cause of error consists in the fact that Grétry carried his idea of his own talent to an excessive degree of vanity, which he disguised very little. All criticism appears to have been insupportable to him. "When," he exclaims, "shall we see censors worthy of censuring us? When will Government confide to celebrated men this honorable task as a reward for their labors? Let the first man in each department of art, the one long designated by the voice of the public, be charged with this." Coming from Grétry, such a proposition must cause the most morose reader to smile.

His opinions of Gluck and the music of various countries are more particularly impressed with his tetchy amour propre. Grétry acknowledges that the author of the Sera Padrona is his master, and it would be ungracious in him to deny it. But the reader may easily conceive that Grétry, who ascertained that he founded musical expression upon declamation above aught else, was sensibly displeased by the arrival of Gluck, who based his system on the same principle. Grétry accords Italy melodic originality and "a system of sentimental counterpoint favorable to expression." To Germany he gives harmonic combinations, instrumental music, and elocutionary truth; he adds that the whole force of German genius does not offer us a pathetic air as delectable as those of Sacchini, though this does not prevent him from saying, on another occasion, that Sacchini has no new ideas, and that his songs are vague. As for the French, he treats them as beings essentially frivolous, who have received from nature less aptitude for music than any other nation. For all this, however, he declares that France gave birth to dramatically musical art, and that she will one day produce the best musicians, that is to say: such as will be able to employ more judiciously than any others melody as well as harmony in the production of a perfect whole. Contradictions of this kind are usual with Grétry, and too much importance must not be attached to them.

It would be useless to discuss opinions to which Italy, France and Germany are equally justified in objecting. No works are richer in melody than Don Juan, Die Zauberflöte, Der Freischütz and Oberon, while nothing is poorer in this respect than nineteen twentieths of Italian music, on account of the monotony inseparable from the abuse of conventional forms. To put the question as Grétry puts it is only to give full scope to the most arbitrary and the most false assertions. "When I heard the first work by Gluck," says Grétry, "I thought I was interested only by the action of the drama, and said: there is no song. But I was happily undeceived on perceiving that it was the music itself, having become the action, which had moved me." Despite this praise, Grétry asserts that Gluck has not extended the limits of art, but only created a new genre, or kind. He thinks Gluck's music badly written for the voice, too much declaimed, and too dramatic; he perceives in it long instances of negligence set off by touches of sublimity; great orchestral labor, and such masculine harmony as does not allow any part of the vocal music to dominate it. He places Philidor side by side with Gluck for power of harmonic expression, and Méhul's duet of Euphrosine et Conradin above the finest pieces the latter ever wrote. This is not all. He says that Gluck nearly "crushed him" (faillit à l'étouffer), and that the career of the composer of Alceste might be followed more easily than his own, for: "the orchestra ought to be subordinated to the singing, and not the singing to the orchestra, the proof being that Gluck has already been caught and imitated with success by several composers, such as Cherubini, Méhul and Lesueur; but no one will imitate in this way pure and true vocal music." Lastly, he says that: "The Germans have taught the rest of Europe that the support of masculine, rich and abundant harmony bestows a celebrity which comes directly after that given by the creative genius which paints nature, that is to say, declamation noted and transformed into delicious song."

The conclusion to be drawn from all this is that Grétry thought himself greater than Gluck, and the greatest composer of his day. The accusation brought against him of being inferior to others as regards harmony and instrumentation, affected Grétry so much that he himself says that in his Raoul Barbe-Bleue, Pierre-le-Grand, and Guillaume Tell, he has endeavored to prove he did not deserve it, while at the same time he preserved his melodious style. He felt persuaded that he succeeded. At the present day, all persons are unanimously of opinion that he was wrong to make the attempt. Grétry speaks of Haydn in terms of high praise, but the name of Mozart is never traced by his pen. Is this the effect of pure ignorance? We would fain believe so, though the task is by no means an easy one. We know that to the question put by Napoleon I, as to what he thought of Mozart and Cimarosa, Grétry replied that Mozart placed the statue in the orchestra and the pedestal upon the stage, while Cimarosa pursued the contrary course. He had evidently made up his mind to reproach the Germans with subordinating vocal music to the orchestra, and not being able to metamorphose declamation into "delicious song."

But we have spoken evil enough of Grétry, although the subject is far from exhausted. We only, desired, however, to judge him as a philosopher and theorist. It is by no means our intention to dispute the excellent qualities of his mind and heart, qualities of which he always furnished proof whenever his vanity as a composer was not too much involved. His physical constitution, his want of education, his occupations, the very nature of his talent, the influence which must have been exerted on him by the state of the philosophic and moral science of his time—all rendered him unsuited for the task he had undertaken. He endeavored to probe the most arduous questions of art, and these questions are even at the present day far from being completely decided. Notwithstanding certain isolated views to be found in the writings of the best authors, the philosophy of musical art does not yet exist as a science. None of the French works which have assumed this title, or one of the same kind, possess more than a limited value. Germany boasts of some few books entitled: Musical Esthetics, but it is impossible for us to speak of them in terms of praise; we find in them absurdities quite as glaring, if, indeed, not as numerous, as those in Grétry's Mémoires.

JOHANNES WEBER.

Emile Prudent.

(From "Spiridon's" letters in the Evening Gazette.)

France has lost her best pianist—an artist she was fond of pretending rivalled Thalberg and Liszt and Chopin. He was an excellent pianist, but he lacked that exquisite sensibility which threw so much poetry over the execution of Liszt and of Chopin, and that—what name shall be given it?—honest, frank, hearty quality which seems to me to constitute Thalberg's chief charm. Emile Prudent lacked those higher attributes of an artist's nature; the French character generally is deficient in them, and the French supply and, as well as they may, conceal this defect by amazing adroitness. Skill contents only the superficial and these but partially, for they miss something, they know not what; though it is that poetry which is the essential ingredient of art. The man must appear in every work of art—be it a duck puddle on canvass or a polka on the piano.

Emile Prudent's birth is shrouded in mystery. It is a little singular that a romantic veil hides the original of all the great modern masters of the piano. Chopin, Liszt and Thalberg are all said to be of noble, but disowned origin; and it seems that Thalberg is unquestionably the son of some German prince. One morning in April, 1817, the sordid, childless home of a poor piano-tuner in the Rue de Genève, Angoulême, was suddenly enlivened by the presence of a bright child a few weeks old. The old piano-tuner never pretended that the child was his, and even had he laid claim of paternity, the elegant appearance of the infant would have successfully challenged the truth of his claim. The old piano-tuner and his wife never gave any clue to the origin of the child, not even to the lad himself when time had ripened him into manhood. His nearest neighbor was a lad who has since acquired a good deal of reputation as a writer under the pseudonym of Alberic Second. Their boyish friendship lasted throughout life, with but one single cloud. Their favorite amusement was "playing theatre." Emile Prudent would play tyrant, Alberic Second would play the 'Squire. During one performance the tyrant became so earnest in his part as to break his wooden sword over his faithful squire's head. The squire was knocked down with so much violence that he was obliged to take to bed, which he kept for two days.

Emile was deeply distressed and watched by his friend's bed until the latter's recovery, which he hastened by saying: "Oh! do make haste and get well, Alberic; and we'll be tyrant alternately." The first elements of music and of piano playing were taught the lad by the old piano tuner holding a whip in one hand and a score in the other. Of course this boy made rapid progress; for with all our boasted progress and civilization we have not yet found any guano so effectual as the rapid, but intermittent, application of birch on the salient equatorial bow of childhood's back. Let me add, too, that young Prudent had a wonderful "time" for music. When he was ten years old, the whole family set off to complete the lad's musical education. He was at once admitted into the conservatory; became one of Zimmerman's pupils and in five years quitted the conservatory with the first prize for piano playing. He lived wretchedly during this period of his life, for the whole family had no weapon wherewith to conquer a livelihood except the tuning-fork hammer. You know how blunt that is with you; it is a great deal blunter here. Young Prudent studied the piano fifteen hours a day and slept the rest of the time. The boy—Prudent was only fifteen years old now—had not been many months out of the conservatory when the terrible cholera of 1832 swept away the old piano-tuner and his wife. The boy was alone and without means of support, except such as his musical education afforded, and his extreme youth was against him in this career. He did, nevertheless, contrive to secure a few pupils at twenty sous the hour; and during the winter he would often obtain an engagement as pianist at small evening parties, where he would earn twenty francs by playing to the dances from eight o'clock, p. m. till seven o'clock, a. m. The Sundays which followed these "lucky" nights, he would invite Alberic Second to dine with him at the thirty-two sous' restaurants of the Palais Royal, where they would eat with such excellent appetites that Alberic Second says, they alarmed the restaurant-keepers into effacing from their bills of fare "bread at discretion." After two or three years had been spent in this way, he became very anxious to give a concert. His friends encouraged him and the concert was given. Nobody but his friends were present and only one ticket was sold, which was bought by Mons. Eugene Labriche (now the well-known dramatist); the others lustily applauded, but neither fame or fortune was won. About this same time, Emile Prudent heard Liszt play, and then he, for the first time, saw to what a height piano playing could be carried. He discovered the immense distance which existed between him and a great artist. He determined to lessen this distance. A "long" piano was absolutely necessary to enable him to prosecute this design. He went to Pleyel to see on what terms such an instrument could be purchased. Pleyel said to him: As you are the first prize in the Conservatory, I will let you have it for 2,000fr. "Will you have confidence in me and let me have it on time; for I have no money." Pleyel thought a moment and then said: "Yes, if you will agree to give me your note for it." Prudent gave the note, and formed his plans, which were, to retire to the provinces where one could live cheaply, and there study the great masters as soon as he could pay for his grand "long" piano. In a year it was paid for. Then he quitted Paris and took up his residence at Angoulême, giving only lessons enough to support him. The remainder of the time he studied assiduously the great masters of piano music and with so much ardor that he was menaced with paralysis of the fore-arms, which was averted by steeping his arms every morning in the blood of beets as it issued steaming from them, in the public slaughter-house. Having made satisfactory progress in his art, Prudent determined to remove to Nantes, where his lessons would be better paid, and consequently where he would command more time for his private studies. While at Nantes he composed his magnificent fantasia on Lucia di Lammermoor, came up to Paris, soon became celebrated and wealthy. No less than 40,000 copies of his fantasia on Lucia di Lammermoor have been sold, and his Concerto-Symphonie, Les Hirondelles, La Danse des Fées, La Ronde de Nuit, Le Lac, La Prairie, Les Bois, Les Champs, and Les Trois Rêves were equally successful. He was decorated with the Legion of Honor in 1847. He had given concerts successfully in France, Italy, Spain, Portugal, Germany, Belgium, Prussia, Austria and England. He was about to go to Russia, and he intended to visit America as soon as peace was restored—vain project! He was taken sick at nine o'clock in the morning with the angine couenneuse and before night he was dead.

Whight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, AUGUST 22, 1863.

The Truth about the Marseillaise.

Under this title, M. Fétis has started an interesting discussion in the Revue et Gazette Musicale of Paris. M. Fétis thinks he has found proof that the music of the Marseillaise was not composed by Rouget de Lisle, and adheres to this opinion in spite of an earnest protestation from a descendent of the latter, bearing the same name. M. Fétis's first article appeared in the Revue of July 19, and we here give it as translated in the Musical Review and World of New York:

Rouget de Lisle is not the author of the music of the Marseillaise. I shall prove it immediately. Captain of an Engineer Corps, he was employed in Strasburg in 1792, at the time of the declaration of war, and he shared the patriotic enthusiasm, which surprised the whole garrison in hearing this important news. In his exultation he wrote under the title of "War Song" those energetic verses, of which the first lines, were prophetic. Copies of these verses were rapidly spreading. They were sung upon an air of an opera then very popular, and I believe were based upon this air. One of the copies of this "War Song" reached Paris and fell into the hands of a good musician, known under the name of Navoigille, although his real name was Julien. Being an ardent Republican, Navoigille felt deeply moved while reading these verses, and immediately composed the sublime song, which made them immortal. Like all my contemporaries, I for a long time thought that the author of the words was also that of the music. I thought so even when I published the notice upon Rouget de Lisle in the seventh volume of the first edition of the Biographie universelle des musiciens (1841). I had met with Rouget de Lisle in 1809, at the house of my pupil, Mad. Gail, who composed the operas Les Deux Jaloux and La Sérénade. He often came to this remarkable woman, who was befriended to him and who wrote the romances which he composed by dint of instinct (for he was a very poor musician). She also wrote the Piano accompaniment for his melodies. I confess, I felt somewhat astonished that with such a poor musical education he could have found that beautiful, regular and very rhythmical melody, which gave him his reputation; but I never had any doubt that he was really the author.

Allons, enfants de la patrie.
Le jour de gloire est arrivé!

A fortunate circumstance made me acquire, in 1847, two collections, which perhaps it would be impossible to find together to-day. The first contains all the revolutionary and Republican songs on little flying sheets; the other includes all the pieces composed for the Republican festivals, for the Champ de Mars and the Temples de la Raison. The readers of the Gazette Musicale can form an idea of my surprise to find in the first of these collections, among the little sheets, which were sold at the time of the Convention, later of the Directoire, for six sous, at the doors of the theatres, and which contained the patriotic songs and those of the new operas—the song of the Marseillaise under this title: Marche de Marseillais, paroles du citoyen Rouget de Lisle, musique du citoyen Navoigille, à Paris, chez Frère, passage du Saumon, où l'on trouve tous les airs patriotiques des vrais sans-culottes! (March of the Marseillais, words by Citizen Rouget de Lisle, music by Citizen Navoigille, Paris, Frère, passage du Saumon, where one can find all the patriotic melodies of the true sans-culottes!) Another copy of the same song, with accompaniment of the Guitar, has but this title: Marche des Marseillais, musique du citoyen Navoigille, accompagnement de guitare par le citoyen Mathieu. Au magasin de musique à l'usage des fêtes nationales, rue Joseph, section de Brutus. (March of the Marseillais, music by Citizen Navoigille, Guitar-accompaniment by Citizen Mathieu).

We know that the true sans-culottes or terrorists had but a short political existence of about eighteen months, during 1793 and 1794, until the month of July. It is consequently in 1793, that the Marseillaise was known by everybody to be composed by Navoigille, and that it was sold in public under his authorship without any reclamation on the part of Rouget de Lisle, then or later. When the latter wrote the words, he thought of writing but some couplets for the day and did not at all foresee the influence and importance they gained by the music. Michaud junior, who had some personal transactions with Rouget de Lisle, says in the supplement to the Biographie universelle, that it was while singing this hymn the Marseillais attacked the castle of the Tuilleries on the tenth of August, and that from this time the song took the name of the Marseillaise, which name the author never dreamt of. He adds: "He (the author) has later quite openly deplored these results, and we know that these open manifestations of his dissatisfaction caused his arrest under the reign of terror. He was not liberated until after the fall of Robespierre, and came then to reside in Paris."

Living in Paris, where the Marseillaise was sung as being the music of Navoigille, he ought to have publicly claimed this music as his own, if he was the author, but he did nothing of the kind. Moreover he published, in the year 5, (1797), a volume in octavo, under the title of "Essais in poetry and prose," in which we find the words of the Marseillaise under the heading of Chant de guerre (War Song), but not a word in reference to the music. It is nearly thirty years later, when Rouget de Lisle published under his name, the music of this hymn in a collection with the following title: Cinquant chants français, paroles de différents auteurs, mis en musique par Rouget de Lisle. L'auteur, 1825, (Fifty French songs, words by different authors, music by Rouget de Lisle. Published by the author, 1825). Navoigille had been dead 14 years.

Let me finish this article with a few biographical notices about this composer. William Julien, known under the name of Navoigille, composer and violinist of some talent, was born in Givèh, in 1745. He left this town for Paris, where he studied music, and where he made the acquaintance of a noble Venetian, who became attached to him, took him into his house and gave him the name under which he is known. Later, Monsigny made him enter the service of the house of the Duke of Orleans. After the death of this prince, Navoigille practised his art professionally. He had earned an honorable reputation as chief conductor, having proved his talent by conducting the then celebrated Concerts de la loge Olympique, for which Haydn had written six fine symphonies. Being a good violinist, Navoigille had established a school for teaching to play this instrument, without pecuniary compensation. His most remarkable pupil was the well-known violinist Alexandre Boucher. In 1789, Navoigille became the leader of the second violinists at the excellent Italian Opera, established at the theatre Feydeau, at that time called Theatre de Monsieur. Five years afterwards he resigned this situation, and accepted that of chief conductor of the orchestra of the Pantomime nationale, later known under the name of the Theatre de la Cité. He conducted this orchestra even in 1797; but the bankruptcy of the manager left him without employment and in embarrassed circumstances. When in 1805 Plantade was elected to conduct the orchestra of Louis Bonaparte, King of Holland, his friend Navoigille became a member of this orchestra. The union between France and Holland brought him back to Paris, where he died in November, 1811.

Navoigille had written for the theatre of the Pantomime nationale some works, amongst which La Heroine suisse was noticed as containing music with some original melodies. Some sonatas, duos and trios for the violin of his had been published and received with success; but his greatest work, that which commends his name to posterity, is his song of the Marseillaise.

This article called forth the following letter:

Paris, July 27, 1863.

"To M. Fétis Père, Director of the Royal Conservatoire of music at Brussels.

"MONSIEUR,—I have read with extreme surprise and very great pain an article signed by you, &c., &c.

"You wrongly attribute to Julien the elder, called Navoigille, the melody of the Marseillaise, to which you give an original date posterior to the 10th of August 1792.

"The veritable author of this immortal song, as you call it, (words, music and accompaniment), is Claude-Joseph Rouget de Lisle, my ancestor, who composed it at Strasburg in the night of the 26th to 27th of April 1792.

"This song was printed typographically at Strasburg in the beginning of the month of June of the same year, with this title: Chant de guerre pour l'armée du Rhin (War song for the army of the Rhine), dedicated to Marshall Luckner. It was orchestrated for military music by Fuchs, then sung at Marseilles by Mireur, at a patriotic banquet, on the 27th of June, and printed in a local journal on the 29th.

"It is found in La Trompette du père Duchêne (number for July 23, 1792), and the author of that publication explains in a note the impossibility of reproducing the music.

"The procès-verbaux of the administration of the Opera of Paris, principally those of the National Convention, which decreed a reward to Rouget de Lisle for his patriotic song (July 1795), establish in his favor the paternity of the Marseillaise, which all French authors (with the exception of Castil Blaze, 1852), have always accorded to him.

"The Marseillaise was orchestrated by Gossec, and represented on the stage of the Grand Opera, on the 26th of October 1792, under the title of: Offrande à la Liberté (Offering to Liberty), comprising an introduction and the well known strophe: Veillons au salut de l'Empire.

"The records of the administration of the Opera still establish the paternity of this manifold work in favor of Rouget de Lisle, although it was published under the name of Gossec, as author of the music, toward the end of 1793. At that period Rouget de Lisle was imprisoned at St. Germain, for incivisme (disaffection).

"The volume of Essays in verse and prose by Rouget de Lisle, to which you give the date of 1797, instead of 1796, contains, to the contrary of your assertion, a positive note which indicates that the Marseillaise and the other songs of the author, with accompaniment for the piano, or the guitar, or the violin, are for sale at the house of Pleyel-Gaveaux, &c. Various specimens of these songs, with accompaniments by the author, exist in the Imperial Library of Paris, at London, at Berlin, &c., and I can assure you that Mme. Gail, your pupil, never made nor could make the accompaniments to the melodies composed by Rouget de Lisle.

"I affirm to you that the music of the fifty Chants Français (Paris, 1825), with the exception of that of the hymn to Liberty, music by Ignace Pleyel, was composed by my illustrious ancestor. I hope that you will not refuse him this very feeble glory, even in according to him a poor musical education, which I by no means dispute.

"Permit me, at least, to solicit your indulgence in favor of the poet, who joined to poetry the feeble qualities of a musician both as melodist and instrumentalist.

"I do not speak to you of Rouget de Lisle's knowledge as an engineer officer, of his labors and his military deeds, of his political writings, &c. The mention of the excellent things which he has done, would lead us too far from the object of my reclamation.

"For the present, I limit myself to addressing to you a reclamation, begging that you will oblige me with a prompt reply in correction of what you have said about the Marseillaise.

"I am at this moment, and have been for several months, engaged in collecting the scattered works, published or unpublished, of my illustrious ancestor, to make a book of them, which I propose to have printed.

"To-day I address you to clear up a fact, to which you in your article attribute an inexact notoriety, relying on a publication more than eight months posterior to the creation of the Chant de guerre, otherwise called the Marseillaise, by Rouget de Lisle, captain du génie at Strasburg." . . .

"Be good enough then to address me a prompt reply, and to indicate to me the number of the pieces to which you allude in your article.

"The truth about Rouget de Lisle is necessary, and you will permit me to solicit it of your frankness and your loyalty.

A. ROUGET DE LISLE.

Civil engineer, one of the principal editors of the Dictionary of arts and manufactures, &c."

In communicating the above letter to the Revue, M. Fétis addresses some remarks to the local editor. He says: "I have just replied to M. Rouget de Lisle, and shown him that it is not exact to say, as he does, that I attribute the Marseillaise to Navoigille; I do not attribute it, but simply say that this song was published, sold, distributed, under the name of Navoigille, and that Rouget de Lisle made no reclamation. M. Rouget de Lisle informs me that Gossec, having inserted the Marseillaise with instrumentation in his Offrande à la Liberté, attributed it to himself and published it under his own name. His ancestor, he says, was at that time detained at St. Germaine for incivisme, and could not reclaim; but he came out of prison, and he has said nothing; this is what seems to me inexplicable. Moreover, when he joined this piece with other melodies of his composition, which were published in 1827, he did not accompany it with any observation."

Here the editor in a note convicts M. Fétis of a slight error. The collection referred to seems to be the one which he has mentioned in the first edition of his Biographie universelle des Musiciens, in the article, Rouget de Lisle, and which was published by Maurice Schlesinger in 1830, under the title of: "Forty-eight French Songs, words by different authors, set to music with piano accompaniment by Rouget de Lisle." In this collection, No. 23, Hymne des Marseillais, is preceded by the following observation: "I made the words and the air of this song at Strasburg, in the night which followed the proclamation of war, at the end of April 1792. At first entitled Chant de l'armée du Rhin, it arrived at Marseillaise through the medium of a constitutional journal, edited under the auspices of the illustrious and unfortunate Diétrick. When it made its explosion some months afterward, I was wandering in Alsace under the weight of a destitution incurred at Huningue for having refused to adhere to the catastrophe of the 10th of August, and persecuted by the immediate proscription which, the next year, after the commencement of the terror, threw me into the prisons of Robespierre, from which I did not come out until after the 9th Thermidor. R. D. L."

M. Fétis goes on to say that he had never doubted the authorship of the Marseillaise before the discovery of the copies in his possession, and suggests that M. Rouget de Lisle might very easily terminate all debate upon the subject by simply producing the edition of the song, words and music, which he says was printed at Strasburg in 1792; after that production, no discussion would be possible.

"Meanwhile," he adds, "I find myself compelled to detach one of my copies from the volume which contains a collection of Twenty-four patriotic songs with guitar accompaniment, published at the Magazin de musique des fêtes Nationales, and send it to you, begging you to show it to persons who may desire to see this Marseillaise engraved under the name of Navoigille, I also beg you to preserve it with care; for if this copy should get lost, it is nearly certain that I should find no other means of completing my collection, which contains Le Chant du départ, by Méhul; L' Hymne de guerre, by the same; L' Hymne de la victoire, by Catel; the "Song for the inauguration of the bust of Marat," by Gossec; the "Funeral song on the death of representative Ferraud," by the same; Le chant des triumphe de la France, by Lesueur; L' Hymne du Combat, by Cherubini; the Carmagnole, &c."

Another theory of the origin of the melody of the Marseillaise, that of M. Castil-Blaze, is referred to in the interesting article of Miss Raymond in our last number.

NEW ORGAN IN WORCESTER. The importation of a first-class Organ from Europe for the Boston Music Hall is not without its influence, already, in stimulating among our own makers the desire to build, and among our musical societies and churches the desire to possess, works worthy to be called great organs. Worcester, at the "heart of the Commonwealth", takes the lead in this enterprise, as she has done in the cause of classical music generally outside of Boston. We are glad to see the following in the Palladium of Wednesday:

ORGAN FOR MECHANICS HALL. It is now settled that the organ to be built for the Mechanics Hall in this city, shall be worthy the place, and worthy the enterprise of our citizens, who have taken hold of the matter in earnest, determined to procure an instrument that should be among the best in the country. The committee to whom was entrusted the work of selection, have examined the finest instruments of the best American manufacturers, and decided upon giving the contract to Messrs. E. & G. G. Ilook, of Boston; a decision which cannot fail to be satisfactory. According to the specifications of the plan presented in the committee's report, the organ will have seventy-four stops and four key-boards, making it, in the opinion of the committee, the largest and best ever made in this country. In size it will stand next to the one recently imported from Germany, and now erecting in the Boston Music Hall. The subscriptions to the organ fund have been made with remarkable promptitude and liberality, seven thousand dollars having already been procured. In the opinion of the committee, about two thousand dollars more will cover the expense, and there will probably be no difficulty in obtaining that sum, now it is understood that the organ is to be a really magnificent instrument. It will become one of the attractions of our city, and have an enduring influence on a people who own so noble an instrument, consecrated as it is by some of the highest inspirations of genius.

It is expected that the organ will be completed about the first of September, 1864.

BOSTON MUSIC SCHOOL. We call the attention of those wishing to acquire a thorough musical education to the advertisement of this institution in another column. The Board of Instruction comprises persons of skill and long experience, who by their systematic method of teaching have secured to the Boston Music School a substantial reputation as a Musical Conservatory, of which one satisfactory evidence is the increasing number of students and the proof they give of progress in their studies.

MR. GEORGE R. BABCOCK, one of the sterling pianists and teachers of our city, whose patriotic ardor so far got the better of his fine artistic temperament, that he enlisted in the 44th regiment, and performed the duties of drum major and band master, with great zeal and ability, during their nine months' service, has come back safe and sound, and heartily welcomed by troops of friends and grateful fellow citizens, and now resumes his peaceful and harmonious profession with the new energy and peace of mind, which one must feel with such consciousness of having done his duty. Students of the piano, especially those who would cultivate a classical taste, and get more than a superficial knowledge of music, will scarcely do better than by going to him.

MR. JUNIUS HILL, of this city, having completed his three years course at the Conservatorium in Leipzig, zealously availing himself of its rich opportunities, arrived here a few weeks since, proposing to devote himself here to music as a profession. Verily the "Leipzigers" (of American birth) begin to multiply among us. We think we might count up eight or ten among our native followers of the musical profession, who have had the zeal to seek a thorough preparation in the school at Leipzig. We know no better sign of the respect in which Musical Art is beginning to be held among us.

MR. EBEN TOURJEE. This gentleman, well known as an earnest music teacher for many years in Newport, and more recently in East Greenwich, R. I., sailed last Saturday for Europe, where he intends making a musical tour of observation, visiting the principal conservatories, &c. A correspondent, writing from Providence, speaks thus of Mr. T.'s good works:

"Any person interested in the progress of musical education in this country, would have been pleased to be present at the annual examination of the Providence Conference Seminary and Musical Institute last month. This institution, which is situated at East Greenwich, R. I., has been in existence for a number of years; but music has not been made a speciality, until the present professor, Mr. Eben Tourjee, took charge of that department some five years since.

"He, with his usual go-ahead-ative-ness, set himself about procuring for the students ample opportunities to study and practise; and to make the thing more complete, he procured by subscription, a first-class two-rowed organ, and placed it in the hall, that the students might have a suitable instrument for practice.

"The result of these efforts was seen at the last examination; the proficiency of the music class (some fifty in number), rendered their part interesting and satisfactory. One could see that they had something more than a superficial knowledge of the art, for during the examination they showed proficiency in theory as well as practice.

"With the regular studies of the Organ, Piano, Voice, and Harmony, there has been imparted to them a general knowledge of the theory, under a department of general musical instruction, and in a manner which has deeply interested them. As an aid in this department, Mr. T. has collected a large variety of musical instruments, which enables him to practically demonstrate their form, tone and use; also models and parts of many others, to show their construction.

"The music rendered by the class, both vocal and instrumental, was of the highest order, for with such only has he endeavored to acquaint his pupils."

MISS LOUISA KELLOGG did not, after all, go to England; neither did BRIGNOLI. Both of them figure in the "Newport spray" of the Traveller; to wit:

The musical world is well represented. Signor Brignoli, the sweet-toned tenor, is here with a magnificent turn-out. He appears in robust health, but thus far refuses to sing either in private or public. This is deemed very unkind by the ladies, who are dying to hear some of his charming romanzas. Amadio, the baritone, is also here. The concerts given at Newport this season have not been pecuniarily successful.

It gives me great pleasure, and I am sure it will give pleasure to every opera attendant, to know that Miss Clara Louisa Kellogg, the delightful prima-donna of the Italian Opera, has not only fully recovered her voice, but from the rest and medical treatment received, greatly improved both in point of compass and endurance. She has been here some weeks and is quite a pet. The report published in the Boston papers that she had lost her voice and was adapting her talents to the drama, was an error. She appears next season in opera in New York and Boston.

Music Abroad.

London.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE. Weber's Oberon, with a splendid cast (Tietjens, Alboni, Trebelli, Sims Reeves, Gassier, &c.), was the principal event of the latter half of July. It was brought out with unusual care, under the immediate auspices of Mr. Benedict, who was a pupil of Weber. Yet the public, and the critics, especially the Athenaeum, seem to have found it dull; not that it does not contain some of Weber's most exquisite music, but because the story is so poor. Nevertheless it ran through several nights.—Other pieces have been: the Nozze di Figaro, with Tietjens as the Countess, Trebelli as Cherubino, and Mme. Liebhardt (for the first time, and most successfully) as Susanna; Les Huguenots; Gounod's Faust, which is still popular; Figaro again; Faust, three times more; Il Ballo in Maschera; besides alternate dramatic performances by Ristori.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA. Adelina Patti has added to the list of her triumphs by appearing in two new parts for her: that of Adina in L' Elisir d' Amore, and that of Maria in La Figlia del Reggimento;—both well-worn operas, which the critics say she made as good as new.—Gounod's Faust is having its run here too.—The Huguenots introduced Mme. Pauline Lucca, from the Royal Opera, Berlin, in the part of Valentine. The Musical World finds in her a powerful voice and considerable dramatic energy, but thinks the part of Valentine not suited to her.—The Athenaeum says:

She is very nearly as small of stature as Madame Gaetani Piccolomini—pleasing looking, but not more; nor, to judge from her acting as Valentine, in "Les Huguenots," has she the reality of dramatic power. In the conspiracy scene, where so much may be indicated, she was null; in the passion duet, though she ran and struggled duly, the weight of the emotion lay entirely on Signor Mario, who more than once appeared to be hampered rather than helped by her. Her voice is a soprano, reaching C in alt easily; in its upper notes particularly of a hard and metallic quality; sufficiently powerful and well in tune. She seems to phrase her music carelessly; especially in such cantabile passages as the largo of her duet with Marcel, her romance, and the opening of the grand duet with Raoul offer. Much execution is not called for; the scale descending from c in the first-named duet, and the chromatic scale, likewise descending, in the second one,—were dashed at, not done. The trials recalled our Berlin impressions, where we heard her in florid music; and we must wait till we see her more fairly tested ere we can pronounce her to be satisfactory. Her voice does not appear to blend well with others in concerted pieces, but that is a quality belonging to our time, with its imperfect culture of the art of singing, which implies the art of listening too.

MADAME LOUISE MICHAL, the Swedish singer, gave a morning concert at the Hanover Square Rooms on Wednesday, the 22nd inst., in the presence of a fashionable and crowded audience. She was supported by first-rate artists—among others, by Madame Lind-Goldschmidt—and the programme was of the best quality. The solo selected by Madame Goldschmidt was Handel's air, "What passion cannot music raise and quell?" from St Cecilia's Ode (violinello obligato, Herr Daubert). Her other contributions were three two-part songs by Mendelssohn, which she sang with Madame Louise Michal, and a duet on Swedish national melodies, arranged by Herr Goldschmidt, in which she was assisted by the same lady. The Swedish songs were in the highest degree successful. Madame Michal's solos were the recitative and air "Crudele" add "Non mi dir" (Don Giovanni), and an aria from Adam's "Poupée de Nuremberg" (violin obligato, Herr Auer), both received with hearty applause. The other singers were Mlle. Ardt, Madame Trebelli, Mlle. Volpini, and Signor Bettini. Mlle. Ardt won an encore in M. Gounod's serenade, "Quand tu chantes." The solo instrumentalists were Messrs. Charles Hallé, Otto Goldschmidt, and Leopold Auer; the conductors, MM. Arditi, Pinsuti, and Otto Goldschmidt.

Germany.

MUNICH.—The Musical Academy, under the direction of Franz Lachner, is to give a grand Musical Festival in the Glass Palace, on the 27th, 28th, and 29th of September.

The repertory for the days of the Festival has been settled as follows: First day (in the Glass-Palace, between 11 a.m. and 2 p.m.)—Symphony in E flat ("Eroica"), by Beethoven; Israel in Egypt, oratorio by Handel. Second day (in the Glass Palace, between 11 a.m. and 2 p.m.): 1st Part—First Suite (D minor) for orchestra, by Franz Lachner. 2nd Part—Motet for eight voices by Palestrina; Scene from the oratorio of Tobias, by Haydn; Prelude and Fugue for orchestra, by J. Seb. Bach; finale from the second act of Idomeneo, by Mozart; March and chorus from Die Ruinen von Athen, by Beethoven. 3rd Part—"Ode on St. Cecilia's Day," by Handel. On the third day, the performances (in the Royal Odeon) will consist more especially of piano, violin, and vocal compositions executed by several of the most eminent artists in Germany. Mad. Schumann and Herr Joachim, of Hanover, have already promised their services.

Considerable additions to the forces of the Royal Orchestra have already been secured from all parts of Germany. Thus strengthened, the orchestra will be augmented to about 100 violins, 40 tenors, 30 violoncellos, and 30 double basses, with a corresponding increase of the wind instruments. The chorus, too, will form an imposing mass; and it is to be hoped that, above all, the Munich Vocal Associations, already invited to take part in the proceedings, as they did at the previous festival, will furnish a satisfactory contingent. A fact that ought to be mentioned is that an organ will be erected in the Glass Palace, in order more especially to strengthen the effect of Handel's works; this is an orchestral addition that ought to be welcomed all the more, as it may ultimately prove the cause of the erection of an instrument of this description in the Royal Odeon, the Academy of Music having resolved that, after the expenses of the Festival have been defrayed, any surplus shall be applied to the purchase of one.

SCHWERIN.—The third Mecklenburg Musical Festival was held in this city in July. There was a fine orchestra; the Vocal Associations of the city and neighborhood furnished the chorus; the principal solo-singers were Frau Harriers-Wippen and Fri. De Ahna, of the Berlin Royal Opera House, Dr. Schmidt, bass, from the Imperial Opera House, Vienna, and Herr Otto, of the famous Dom-chor at Berlin. The Court capellmeister, Schmidt, conducted. A correspondent of one of the musical journals says:

On the first day, we had Handel's Judas Maccabaeus, in which all concerned had an opportunity for a brilliant display of their combined powers. The choruses were remarkable for their ready precision; the orchestra appeared inspired by the spirit of the music, while the solos of the four artists mentioned above rivalled each other in the liveliness of their conception, and the purity and noble character of their style. The second day was glorified by the performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, in which the solo performers deserved all the greater praise, since the very highest art has here to contend with almost invincible difficulties. The symphony was preceded by a "Sanctus" from J. S. Bach's High Mass; the "Hallelujah" from Handel's Messiah; and scenes from Gluck's Orpheus, in which Mdle. De Ahna gave proof of her fine natural vocal powers and the admirable care with which they have been developed.

On the third day we had exclusively smaller pieces, calculated more for individual display. In these, also, the art of the exponents was shown in the most favorable light. To Madame Harriers-Wippen belongs the merit of having deserved the greatest amount of praise. In addition to some songs by Taubert, she gave the grand air from Weber's Oberon in a manner that enchanted the whole audience. Mdle. De Ahna sang the "Sextus" air from Titus; Herr C. Reinecke, from Leipzig, performed Beethoven's C minor Concerto; and several other artists executed various pieces with that perfect correctness which merits unqualified praise. Loud applause followed each performance, and it may truly be asserted that this festival was far more brilliant than the two preceding ones. The warmest marks of approbation were those lavished on the two ladies, Madame Harriers-Wippen and Mdle. De Ahna, who had, in addition to this, to congratulate themselves on being presented with costly bracelets from the Grand Duke.

LEIPZIG. The Gesangverein der Pauliner celebrated the 41st anniversary of its foundation, on the 7th July, under the direction of Dr. Langer. Among the pieces performed, Mendelssohn's Stiftungsfeier; Riets's Maienszeit, and Petschke's Neuer Frühling, were received with more than usual applause.—On the 21st July, Riedel's Verein gave a grand concert at four o'clock, p.m., in the Thomaskirche. The first piece was the "Benedictus a 12" for three choruses, by the Venetian composer, Giovanni Gabrieli, who lived about the year 1600. For its execution, the members of Riedel's Verein had been joined by the Arion and Paulus Vocal Associations, as well as by Richard Müller's, and members of others. The same singers, amounting to about 400, afterwards took part, also, in the "Jerusalem" of Giovanni Biondi, which precedes the celebrated Lamentation by Allegri (1630), to be heard every Good Friday in the Sixtine Chapel. The "Lamentation" itself was confided to a select few from Riedel's Verein. A long contralto solo, in the shape of a psalm by Benedetto Marcello (1720), which lasted nearly half an hour, was sung by Mad. Krebs-Michalesi, from Dresden, the obbligato violoncello accompaniment being played by Herr Lubeck, a member of the Gewandhaus orchestra. A "Suite," by Muffat (who lived about the year 1727), consisting of overture, andantino, fugue, and finale, was the fourth piece, and was played by the celebrated organ virtuoso, now so frequently mentioned, Herr Thomas. In obedience to a generally expressed wish, some pieces which had formed part of the programme of the previous concert were repeated. They are the sacred songs of the Hussites: "Feldgesang der Tabornen," and "Gesang der Kelchner," as well as an old Bohemian "Morgenlied," with harmonies by Leopold Zwormar of Prague. Mad. Krebs-Michalesi then gave the 18th Psalm by Heinrich Schütz (1647); this was followed by the grand composition for three choruses, "Saul, was verfolgst du mich," in which the four hundred singers already mentioned were strengthened by a great number of additional ones. The concert was brought to a close by Wolfgang Frank's sacred song, "Alles was Odem hat, lobe den Herrn" (1687), harmonized in four and seven parts by Arrey von Dommer (1858).

BREMEN.—The series of Historical Musical Evenings, got up by the Artists' Association, has been brought to a close for this year. In the course of the fifteen concerts, of which the series consisted, a sketch was given of the development of music from the commencement of the last century to the present day. The concerts began with Bach and Handel, the principal matter brought under notice being the development of sacred music. They then went on to deal with the first attempts at exclusively instrumental music, including the works of Scarlatti, Clementi, and Haydn, thus coming down to the forms of art characterizing the classical period. Opera and its reform by Gluck and Mozart, and the development of the sonata, the quartet, and the symphony, occupied a considerable time in connection with the above epoch, but most of the evenings were devoted to the art of the nineteenth century. After instrumental music, as represented by Beethoven, had been fully discussed, attention was directed to romantic opera, with Weber, Spohr, and Marschner, and then to the "Lied" or song, with Schubert and Schumann. Mendelssohn being brought forward at the conclusion as a reformer and restorer of the classical forms. To this composer was devoted the fifteenth and last evening, the programme for which consisted of songs by him, airs from St. Paul, the Piano-quartet in B minor (Op. 3), and the Stringed-Quartet in B flat major (Op. 87). It is intended to give, next winter, a series of concerts of which compositions of the present day shall constitute the principal feature. The course will include works by Franz Liszt, Ferdinand Hiller, Niels Gade, Julius Riets, Wilhelm Taubert, Carl Rheinthal, Robert Franz, Carl Reinecke, Anton Rabinstein, Albert Dietrich, Franz Lachner, and Richard Wagner.

VIENNA.—After having come to an arrangement with the committee, Herr Johannes Brahms has definitively accepted the post of chorus master of the sing-akademie.

BADEN.—On the 7th inst., a grand classical concert was given here. The band from Mannheim, under the direction of Herr Lachner, performed Beethoven's Symphony in D major. Among the soloists were Madame Viardot, Madame Clara Schumann, Herr Jean Becker, and Herr Müller (double bass) from Darmstadt. The chorus sang Mozart's "Ave verum" and a Psalm by Marcello.

OPERA IN ITALY.—During the first six months of the present year, fifteen new operas were produced at Italian Theatres. They were: Rienzi, by Peri, at the Scala, Milan; L'Eros delle Austrie, by Lucilla, at the Teatro Regio, Modena; Feruccio by Maglioni, at the Teatro Pagliano, Florence; Cinica Simondi, by Brindangoli, in Assisi; Zaira, by Corona, at Leghorn; Piccarda Donati, by Moscuza, at the Pergola Theatre, Florence; Beatrice Cenci, by Rota, at the Teatro Regio, Parma; Vittoria, la Madre degli Eserciti, by Bona, at the Carlo Fenice, Genoa; Orio Sorango, by Zescevic, at Trieste; Il Di di St. Michele, by Quarenghi, at the Comic Opera House, Milan; Rienzi, by Kaschperoff, at the Pergola Theatre, Florence; Giovanni di Castiglia, by Battista, at the San Carlo, Naples; La Fidanziata di Marco Bozzari, by Frontini, in Catania; and Ezzelino da Romano, by Noverasco, at the Carlo Fenice, Genoa. Furthermore, a new opera, Il Castello Maledetto, by Lamlet, was produced in Corfu; and Ivanhoe, by Suri, in Bastia.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC. Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Up aloft, amid the rigging. W. H. Weiss. 35

Written by Dr. Mackay, probably while homeward bound, on the ocean. Take it to sea with you, if you are going, and sing it while "rolling home across the sea."

Garibaldi's Hymn. (Arouse thee, Italia.) 25

The music is already known as an instrumental piece; but this, to most persons, will be the first appearance of the words. They are dignified, and yet full of fire. This lyric is destined to hold a permanent place among national songs.

Don't whistle near the door. Ballad. F. Beyer. 25

A sweet little trifle for young lovers to sing, the "moral" being, not to "whistle" too loud "near the door" for your fair one, while the "old folks" are about.

Minnie Grey. Ballad. G. C. Whittridge. 25

Minnie Grey died, and was buried in a romantic graveyard near a stream. It is a pity that these pretty girls leave us so. There were Rosalie, Lily Dale, and a host of others, who could not be kept alive. But had they not died, nobody would have sung about them; and Minnie Grey's song is as melodious as any of the others.

Tarry not long. Ballad. F. Mendelssohn Bartholdy. 25

Some poets have the rare art of compressing into two or three short verses all the beauty which others would spread out over as many pages. This ballad is simple and short, but shows the hand of a first-rate poet, and a first-rate musician.

Cuffee's War Song. L. B. Starkweather. 25

Courtship. Comic Duet. C. W. Glover. 25

A capital duet, funny, easy, classical, melodious.

Instrumental Music.

Charity. (La Charité.) Thecla Badarzewska. 40

Another of the series of "La Foi, l'Espérance, et la Charité," all of standard goodness, and may be classed as sacred piano pieces.

Hope. (L'Espérance.) Thecla Badarzewska. 40

Number two of the above series.

Carl Faust's Alexandra March. 25

The blessings of teachers always light on those who compose good easy music. Carl F. has given us something very fresh and brilliant, and at the same time quite easy.

Field Flowers. (Korn Blumen.)

Light and pretty pieces for small hands.

T. Oestm.

A succession of light and very neat variations on German popular songs. The one at present to be noticed is,

Come home with me, sister. 25

It is equal to the best. Give it to your pupil for her first "variations."

THE MUSIC OF NATURE. Or an attempt to prove that what is passionate and pleasing in the art of singing, speaking, and performing upon musical instruments, is derived from the sounds of the animated world.

By William Gardner. $3 00

"Gardiner's Music of Nature" made a great sensation on its first appearance, and is, and will be, a book suggestive of much thought to musicians, and a pleasant work for any one to read.

ADALBERT GYROWETZ.

CHAPTER V.

G. in Naples; falls among thieves.—Nelson and Lady Hamilton.—G. at Court.—Revisits Rome and Florence.—Milan; lives in clover there.—Zingarelli.—The Conservatorium.—La Scala and its orchestra; what the public listened to.—Genoa.

Among the distinguished persons whom Gyrowetz knew, was the English Ambassador, Lord Hamilton, to whom he was introduced by Hadrava. Hamilton received him very graciously, and invited him often to dinner and to his music parties. His house stood upon a slightly rising ground in the Strada Riaja, and by it was a pretty large open space belonging to it. As the police could not interfere with any person in the house or grounds of the English minister, there was always a company of rogues on this place, awaiting the termination of the criminal processes issued against them, or until by some other means their liberty was secured. Their friends and relatives brought them thither their "daily bread."

One evening as Gyrowetz was returning from the royal garden, he was stopped near Hamilton's house by a company of thieves, and robbed of every thing he had about him; the approach of a carriage saved him from further mishandling.

Another time, as he was resting on a seat on the Molo, of a beautiful summer evening, he suddenly felt a strong pull at his foot, and looked round just in season to see a thief making off at full speed with the large silver buckle which he had torn from Gyrowetz's shoe. There was no use in shouting or calling for help; the thief was off.

Thieving was then a highly flourishing business in Naples. One evening a lady, on stepping out of her coach at the theatre, had her rings torn from her ears; the thieves instantly hid themselves in the crowd; there they were safe, because it was the business of the sbirri—not of the people—to discover and catch malefactors. The thieves there were celebrated for their skill in stealing pocket handkerchiefs; but the owners could easily recover them, as they were all very soon exposed for sale, hung upon long strings in the square Largo di Castello, and parted with for a trifle. "In this square is always a great collection of the so-called lazzaroni, sitting on the ground, some playing cards, others amusing themselves with a screaming play (la mora)—all eating macaroni, cooked in large kettles and sold on the spot. For the most part these lazzaroni live in the streets, without a roof to their heads, and support life mainly by hanging about the inns, cleaning the clothes of guests, and ready for any small service; they are contented with little, eat their macaroni singing and joking thereby, as if they were the happiest creatures on earth!"

This was the time, when, says Gyrowetz, Lord Hamilton called over from England a young lady accompanied by her mother, to whom he furnished the best masters Naples could afford, in the languages, music, and all feminine accomplishments.

She very soon became one of the most accomplished, as she was already one of the most amiable of young women, and Hamilton finally married her and lived most happily with her. Some years later he died, and she became the wife of the celebrated English Admiral Nelson, with whom she sailed to Egypt and remained throughout the war on board the fleet. After the death of Nelson she returned to England, where she closed her life.—In which history good old Gyrowetz was sadly out!

One bright spot in Gyrowetz's experience at Naples was his appearance at Court, which was upon this wise:—His friend Hadrava was a favorite with the King, to whom he gave lessons upon a then popular Neapolitan instrument called the Lyra organizzata, and through him Gyrowetz obtained an order to compose six serenades for that instrument. They were soon finished and pleased the king to such a degree, that he desired to see the composer, and to hear the symphonies, which it was well known he had written. So upon a day appointed a concert was arranged in the palace, called the Caserta, in which the symphonies were performed with a grand orchestra. Gyrowetz directed as first violin, and Paisiello, first Kapellmeister, sat at the piano-forte. Universal applause.

During a pause in the performance, the queen ordered the composer to be presented, there in the presence of all the company. (This queen must, I take it, have been the daughter of the Empress Maria Theresa, and naturally took an interest in a rising young Austrian composer; just as her sister, Maria Antoinette, took part with and for Gluck, a few years earlier in Paris.) She asked a great variety of questions about his family, studies, and "on all sorts of topics," and so dismissed him to go on with the concert. "This extraordinary favor—the queen herself speaking with a young composer, and calling him to her in presence of all the company—threw all beholders into a state of astonishment and wonder; for no such grace had ever before been vouchsafed to an artist—that her majesty herself had spoken with him in such a concert, at which all the nobility of Naples was assembled, and not only this, but had carried on a conversation!"—This wondrous good

*This is not the place to correct the story of Nelson and Lady Hamilton. But there is no harm in giving in a note a story (as well as I can recollect it) told me by Madam de F., one of the most accomplished and intellectual women whom I have known personally.

When Madam de F. was a young woman, she landed at Calais (or Boulogne?) with her father, and went to a hotel. Looking out of the window afterward, she saw a woman address her father, as he was crossing the court. He glanced at her face and threw up his hands, with an exclamation betokening the utmost astonishment. After some conversation, he took out his pocket book and made the woman a present. When he came in he told his daughter: "That was Lady Hamilton, and she is starving!"

fortune gained him the envy of some of his contemporaries—but after the concert he drove back to Naples and—lived on as before.

But not exactly. He became acquainted with a Swiss General Aufclermayer and his family—consisting of his wife and two daughters. The acquaintance ripened into friendship. The young man's talents made him a valuable addition to the musical parties at the house—and an affection, encouraged by the parents, which sprang up between him and Francisca, or Fanny, the younger daughter—an affection pure and noble—made the house to him a home, and gave him a period of singular happiness.

Fanny was taken ill with scarlet fever, and lay long between life and death. A very singular circumstance of her condition was, that as her mind became affected, she would take no medicine from the hand of any person but that of Gyrowetz or a young officer, who was also intimate in the family. Neither her parents nor her sister Isabella, would she have about—and the two young men actually performed the weary and wearing services of nurse, day and night, regardless of the danger of infection, hoping against hope that she might be saved.

But she died, and Gyrowetz had now but one wish—to get away from Naples. This could not be done immediately, for he had an order to compose a Notturmo for the king's Lyra organizzata, and again to direct his symphonies in the royal concert. These orders fulfilled, and with a present from the king of 200 onciae in gold (rather more than $500, I take it to be), he finished up his affairs, and with plenty of letters of introduction, left Naples and went on to Rome, whence he had now been absent some two years. Visits, sight-seeing and the like, took up the short time he remained there. Boroni and Anfossi he found still alive, and full of interest in him and in his adventures in Naples. Then on to Florence, where he found the state of music greatly improved since his former visit, owing to the good influence of Nardini and several German piano-forte instructors who had made that city their home. From Florence he travelled to Milan, passing Bologna in the midst of the Carnival (1789), and remaining a day or two to witness the sports; through Parma and Lodi, where carnival processions of masques met him on the road and astonished him by their extravagances—the carnival lasting longer here, owing to the adoption of the Ambrosian ritual; and so on to Milan, where he remained several months.

Gyrowetz's reminiscences of Milan were very pleasant, as they well might be, considering the great kindness and attention which he met in all quarters.

His first visit was naturally to the Austrian Minister, Count Wiltsek, who received him most kindly, and introduced him to his wife—a member of the noble family, Clary. He was invited to dine there the next day, and very often afterwards so long as he remained in the city. At that time, the nobility and rich people of Milan seemed to vie with each other in hospitality. Every letter of introduction brought him invitations to dine, and so he appeared at all the first tables in the city. He mentions in particular the Countess Anguisola, whose table was always set for thirty persons, and to which every stranger, who brought her proper letters of introduction, had a general invitation—he could come daily if he liked; and the oftener, the better was the Countess pleased. So in many houses offence was almost taken if the stranger did not come often, and he would be asked "if he was put out at any thing, or had not been treated with due attention?" and the like. Here poor Gyrowetz, instead of spending his last coppers for a bit of cheese and a bunch of grapes for dinner, as in Naples, was forced sometimes to eat two dinners, to keep on good terms with his entertainers.

The once so celebrated Zingarelli—whose air, "Ombra adorata," from "Romeo and Juliet," was such a favorite of E. T. W. Hoffmann, as well as of all the musical world—at this time some thirty years of age—was visited by Gyrowetz at the house of the Marchesa Litta, where he lived as a family friend. He was sitting at a small square piano-forte, composing, and clad in a large dressing-gown. He looked very feeble, and complained sadly of his ill health. He very seldom went out, and devoted his time exclusively to composition. [His "sickness was not unto death," for he lived until May 5, 1837, dying then at the age of 85].

Another acquaintance was the Chapelmaster Minoja, then director of the Conservatorium, an exceedingly polite, kind man, who showed his visitor the entire arrangement of the institution. Gyrowetz was taken into all the rooms, and many of the pupils were called upon to give proofs of their talents and acquirements. The one who made the deepest impression was a beautiful young girl, whose magnificent voice and already superb use of it gave the brightest hopes of her future on the stage, for which she was intended. The building is large and beautiful, and the boys' side is completely separated from that of the girls. The director and professors are paid by the State, and the latter have to pass a severe examination made by the director, who is to judge of their fitness for the position.

Six virtuosos on wind instruments from the Duke of Parma's orchestra were then in Milan giving concerts. The leader was Alexander Rolla, who was also the great viola player of his time, and became at a later period director of the La Scala orchestra. [Schilling's Lexicon is clearly in error in giving the date of his birth 1780. The notice of his death in the Leip. Allg. Zeitung, for Nov. 10, 1841, gives his age as 85 years and six months.]

In the Scala—a theatre of such extraordinary beauty and size, that "a stranger upon entering it has a sort of awe come over him," modulating into astonishment and wonder—the orchestra consisted of 80 members, each a virtuoso on his instrument. There were 9 contrabassists and six or eight (?) violoncellists. The middle parts in the orchestra had to be strengthened by the violoncelli, in order to bring out the proper harmonic effect, as otherwise these parts were overwhelmed by the other instruments. Here grand operas and ballets alone were given, and the very best talent engaged; but unluckily there was always such noise and confusion during the performance of opera, that little of the music could be heard, and a real lover of the art could only be dissatisfied; except when an air or some other single piece happened to be a favorite, when there was peace and people listened; but this was no sooner ended than the racket began again. [Even to this day there is no inducement for a composer in writing for a theatre in Italy, to have an eye to the effect of his work as a whole—a few striking melodies and concerted pieces are all the public demands—they are all it will listen to.] It was different with the ballet; there the eye was engaged, and both the acting and the dancing commanded attention.

There were then three other theatres in the city for opera and drama:—the Teatro Rè; la Canobbiana and the Carcano; and a fourth in which the pieces were played by puppets.*

Music was very flourishing, especially that in the churches, which ordinarily was produced alla capella, but on festivals with full orchestra.

While in Milan, Gyrowetz composed very industriously, and produced several new quartets, which were published by subscription and, through the good offices of the Countess Wiltsehek, with success sufficient to restore the young man's finances, and enable him to leave for Paris.

In Genoa Count Pallavicini received him most kindly, had his new quartets performed, and was so pleased with them as to arrange a private concert, by which their author gained 50 ducats.

CHAPTER VI.

Stormy passage to France.—Finds the Revolution; where's your cockade?—Marseilles; its theatres and music.—Lyons.—New Quartets "by one Gyrowetz."—Seen and greeted in the orchestra.—To Paris with rich hopes and lean purse.—Cross-questioned about politics.—How the great publisher receives him; money and orders.—His symphonies taken for Haydn's.—Revolution everywhere; chivalrous adventure.

From Genoa he sailed in a merchant vessel for Marseilles, and had a terrible time of it. Of the four vessels which sailed in company, one was taken by Tunis pirates, the others were nearly lost in storms. Gyrowetz was nearly killed by being thrown from side to side in his small cabin. The passengers finally all had to join at the ship's pumps—the provisions gave out—the captain cursed and swore—"the sailors and passengers screamed, howled, prayed to the holy Virgin, Saint Antony and all the saints for aid," and finally, toward the close of the second storm, a harbor was made behind the Hyeres Islands, somewhere near Toulon, and the passengers, leaving the ship and their luggage, were glad to hire asses and make their way thither as best they could. Gyrowetz had taken compassion upon a steerage passenger, whom the captain had treated with special spite. He had kept him from starving by dividing his own scanty food with him, and now was aiding him to reach Paris. The young man was a runaway son of a Hamburg merchant.

On crossing the boundary into France, Gyrowetz was surprised at being asked after his cockade, and still more, upon expressing his surprise, at being told that every one now coming into France must wear one, because on the 14th of July a Revolution had taken place. To which the German, who had never troubled himself with politics, asked: "What is that—this Revolution?" So the events of July 1789 were related to him, and he bought a cockade and fastened it to a button-hole.

* These puppet theatres were not uncommon at that period. For Prince Esterházy's Haydn wrote a number of operas.

From Toulon he hired a carriage and went on to Marseilles, taking the young Hamburger with him. He had hoped to sell some of his compositions there, but everything was in confusion and nothing could be done. He was told, however, that in the Musical Society of that city symphonies by him had been played with applause, and that several of his compositions had been printed in Paris—a piece of news to Gyrowetz—having never heard of it in Italy, and not knowing how anything of his had reached Paris—he certainly had never sent music thither. This circumstance naturally made him eager to reach the capital; but he must await the arrival of his effects, still on shipboard. Meantime he tried in vain to find a situation for his young companion, and was forced to keep him with him, and employed himself in seeing the sights, and in observations upon the theatre and opera. He found a fine orchestra and a pretty good company. As a proof of the good sense of the audience, he mentions that one evening an actor, appearing improperly dressed, was fairly hissed off the stage, and forced to make himself respectable before coming on again to go on with his part;—speaks also of his delight and surprise at the universal silence and attention of the people during the performance, so much the reverse of his Italian experience, where the uproar always prevented anything like enjoyment. Music at that time stood high in Marseilles; there were many fine professors and dilettanti fond of performing good music, and keeping it up to a high standard in the churches. Singing boys added to the excellence of the performances with their high voices. There were good organists and violinists; the wind instruments, however, were rather inferior. The military music was poor, but at a later period this was improved by the example of German bands. At last the ship arrived, and Gyrowetz with "sack and pack," as the Germans say, and incumbered with his young Hamburger, was off for Lyons.

Through all this journey he heard French only from the cultivated classes, a provincial patois being the common speech.

Every village and town had its gallows, whereon many an aristocrat had been executed, who had been unable to escape the fanatical fury of the people. At every municipality the passport had to be examined before the traveller was allowed to proceed. Every evening he saw in the villages that he passed, the boys collected, singing revolutionary songs, dancing to a drum and fife, or jesting and mocking at the aristocracy. Passing Vaucluse, where the celebrated spring rushes fresh and cool from a rock into a huge basin, he heard a story of an Englishman, who was so delighted with the beauty and singularity of the spring, as to exclaim: "It must be the greatest pleasure in the world to die in this basin!" Seized with this idea, he went home to London, put his affairs in order, hurried back to Vaucluse, jumped into the basin and was drowned.

In Lyons, Gyrowetz found a place with a merchant for his companion—who expressed the deepest gratitude for the kindness showed him, promised to write to his benefactor—and that benefactor never heard of him afterwards.

Our traveller was pleased also in Lyons with the boys in the church choirs, and adds that (then) the schools for singing boys were kept up with great care, and the funds for this purpose wisely employed. Happening to pass a music shop, he entered, and made some general inquiries as to the state of music, which the shopkeeper answered politely. He then asked if he could obtain any new music at his shop? After a few moments thought the other replied with vivacity: "Oh yes, some new quartets have just appeared in Paris, composed by a person named Gyrowetz, and have been so well received, that within a very short time several editions have had to be printed!"

Who can describe the feelings which such news aroused in the mind of the young composer! He however did not make himself known, but simply requested permission to look at a copy, which the other handed him. Gyrowetz took it and, trembling with joy, looked for the first time upon his work in print! But he never could discover who sold these quartets to Imbeault, who had honored them with a beautiful dress, both as to engraving and paper. Still without making himself known, he took the copy and going away by himself indulged his joy, and feasted upon the hope that now his success in Paris was secured. In the evening he went to the theatre, took a place in a box and listened to an operetta which was very well given. Between the acts a member of the orchestra, who had seen him in Vienna or Italy, recognized him and passed the word along, there is Gyrowetz! The entire orchestra rose and greeted him with apparent joy, and as soon as the performance was over, hastened to him with an invitation to go with them to the house of a great lover of music, where he would pass a delightful evening, and where the master of the house would rejoice to make his acquaintance. Gyrowetz accepted, and was as much pleased as the gentleman himself, when they recognized in each other the music-dealer and the customer of a few hours before. After some gentle reproofs for his modesty in not making himself known, he was treated to a fine supper; then music of his composition was played, and so passed the night in friendship and joy. This gentleman assured Gyrowetz that he would find Imbeault to be an honorable and generous publisher, who would take all his new compositions and pay him handsomely for them. This was pleasant prophecy to the composer, for his funds were so nearly exhausted, as hardly to be able to reach Paris. As to the prophecy in the end—we shall see.

And so with high hopes he journeyed on towards Paris. By and by he had to pawn his watch, but obtained enough to pay the diligence driver, and to go to Paris from Auxerre by boat on the Seine—but this was long before the days of steamboats. The boat was large and comfortable, had a billiard table and other means of amusement, and as it drew near Paris, became filled with passengers, many of them people of elegance and culture. But the few francs in Gyrowetz's purse rapidly disappeared, and he landed in Paris with six sous only in his pocket. Depending, however, upon Imbeault, he went into the first good inn, took a room, ordered a good supper, and waited for the arrival of his baggage, which he had not removed from the diligence when he took to the boat. In the public room he found several members of the National guard, who talked nothing but revolution and politics, and cross-examined the newly arrived stranger with great severity. He parried their attacks, succeeded in convincing them that he knew nothing about politics, and finally they parted very good friends. But with what thoughts of the morrow did he retire for the night. Every thing depended upon his reception at La pomme d'or, Rue St. Honoré, the music-shop of Monsieur Imbeault! At last the morning came, and the young man entered the shop in the Rue St. Honoré. There he found a finely dressed woman, busy at a table with day-books and ledgers, who coldly inquired what he wanted? To speak with M. Imbeault, was the answer. She cast a piercing look upon him, and noting his common travelling clothes—his trunks had not yet arrived—and that he looked "rather English" (which I will not try to translate), answered, that M. Imbeault was not at home. The other expressed his sorrow and disappointment, not to have met that gentleman, as it was very necessary for him to have some talk with him. "And who are you then," asked she, "that have so strong a desire to speak with M. Imbeault?" He replied, that he was a German musical composer, and his name Gyrowetz.

At this name she sprang up in evident joy, and quickly asked, if he was the same Gyrowetz who wrote the beautiful quartets, which were making such a sensation, and were so much liked?

Upon his saying that he was indeed the same, her face and voice instantly changed their expression, and she added in the utmost friendliness, that M. Imbeault would immediately appear and receive him with the highest consideration. She rang, and in a few moments Gyrowetz saw a tall, fine looking man, dressed in a white morning gown, coming down the stairs which led into the shop. The wife introduced the young man, and Imbeault received him with all the kindness he could wish, and invited him at once into his private room, where the first question was, whether he had brought any new compositions? Upon Gyrowetz answering that he had, Imbeault replied, that he would purchase them all, and pay higher than any other publisher in Paris. Of course the composer promised him every thing he had, but he must await the arrival of the mail coach with his baggage.

The publisher invited his guest to dinner, and, noting the condition of his clothes, remarked that a good and elegant dress was necessary in Paris, and that a good deal of money was also needed there, concluding by asking if he might not then, perhaps, be in want of funds? Gyrowetz answered frankly that he was. Imbeault went to a secretary, took out 600 francs and handed them to him, with the remark, that he paid him this sum on account, and that they would afterwards come to terms as to the rest.

The feelings may be left to the fancy of the reader, which swelled the breast of a young man, who had landed the evening before in a large strange capital with six small copper coins only in his pocket, in a time of revolution, with no friend or acquaintance, no dependence upon or hope in any other resource than his musical talents and an overruling providence.

His promise to bring his new music—symphonies and quartets—upon the arrival of his effects, was soon fulfilled. A day was appointed to try them. The first performers from the orchestra of the Grand Opera were invited to take part in the trial, and Gyrowetz saw delightedly with what zeal and pleasure these French artists labored to fully comprehend and adequately perform all that was put before them.

Two symphonies were played with the best results and with great applause, and their composer placed the parts of a third (in G) upon the music stands. To his surprise the musicians began to cast glances of astonishment and almost of suspicion at him, and at length the question was put, if that symphony was really his composition? Upon his affirmative reply they asked him for the score, examined it throughout measure by measure, and finding all note for note as they expected, they began with one voice to congratulate him, and to inform him that this work was already in print, and a pièce favorite in all theatres and concerts, but was engraved under Joseph Haydn's name! Gyrowetz was naturally surprised, and asked how that could be? and who could venture to publish his works in Paris under a strange name? The reply was that it was a great compliment to him, to have his symphonies taken for Haydn's, and that Schlesinger was the publisher.

Upon application to Schlesinger, he learned that a violin virtuoso, named Tost, had brought these symphonies to Paris, and had sold them as being compositions of Haydn, under whose name they had therefore been engraved. Tost was that music-director in Esterhazy's service, who had led in the performance of the symphonies while in manuscript, and had secretly had them copied. Schlesinger promised to put Gyrowetz's name upon them, and did so, but down to Gyrowetz's death copies were still to be found bearing Haydn's name. The matter was settled as well as it could be, and another day appointed to try six new quartets. The composer was again delighted with the evident interest and zeal of the performers. They had their fun, too, on the occasion. A large snuff-box was placed on a table, and every one who made a mistake had to take a pinch of snuff, bear the jokes of his fellows, and pay a small fine. The result was good, the applause fervent, and the quartets were immediately engraved.

Imbeault followed this purchase with an order for three new symphonies, which gave Gyrowetz work enough for his mornings. He took daily lessons in English also, from a man named Davis, who told one day, as he came to his lesson, that a master baker had just been hanged by the mob on a lantern, for baking bad bread and letting it grow mouldy in his cellar. Spite of the noise and confusion of the streets, Gyrowetz studied hard in his own room. But he could not escape the uproar; mobs ranged the streets shouting and yelling; at every corner a preacher of revolution harangued the folk, and talked liberty and equality; drums were always rolling, as every decision in the National Convention was thus proclaimed: and so it went on all the day long. His studies finished for the day, he dined in his room, then took a walk on the boulevards or Champs Elysées, and passed the evening in some theatre, where usually little but uproar could be heard, and where the performances ended with national songs, sung with unexampled enthusiasm, under the intoxication of which many a young man was enlisted and hurried off to the army.

Gyrowetz had finished the symphonies, and was making preparations to leave Paris for London, when the Fish Women's Revolution took place, (Oct. 6. 1789). He had the boldness to penetrate one of the female mobs in the endeavor to rescue two young girls, whom the women were compelling to join in the expedition to Versailles to bring back the King and his family. With all the politeness in the world, he requested the women to excuse the poor girls, who were of the better class of society, and received for answer: "What was that to him?—he had better go on his way." He then argued the question, putting it upon the ground "that they were but children, could be of no use, and in fact would be a continual hindrance." Upon which, one of the women tore the cockade from his coat, and said she would divide it with him. He took it coolly as a joke, promised to purchase her a new cockade, and added all the flatteries he could think of. At length one took his part—another and another—and finally the two girls were given up to him, with the words: "Eh bien! Prenez-les! Elles sont à vous!" He waited upon them home, where they were received at the door by the porter with great respect. He only told them in answer to their question, who their preserver was, that he was a stranger, on the point of leaving Paris—and they parted forever.

Phenomena of the Voice.

A highly interesting lecture, "On the influence of Musical and other sounds upon the vocal apparatus, as seen by the aid of the laryngoscope," was delivered before the Musical Society of London by Dr. George D. Gibb, on the 11th inst. The first published notice of the instrument was by Mr. Liston, the celebrated surgeon, in his work on surgery; but the first person who employed it to study the mechanism of the voice was Professor Garcia, whose researches were brought before the Royal Society, in 1855, and published in their Proceedings. His observations were founded upon the examination of his own larynx during the act of singing. Subsequently, in 1857, Dr. Turch of Vienna employed the instrument medically; he was followed by Czernik, Battaille, Merkel, and many others. The lecturer observed that sufficient credit had not been given to Garcia for what he had done, as his researches, although much extended, had not been surpassed, and had been palmed off as their own by some subsequent observers. His great knowledge of music has given to his experiments a value of the highest character, which cannot be too much appreciated. In 1860, Dr. Gibb commenced his researches with the instrument, both as an agent to study and to understand the hidden diseases of the larynx and wind-pipe, and the mechanism of sound, whether musical or otherwise. The results of his labors, together with those of Garcia and Battaille, were embodied in his lecture. The mechanism of the laryngoscope was illustrated by a number of reflecting and laryngeal mirrors, manufactured by Weiss and Son; their mode of application was shown whether in looking at the interior of the larynx downwards from the back of the throat, or in seeing the back of the nose from below upwards. The lecturer then proceeded to describe briefly the parts of the larynx seen on looking into it with the little mirror, and this was lucidly done by the aid of a series of large colored diagrams, representing the various cartilages, ligaments, muscles and membranes entering into its formation. At the bottom of the larynx (which is the prominent cartilaginous box felt in the upper part of the neck externally) is seen an antero-posterior fissure, extremely moveable, assuming at times a lozenge, elliptic, or triangular shape, of which the brilliant pearly borders palpitate with surprising rapidity.—This is the glottis formed by the true vocal ligaments, or, as they are now generally called, vocal chords. The action of these chords alone gives rise to sound, whether in speaking or singing. The three sets of ligaments attached to the pair of little pitcher shaped cartilages, called the arytenoid, the lecturer compared to three pairs of reins, in tandem driving, which acted almost simultaneously during certain acts, such as coughing and swallowing. The subject of his discourse was divided by Dr. Gibb into the silent movements of the larynx, or non-phonetic, and the phonetic, wherein sounds were produced whether in speaking or singing, either during inspiration or expiration. There are two manifestations possessed by the ordinary expiratory voice, which have been long known under the names of chest and falsetto register. The head voice, so well known to vocalists, Dr. Gibb was disposed to reject in his experiments, equally with Battaille, as opposed to anatomy and physiology.

Its range, laryngoscopically, so to speak, is shown by Garcia in his writings. A series of experiments were detailed illustrating the determination of the chest register. They consisted of the production of certain sounds of the diatonic scale, and the behavior of the glottis was carefully noticed and pointed out in the diagrams. The mechanism of the elevation and lowering of sound was next considered, and equally illustrated by extremely interesting experiments and diagrams. In the chest register, the vocal chords vibrate throughout their whole extent, namely, in their subglottic region, their ventricular region, and on their free border; longitudinal tension is generally stronger than in the falsetto register; and the vibrations become more rapid and ample in proportion as the sound becomes more acute; the reverse takes place when the sound becomes more grave—the opening of the glottis is rectilinear. Experiments were related, wherein the proceeding was taken advantage of to alternate the production of the same sound in the chest voice and falsetto voice, by means of an uninterrupted current of air, and to study the inherent glottic modifications of the falsetto register in general. The phenomena resulting from these experiments, as seen in the laryngeal mirror, were described, and are full of interest to the vocalist.—The results went to show that in the falsetto register, the vocal chords vibrate only on their free border and their ventricular region. The subglottic region, which plays such an important part in the chest register, here ceases to take any direct part in the generation of sound. Longitudinal tension is feeble than in the chest register, and the vibrations become less ample and more rapid according as the sound becomes more acute; but when more grave, the reverse takes place. The opening of the glottis is more or less elliptic, in accordance with the nature of voice and the size and density of the vocal chords themselves.

The lecturer noticed some other phenomena of the voice, including inspiration; which was very difficult to investigate, on account of the pain produced in its manifestation. It is only by the aid of the falsetto register that the inspiratory notes can be obtained, and the glottis is more open than in the expiratory sounds of this register. In the general summary of laryngoscopic observation, besides the phenomena peculiar to each register, it was shown that there were some common to both; thus, the generation of vocal sound never occurs without the vocal chords being stretched and vibrating wholly or in part. The closure of the glottis behind occurs up to certain tonal limits, and is indispensable to the brilliancy and elevation of sound. The false vocal chords take no part whatever in the generation of sound.

Professor Garcia had previously pointed out that the formation of sounds in either register was produced not from the actual vibrations of the whole or part of the vocal chords, but from the successive explosions which they allowed. Dr. Gibb said his lecture would have been incomplete without a few words upon the formation of the voice. The vocal chords at the bottom of the larynx exclusively give rise to the voice, whatever may be its register or intensity, because the laryngoscope has shown that they alone vibrate in that situation. To one of the Fellows of the Musical Society, Professor Garcia, we were indebted for what the lecturer considered as the true and correct explanation of the formation of the voice. It originated from the compression and expansion of the air, which gave rise to successive and regular explosions in passing through the glottis. The ligaments of the glottis or vocal chords close the passage, and offer a resistance to the passage of air. As soon as the air has accumulated sufficiently, it parts these folds and produces an explosion. But at the same instant, by virtue of their elasticity, and the pressure from below being relieved they meet again to give rise to a fresh explosion. A series of these compressions and expansions, or of explosions, occasioned by the expansive force of the air and the reaction of the glottis, produces the voice. The sounds ha! ha! ha! in laughing, offer a familiar illustration of rapid explosions occurring in succession, by the opening and closing of the glottis, and form a striking picture in the laryngeal mirror. The quality of the voice is now proved to depend upon simple changes in the mechanism of the larynx. The waves of sound generated by the larynx in the column of air contained in the trachea, produce in a word vibration of the chords. If they cannot be excited, then sounds are extinguished, and the result is what the lecturer saw instances of almost every other day, namely, aphonia, or loss of voice.

Such were the results obtained by the aid of the laryngoscope. They were but an instalment of what is promised by future observation and experiment in the hands of those members of the lyric art who would devote their energies to the task. From what has been described, Dr. Gibb remarked, it would be readily comprehended that the slightest deviation from the healthy standard would materially affect intonation, more especially anything that influenced the tension of the vocal chords. Vocal tension, so to speak, must be uniform and equal on both sides, that is, both chords must be equally and simultaneously influenced by the little cartilages called the arytenoid, which govern and direct the three pairs of reins noticed in the early part of this lecture. Setting aside altogether the notice of any morbid phenomena affecting the voice, the lecturer requested permission merely to refer to the cause of the failure, partial or complete, of a portion of the notes of the diatonic scale—whether the middle, the higher or the lower, or the junction of either—as revealed by the laryngoscope. This, he said, would be found to depend chiefly upon inequality in the power of tension of the two vocal chords; that is to say, whilst one chord would become stretched to its required length during the utterance of the middle or higher notes, the other did not become so in an equal ratio—hence the parallelism and symmetry so essential to perfect harmony in singing became imperfect. Dr. Gibb claimed to himself the credit of being the first to point out this important fact. He then referred to the condition of the epiglottis, and denied that the loosening of this cartilage could be accomplished at the will of the singer, as was supposed by some. The reason of this was given, and measures to remedy it referred to.—In conclusion, Dr. Gibb stated, that without any pretensions at all as a vocalist, he had performed various experiments with the view of understanding the cause of defective voice; but the interest of the subject grew upon him, and induced him to go more fully into it. Some of the results of his labors he had ventured to bring before them. On concluding, the lecturer was loudly applauded. A discussion followed—in which Dr. Garcia, Mr. Salaman, Mr. Tracy Osborn, the chairman, Mr. Godfroi, and Mr. Richardson took part—the influence of the mental faculties in relation to the physical forming the main topic of the debate.—Social Science Review, April, 1863.

Mr. Beecher in Switzerland.

HIS OPINION OF THE FAMOUS ORGAN AT FREIBURG.

Rev. Henry Ward Beecher writes from Freiburg to the Independent:

I have just returned from the church of St. Nicholas. The fame of its organ led me to make this a point of rest for the night. A little before eight o'clock we entered the church—Gothic, large and full of twilight. Several scores came in, and silently waited as we did. One more and another still entered and seemed like shadows flitting past the huge columns. A bevy of girls came lightly forward, clinging together, and, like a flock of doves that swing round and round before alighting, they moved to the right, only to swing back to the left, where soon, gently and prettily, they all settled upon the luxurious oaken board called a seat. The great front doors were closed. The inner iron open-work gate shut with a dull clink. Then a signal bell for the organ rang, and was echoed by another below, plentifully rung. All were silent—waiting for the opening note.

I hoped to hear some 'Miserere' breathed out, or some soft supplication that would carry me up above life and day. Instead, a roll and a crash came from the full organ. Everything rushed forth with screaming exultation. If there flew into the roar a little snatch of melody, all the parts, like so many hawks, swooped down upon it, snatching it from each other, and mounting with it, or darting downward, so that the poor, sweet little melody wished it had never spread its wing. It was too late for regrets. They tore it to pieces, and nothing was heard of it more. Everything had gone wrong with me to-day. I was in a reaction. Yesterday I had gone over the Wengern Alp, stood face to face with Jungfrau, Mönch, and Eiger; seen the glaciers, and heard the avalanches; and come home to see the sun go down upon that cloudless Jungfrau in exquisite glory, to see the moon arise and change its gold to silver, and fill the air with an ineffable beauty. It was a day full of God and glory. I slept uneasily. This morning I rose exhausted, and nothing all day long pleased me. And now the organ must turn against me, too, and shriek and roar and storm against me.

Yet after a while it seemed to have found a master that restrained it. Less and less harsh was it; sweeter stops began to predominate; the harmony was rounded and full; and at length a plaintive air was given and repeated—again given and echoed by this and that stop, until I could think of nothing else but a singing-school in heaven, where an angel was practising the little angels, and each of them was imitating, as well as he could, the sonorous sweetness of his master's theme. Then the angels, old and young, all sang together. My heart sang too, and I was purely happy. So, then, I had a musical repetition of some of my Alpine experiences. It was just so that I had climbed those rugged passes, and been savagely treated by a storm that roared about us, and that followed us down the other side, until at length, the descent accomplished, an exquisite valley, sunlit, full of happy people, rejoiced my eyes—a thousand times more lovely from its contrast with the fierce tempest among the mountain tops.

Then came a sort of exhibition piece, in which the organ was made to show what it could do. I never like such things. An organ is the gravest and grandest thing in the world. It is a musical cathedral. Its service is religious. To set it to perform waltzes is as absurd as it would be to clear a cathedral for the dancing of waltzes.

It is putting an organ to mockery to lead it up and down in frivolous rope-dancing and musical legerdemain. What is more absurd than a herd of elephants dancing a minuet? What would be thought of a senate of venerable men who should down on their knees and play at children's games, leap-frog, mumble-the-peg, and such like sports.

The best thing to be said of the ponderous levity included in to-night's exhibition is, that it was less bad than usual on such occasions.

The famous Vox Humana stop disappointed me. Although very skilfully managed, as it needs to be, and in some few notes closely resembling the human voice, on the whole it was not close enough to satisfy, scarcely to please. It was always used after a dark and tempestuous passage. It sounded as if one were riding past a church in a storm, and heard rather nasal voices chanting therein. Once or twice it was brought out with an illusory sweetness.

Handel's Hallelujah Chorus satisfied me. It was magnificently rendered. The whole power of the instrument was developed. As the sublime conception was evolved, I lost all thought of time and place. The solid roof passed away; the organ itself was for a moment forgotten; the whole air was filled with glowering angels; they cried to each other with ecstatic joy, and answered back as joyfully. New bands broke in. Sweeping upward as into thicker hosts, and carrying the fiery contagion of rapture, the whole universe seemed in motion of boundless joy. Then thou, too, O my soul! didst join the celestial host! Not with sound or articulation, but with worshipful thoughts and sacred joys, unspeakable and full of glory! Then there was lifted up before my inward sight a majesty of love, as far surpassing men and angels, as yesterday the snow mountains, in radiant sunlight, had seemed more grand and glorious than the daisies and harebells that grew at their feet! I am sure that music is the key that opens heaven.—Not Peter, but Handel to-night. The surging sounds died away, and silence itself seemed melodious for a little while.

London.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA. The 17th season at Covent Garden was ended on Saturday evening, Aug. 1, by a performance of La Figlia del Reggimento, followed by a ballet. Adelina Patti achieved a new success, and not less brilliant than the former ones, as la Figlia; thus "completing the triad of Donizetti's comic masterpieces": in the three rôles of Norina, Adina and Maria. For an interesting, and no doubt a faithful, summary of the season, we copy from the Times, "which, like the toad, ugly and venomous, wears yet a precious jewel in its head", namely the musical criticism of our friend Davison.

The season of 1863—which will be remembered on account of the first "State visit" of the Prince and Princess of Wales (April 28th—the opera, Masaniello)—has not been marked by an extraordinary number of startling incidents. The prospectus spoke of no less than nine new singers. Three of these—Mdlle. Maurensi, Madame de Maffei, and Signor Ferencsi—made no appearance. In revenge we had a barytone whose name was not included in the list. Signor Colonnesse—who came forward as the elder Germonet, in La Traviata—was accredited with a fine voice, but not with the faculty of singing in tune, nor, indeed, with even the most moderate skill in using it. No other part was allotted to him and his very name was speedily forgotten. Mdlle. Elvira Demi only played once. The opera selected for her debut was Martha, her performance in which, as the Lady Enrichetta (Martha, No. 1) was voted beneath mediocrity; and it was only through a great stretch of courtesy on the part of the audience—wrought up, moreover, into an unusually indulgent mood by the fine singing of Signor Mario—that Mdlle. Demi was allowed to proceed beyond the second act. Scarcely more fortunate was Signor Caffieri, who, nevertheless, came from Wiesbaden with the reputation of the best representative of Gounod's Faust on the banks of the Rhine. A German by birth, Signor Caffieri had passed the ordeal of some of the most musical of the Italian cities; but he failed to win the good graces of the Royal Italian Opera audience so entirely that the manager intrusted him with no second part, and even restored that with which he had made his debut—Arnold, in Guillaume Tell—to its old and rightful owner, Signor Tamberlik. Thus Signor Caffieri went the way of Signor Colonnesse and Mdlle. Demi, and his name was no more mentioned. Signor Naudin (already somewhat favorably known at Her Majesty's Theatre) was far more successful, and proved a hopeful auxiliary in the business of the season. He came out the first night (April 7) as Masaniello, and, in spite of a certain French tendency to overdrawn sentiment, which, combined with his French patronymic, caused many to doubt the fact of his being an Italian, produced a decidedly favorable impression—an impression by no means disturbed or weakened by his subsequent performances, in Pollio (Norma), the Duke of Mantua (Rigoletto), Alfredo (La Traviata), Ernesto (Don Pasquale), and Nemorino (L'Elisir d'Amore). In the last two named characters Signor Naudin had the unthankful task of acting as a substitute for that universal favorite, Signor Mario, who, though advertised for both, with the caprice which is too often the attribute of "universal favorites," found himself at the eleventh hour "indisposed"—indisposed to aid Mr. Gye in keeping faith with the public. Signor Mario may be here advised that his refusal this season to play no less than three parts set down for him by the director is by no means viewed with indifference by the patrons of an establishment to which, whatever it may owe to his services, he himself is still more deeply indebted. The operas of La Traviata, Don Pasquale, L'Elisir d'Amore suffered materially by the withdrawal, at the last moment, of Signor Mario's name from the bills. Nor has it been satisfactorily explained why he resigned the part of the Duke, in Rigoletto, in which he is incomparable; or why the attractions of La Gazza Ladra should not have been strengthened by his co-operation, in a part so eminently suited to him as that of the young soldier, Gianetto—a part which Rubini frequently played, and which, at one period, was not disdained by Signor Mario. Though we should be loth to see any one else in the character of Raoul de Nangis, it is not the less a fact, very generally recognized, that the music of the Huguenots is now, in many places, too great a strain upon his voice, and the only way Signor Mario can atone for this is by lending his powerful aid in some of the more popular Italian operas, which, as eminently the chief of Italian singers, he could do with no less dignity to himself than advantage to the manager. It is hard, indeed, that Mr. Gye should be repeatedly and severely blamed for what is not in any way his fault, but the fault of Signor Mario—"enfant gâté," in the widest acceptance of the phrase. No longer to digress, however, the other two new singers who answered to their names were pre-eminently happy.

Mdlle. Fioretti—who came out as Elvira (I Puritani), and afterwards appeared as Gilda (Rigoletto), Violetta (La Traviata), and Martha (Martha No. 2), till, being announced for Isabella in Robert le Diable, she mysteriously disappeared, to the chagrin of a large number of amateurs, who had hailed her as little else than a second Persiani—was appreciated from the first, and obtained, perhaps, as legitimate acceptance as any singer since Angiolina Bosio. Without any personal attractions, and scarcely passing mediocrity as an actress, Mdlle. Fioretti made way exclusively perforce of distinguished vocal attainments. Her sudden departure, the cause of which has never been publicly explained, was a sensible loss to the company. Good singers in the genuine Italian school are now, unhappily, rare; and Mdlle. Fioretti could, therefore, ill be spared. Mdlle. Pauline Lucca—whose brilliant success as Valentine, in the Huguenots, is of so recent occurrence that little more need be said of her in this place—is an artist of a wholly different stamp, possesses qualities in which Mdlle. Fioretti was deficient, and lacking others with which Mdlle. Fioretti was eminently endowed. In this young lady Mr. Gye has, there is every reason to believe, drawn a new prize; and her progress next season will be followed by all who take an interest in the opera with earnest and watchful interest. Mdlle. Fioretti has fled, and Mdlle. Adelina Patti, with all her versatility, cannot possibly undertake every part in the repertory; Mdlle. Lucca—if she equals anticipation, as there is little reason to doubt she will—has, therefore, a career before her which may be advantageous in an equal measure to herself and to the theatre. Thus much to the new comers.

The exertions of Mdlle. Adelina Patti have been unremitting; and it is no more than truth to say that she was the "star" of the season. Mdlle. Patti has added four new parts to her already brilliant catalogue—viz., Leonora in the Traviata, Ninetta in La Gazza Ladra, Adina in L'Elisir, and Maria in La Figlia del Reggimento—every one a real success. In addition to these, she has appeared, oftener than we have leisure to enumerate, as Amina, Rosina, Martha (Martha No. 3), Adina (Don Pasquale) and Zerlina. A second and very different, though in its way not less charming Zerlina—the Zerlina of Auber's Fra Diavolo—was set down for Mdlle. Patti in the prospectus; but, unhappily, Signor Mario, who was to have played the irresistible brigand chief, was—not "indisposed," this time, but, which amounts to much the same thing, "unprepared."

Mdlle. Antonietta Frizzi—a clever young lady, but hardly fitted to shine as "prima donna seria assoluta" in such an establishment as the Royal Italian Opera—can neither be said to have advanced or retrograded in public favor. Her Norma was tolerable, if no more; her Alice, if not all that can be desired, better in every respect. Norma is a terrible ordeal for any artist of less than the highest attainments, while the "Diva" is not only in the land of the living, but hovering about the theatre—to which, and to its patrons, she has twice bid a formal "adieu" with an irresistible desire (as it is bruited abroad) to say "good-bye" once more, in a third "limited" series of representations; and assuredly Mdlle. Frizzi is not the one to make us quickly forget Giulia Grisi, who, but the other day, in St. James's Hall, sang so well and awakened such enthusiasm, at the concert of Signor Ciabatta. Madame Miolan Carvalho has only appeared in one character—the heroine of M. Gounod's Faust, here newly baptized Faust e Margherita; Mdlle. Maria Battu has given more or less satisfaction in such parts as Elvira (Masaniello), Matilde (Guillaume Tell) and Margaret de Valois (the Huguenots); while Madame Nantier Didieff (in whose place a Madame Lustani has more than once officiated) as Maddalena (Rigoletto), Pippo (La Gazza Ladra); Nancy (Martha), Urban (the Huguenots), &c., fully sustained her popularity as the liveliest of singing soubrettes and the sauciest of singing pages—added to which she has repeated her well-known assumption of Azucena, and (in consequence, we presume, of the protracted absence of Madame Csillag), with laudable ambition, appropriated to herself the distressed mother in the Prophète—one of the grandest creations of Meyerbeer. Madame Tagliafico has been diligent and useful, as of yore, in the various little parts assigned to her; Mdlle. Dottini, besides playing the Queen in I Puritani, Adalgisa in Norma, and Bertha in the Prophète, has usurped the part of Gemmy in Guillaume Tell, (successively assumed by Mdlle. Amalia Corbari and Madame Rudersdorff); and Madame Rudersdorff has almost, if not quite exclusively, been condemned to recount the griefs and endure the rebuffs of the unfortunate Elvira, Don Giovanni's cast-off mistress.

Signor Ronconi, of whom severe illness deprived us last year, brought to light again some of the most inimitable impersonations of the operatic stage—among the rest his Figaro (Barbiere); his Dulcamara; his Rigoletto; his Podestà (La Gazza Ladra); and, last and least (in importance if not in excellence) his Masetto. To these he has added Dr. Malatesta (Don Pasquale), which may be described in a sentence as the best we have ever seen. Signor Ronconi, it is true, sings often out of tune—a habit that would seem ineradicable; but, notwithstanding this defect—which, to any other singer, would be fatal—he is, we repeat, inimitable, and invariably wins the sympathies of his audience—except, of course, in such parts as Giorgio (I Puritani), which are wholly unsuited to him, and for which he should never, under any circumstances, be cast. When Signor Ronconi is gone, who shall replace him? Certainly not Signor Ciampi—his hard-working but by no means satisfactory substitute in more than one character last season—whose diligence can scarcely make up for a prevailing dryness, which, this year, for instance, was but poor atonement for the entire want of humor in his Dr. Bartolo, Don Pasquale, Sulpizio, and other characters; not Signor Graziani, who, despite his beautiful voice, has no dramatic talent, either serious or comic; and not M. Faure, who, though a barytone, is unsuited to any of the parts traditionally allotted to Signor Ronconi. Signor Graziani has done very little this season; for, though he was the Valentine in Faust, his principal exploits (as for years past indeed) have been the Count di Luna in Il Trovatore, whose cavatina, "Il balen del suo sorriso," no one else has ever sung, or is likely to sing, so well, and Plunkett (Martha)), with the redoubtable song in praise of "Beer." M. Faure, on the contrary, has been unremittingly active, and rendered most important services to the management. It is enough to point to this very clever artist's repeated impersonations of Guillaume Tell, Don Giovanni, Ferdinand (La Gazza Ladra), Pietro (Masaniello), St. Bris (the Huguenots), and last—perhaps best—Mephistopheles, to remind our musical readers of the value of his co-operation. M. Faure's compatriot, M. Obin, from the Grand Opera in Paris (who by the way, should have been noticed among the new comers), only appeared twice—as Bertram, in Robert le Diable; and then, like Mdle. Fioretti, vanished without a warning. M. Obin's departure, however, was, we believe, inevitable, his assistance in the revival of Signor Verdi's Vêpres Siciliennes being required by the manager of the Paris Opera, and his engagement with M. Gye merely, as we are informed, provisional. Signor Tagliafico has been, as ever, invaluable in the varied repertory of quasi-subordinate parts that fall within his sphere—such, for example, as Rodolfo (La Sonnambula), Basilio (Il Barbiere), Geasler (Guillaume Tell) Sparsafucile (Rigoletto), Lord Tristan (Martha), Count Oberthal (the Prophète), and Belcore (L'Elisir)—not forgetting his unequalled Comendatore, in the dramatic chef d'œuvre of Mozart. Herr Formes has appeared from time to time, and though his great part of Bertram, in Robert, was given to M. Obin, took a fair revenge subsequently when it was restored to him, and a still fairer as the Huguenot, Marcel, of which personage he is still the most characteristic representative. Moreover, Herr Formes was of no little importance to the frequent performances of Don Giovanni, in which opera he presented us, as formerly, with the veritable Leporello of German tendencies and traditions. The careful and painstaking M. Zelger was announced for Oroveso and other parts, in the early season; but indisposition deprived the public of his subsequent services. Signor Tambril, whose splendid singing as Arnold, in Guillaume Tell, whose "Il mio tesoro," the grand feature of his Ottavio, and whose superb declamation as Jean de Leyden, in the Prophète, and as Robert, in Robert le Diable, were never more admired, only obtained one new part—that of Faust in M. Gounod's singularly successful opera, a part not favorable to the exhibition of those fine qualities which, in the characters we have mentioned, in Otello, and several others unnecessary to specify, he displays with such remarkable effect. To Signor Mario allusion has been made; but it is only just to add that his incomparable performance of Count Almaviva, which warranted frequent representations of the never-tiring Barbiere; the impassioned feeling he threw into the music of Manrico, on the night when Mdle. Patti made her memorable appearance as the Leonora of Signor Verdi's most popular opera; his exquisite singing in the trio, "Buona notte," the air "M'appari tutt' amor," and other passages allotted to Lionello, the sentimental farmer, in Martha; and, lastly, his picturesque and noble acting as Raoul de Nangis would have covered a multitude of sins. Another very zealous and painstaking artist, Signor Neri Baraldi, who—though over-weighted in such parts as Arturo, in the Puritani, and Elvino, in the Sonnambula, for which a Rubini is wanted, or, in the absence of a Rubini, one, like Signor Mario, who could act as well as Rubini could sing, and though, once or twice, as the case was with Signor Naudin, put forward unexpectedly where Signor Mario was expected—has been extremely useful, on more than one occasion, in characters to which he may reasonably aspire. The unimportant tasks assigned from time to time to Madame Anese, Signors Lucchesi, Rossi, Polonini, Capponi, &c., were, in almost every instance, competently fulfilled.

Besides the operas incidentally alluded to in the course of the foregoing remarks—19 in all—viz., Masaniello, I Puritani, Norma, Guillaume Tell, Rigoletto, La Traviata, La Sonnambula, Il Barbiere, Don Giovanni, Martha, The Prophète, Il Trovatore, La Gazza Ladra, Robert le Diable, Faust e Margherita, Don Pasquale, The Huguenots, L'Elisir d'Amore and La Figlia del Reggimento (produced in the order here assigned to them), no others were brought out. The novelties were confined to three—viz., L'Elisir d'Amore, which had not been heard for seven years, Faust e Margherita and La Figlia, neither of which had been previously given at Covent Garden. Faust e Margherita not having been announced in the prospectus, may be accepted as a fair substitute for L'Etoile du Nord; but for Gluck's Orfeo, Auber's Fra Diavolo, Flotow's Stradella, and, most important, Verdi's last opera, La Forza del Destino—all of which (as well as Rossini's Otello) were in the prospectus—no substitutes were offered.

Hayter's Church Music.

A Collection of Psalm and Hymn Tunes, Chants, Services, Anthems, &c., by A. U. HAYTER, Organist at Trinity Church, Boston, and formerly at Hereford Cathedral, England. (Oliver Ditson & Co., Boston).

The manufacture and diffusion of new collections of church music still goes on as busily among us, as in the halcyon days of peace. Only we notice a change in the form and fashion, if not in the nature of the products. Instead of endless repetition of the old type of books full of mere "psalm tunes," degenerating as they multiply, at each remove from the plain, earnest, heartfelt, grand old Choral, and losing character to gain seeming novelty, we now see more ambitious efforts to supply larger and less simple pieces; books containing a greater proportion of Anthems, Glorias, Te Deums, and all sorts of practicable extracts from famous Masses, Oratorios, Motets, &c., to the still indispensable but homely assortment of Long, Short, Common and Particular;—thus plainly recognizing a somewhat advanced stage of musical taste and culture in the people, or at any rate a craving, whether wise or ignorant, for something juicier than the old husks.

Of the new "Collections," which have made their appearance during the last year or two, a majority seem to have been made in the interest of the Roman Catholic or of the English Episcopal service. Puritan Psalm singing yields up a large share of the market; Mass and Te Deum, Offertory and Anthem, come more into vogue, and more and more find purchasers and even performers in congregations, that know no established Liturgy. Some of these we propose from time to time to examine, and report thereon as well as we are able; but it is by no means an easy or a thankful task; for we are bound at the outset to confess, as we have many times already intimated, that we have never yet seen the musical "collection," or known the musical service (at least in this country—for perhaps we might except the Domchor in Berlin), which seemed to us, in all respects, to answer the essential requirements.

We begin with the last work out, as being the one which seems likely, from the name it bears, the place it hails from, and the way in which it has grown together, to excite a wide-spread interest, at least in this vicinity. Trinity Church, in this city, has long enjoyed a reputation for the superiority of its music, due, it is understood, to the taste, musicianship, and zeal of Mr. Hayter, who, for some twenty-five years, has been its organist and conductor; a man of thorough English cathedral training, and justly accounted among the ablest and best furnished who have settled in this country. He gives us here, in a large oblong quarto volume of 160 pages, the more valuable substance, we may suppose, of the music which has grown into use during that time at Trinity, selected, arranged, composed by himself, and executed by a quartet or double quartet choir under his own immediate direction;—the music, in a word, which has been favorite at Trinity, and an attraction to outsiders, for so many years. Let us see what it consists of, and what are its pervading characteristics.

The first impression we get, after running through the volume, is, that the author has been sensitively desirous to avoid the commonplace sameness of the usual church music—usual here, we mean, in our American Protestant churches and congregations. We see it in the large room he allots to anthems and longer pieces; we see it also, in the frequency with which he borrows the subjects even for his psalm and hymn tunes, from beautiful passages in classical works of quite another kind, as operas, oratorios, sonatas, quartets and trios for stringed instruments, &c. To speak first of the latter:

1. We have here nearly a hundred tunes, in all the usual metres of the hymn books. A good sign, to begin with, is the modest number; your regular Yankee "psalm-smiter" has been wont to offer you three, four, five hundred tunes (mostly brand new) in one book, embodying the sweating inspirations of a single year. We, for our part, would rather have twenty plain old Lutheran chorals, even if sung in unison, with aid of a true organist—and infinitely rather if harmonized by Bach), than the whole of them; but it is cause for thankfulness to see them reduced to a hundred—and a short hundred at that. Now as to the selection, origin, and treatment.

About a third part of them are in plain old Choral form, in long notes, harmonized. Care seems to have been taken even here, not to include those which are found in every other New England book, such as Old Hundred and the like. But the most of them are old tunes; commonly old English tunes, with a small sprinkling of German chorals. The name of Bach occurs but once, and that in an instance which does not sound to us so peculiarly Bach-ian as some others might. One is attributed to Graun, which is in fact that sweetest and tenderest of the old German chorals: "Herzlich thut mich verlangen"; whether Graun might not have harmonized it as it here stands, we cannot say; certainly the harmony has not half the charm of either of Bach's half dozen arrangements of the same melody. One bears the noble name of Palestrina, and bears the stamp of genuine authenticity in its broad churchlike harmony:—we wish the book had a few more of these. The tunes attributed to old English writers have the usual grave and solid style of such, which to our feeling, after all, is rather style than character, rather careful and respectful deportment than genius. But at all events there is no nonsense in them, no sentimental affectation. Others of this class, bearing no author's name, are good, some dry and frigid. The harmony (whoever may be responsible for it), is generally faultless, but now and then extremely hard and forced, as if thus again striving not to identify itself with the impoverished sameness of modulation, progression and cadence in the common psalm books. So much of the hymn tunes proper.

It is in the adaptations, above referred to, from classical masters, that we find the chief, at least the characteristic wealth of this collection. This is a tempting, and at the same time a dangerous resource, it must be admitted; because, to say nothing of the propriety of taking a piece of music away from its connection and original intention, to try to fit it to a wholly different purpose, it is evident that only in very rare and exceptional instances can a passage from a symphony, a quartet, or an opera, submit itself to the Procrustes bed of the short, rigid, psalm tune form, without terrible amputation, involving too some finishing off of the mangled parts with very bungling and very wooden false limbs. The original idea, so whole, so captivating, has to be rounded and shortened off to a sudden common-place psalm tune cadence, whereby its very life is lost, and all its charm has fled. We believe it was Gardiner, the "Music of Nature" man, who first set the example of this sort of borrowing and adapting; and out of his collection came the best of those reminiscences of Handel, Mozart, &c., which, transferred to the earlier editions of our "Handel and Haydn Collection," really did some service in quickening a finer sense in many who before had known nothing but the most poor and meagre side of music; indeed those tunes ("Bradford," "Viotti," "Germany," &c., they were called) gave to many Americans their first conception of the great composers, and their first desire to know them better. So much must be admitted, and yet how soon, how naturally, this thing was overdone, run into the ground, tickling the foolish, untaught ear with all manner of absurdities. Not content with chopping up Handel, Beethoven and Mendelssohn into their Long and Short Metre mince-meat, the enterprising "psalm-smiths," with a shrewd eye to a wider market, siezed upon less noble but more appetizing game, and made the fashionable operas and ballads of the day supply grist to their mill, as well as to the street organ grinders. We give Mr. Hayter credit for being much more tasteful and select in his borrowings from genius. In not a few instances he has been exceedingly happy in his choice (if sometimes less so in his adaptation) of a theme. Three tunes he has carved from Gluck:—one the well-known air: Che farò senza Euridice? the others, from choruses of priests in his operas, being already truly religious and noble in their character. From Beethoven he has taken the solemn air, "In questa tomba"; the great tenor air in Fidelio; both impressive subjects, but requiring to be harmonized, abridged, &c. Also two very noble ones, which lend themselves more readily to the purpose, namely: the opening of that rich, broad, profoundly religious adagio of the great B flat Trio; and the opening of the lovely slow movement in one of his concertos. Mendelssohn supplies an impressive passage from "Elijah," and another from a part-song. Mozart, the mere theme of a Dona Nobis; a movement in three-four, which may be the trio of some minuetto in a chamber composition; and another piece, into which Mr. Hayter interpolates a second part before the return of the theme. Handel is brought under contribution only once, that we have seen, and then in not one of his more hack-nied forms. Haydn also only once in his own right, and once as the completion, suddenly surprising you, of a tune begun by Hayter, and marked "Haydn and Hayter;" this seems really too much like a joke for a church hymn. Weber occurs two or three times, once in the lullaby chorus of his Oberon elves,—a sweet and tranquillizing piece; but how can you hear it without thinking of the twittering orchestral accompaniments! From Rossini, we have not a bad tune made from that beautiful, and truly religious wedding chorus, in the first act of "William Tell." Enough to mention these, though not the only names. We find also the Russian Hymn, and the so-called Portuguese Hymn, or Adeste fideles, both good in their way.

The tunes by Mr. Hayter himself, not more than six or eight in number, are smooth, melodious, well harmonized compositions, inclining rather to sweetness (somewhat Spohr-like) and sometimes to a sentimental pathos, than to the more grand and elevated church style. They are fair specimens of the modern English tendency in sacred composition, of which Vincent Novello has been one of the most influential models.

Of the longer pieces in this volume we must take a fresh opportunity to speak; the present one is spent.

ARTISTS AT HOME. Such a rich feast—surfeit we cannot say—of music, as we had the other evening at the house of one of our best resident musicians; such a musical orgy almost, considering not only the quantity, but the exciting quality, and appetite still growing with what it fed upon, comes not many times, and should not come too often, in a life-time, even of enthusiastic devotees to Beethoven and all the great ones. Think of this programme for a single evening! Too rich it might have been, and heavy, had it not been extemporized, each piece coming when the party were in the humor of it. 1. An early Trio (C minor) of Beethoven, for piano, violin and 'cello. 2. The D minor Trio of Mendelssohn. 3. A brilliant, difficult Fantasia by Chopin. 4. The cyclus of songs, called Dichterliebe, by Schumann, sung as only one tenor in this country sings them. 5. A violin Sonata by the old Italian master, Arcangelo Corelli, in which you find the very cut of Handel. 5. A charming violin movement by Tartini. 7. A violin and piano Sonata by Bach, and a part of another. 8. The "Kreutzer" Sonata of Beethoven. 9. A triad of Franz songs, sung by you know whom. 10. The great B flat Trio of Beethoven. 11. Sonata in D by Mozart, piano and violin;—and we are not sure but that our memory fails us of some more. The pianist of the evening, and an admirable one, was Mr. CARL WOLFSOHN, of Philadelphia, whose first visit (private) to this city was the occasion of the little gathering.

MENDELSSOHN MUSICAL INSTITUTE. By a notice in our advertising columns it will be seen that this school, long favorably known under the management of Mr. E. B. OLIVER, has been removed from Pittsfield, Mass. to Boston. We have often had occasion to allude to the high-toned and earnest character of Mr. Oliver's teaching, to the pains he has taken to inspire his pupils with an intelligent love of what is really good in music, and to the classical complexion of the programmes of his school exhibitions. The Institute has educated, since its commencement, nearly 200 pupils, about 40 of whom are now successfully engaged in teaching, and leading young tastes in a classical direction.

GERMAN OPERA. There is good news from Herr ANSCHUTZ. If all we hear be true, the interest in German Opera will not be wasted upon several efforts, but all concentrated in one, and that a strong one. Thirteen or fourteen new members are to join the Anschütz company from Europe; among them Mme. Dora Laszlo, a Hungarian singer of repute; Theodor Formes, the Berlin tenor; Dall' Aste, one of the best German basses in Europe, and others of good report. Mme. Johannsen, Herren Weinlich, Lotti, &c., will still make part of it. The performances will commence at the New York Academy in December; and the company will visit Philadelphia and Boston once, and perhaps twice, during the coming year.

A LARGE ORGAN IN UTAH.—A large organ, one of the largest in this country, has recently been built by Simmons & Co., to be placed in the Mormon Tabernacle at Salt Lake City, which is a building large enough to seat 15,000 people. The case of the organ and the large diapasons, are to be made in the temple, and a skilful workman has started for this purpose to Salt Lake City.

Musical Correspondence.

NEWPORT, R. I., AUG. 28.—We had a few days since a rare musical treat at the Matinée of Mr. HARTMANN, at the Ocean Hall of this place. Although our expectations had been excited to a high point, by the notices of his performances in Philadelphia and New York, during the past winter, we were nevertheless quite surprised at his masterly execution. Mr. Hartmann is a pupil of the celebrated pianist Theodore Kullak, of Berlin. On this occasion he gave us the "March from Tannhäuser," and the "Campanella" by Paganini, both arranged by Liszt; a Nocturne and a Polonaise by Chopin, and "Auf Flügeln des Gesanges," arranged by Heller. They were all played with the feeling and individuality that belong to them in their various styles of composition.

What distinguishes Mr. Hartmann from most of the performers that we have been accustomed to hear is, the combination of qualities that seem almost irreconcilable in the same person. Thus his playing is grand, forcible and broad, while at the same time every note has the freshness and distinctness of the dew-drop. It is superbly colored with feeling, and at the same time it is entirely devoid of sentimentality. There is the freshness and sweetness of the ripe and luscious fruit, and not the sickish and cloying taste of unhealthy confectionery. Of Chopin he is one of the best interpreters, and at the same time he is equally at home in the graceful and musical witchery of the "Campanella."

To all true lovers of music present the entertainment gave the greatest delight; and, although it was not a large success in a pecuniary way, the good seed was well sown, and will we doubt not, bring forth good fruit to this manly and health-giving artist, as well as to those who listened to him. Mr. Hartmann was assisted in an able manner by Mr. Charles Hahn, a violinist of much promise, and Mr. Wilson, a young pianist of this city. We hope that you will have the pleasure ere long of hearing him in Boston.

"Those Evening Bells."

LOUVAIN, BELGIUM, JULY 11.—In a little town of interior Belgium, among broad-built Flemings and jolly Walloons, (don't print it Balloons), hardly knowing whether Boston and Portland are in the hands of the Confederates yet, or whether Dwight's Journal has not by this time nominated Howell Cobb for the next President, I sit sipping Bairische Beer, from a quaint mug, on a quaint chair, in a quaint street, opposite that bit of fairy architecture, the Hotel de Ville of Louvain. Every body is in the streets drinking beer, or waiting till attendant damsels bring fresh bottles thereof, said bottles being in fact stone jugs, containing each three or four glasses full, and costing ten centimes or two cents per jug, which includes the privilege of a chair and table on the sidewalk for an indefinite period of time.

The little café where I sit and sip myself away, and where my willing soul would stay, is built against the side of the Louvain Cathedral, an edifice as ugly as sin outside, but within as beautiful as the Angel of Goodness. The floor of polished marble reflects the forms of sculptured saints, upon whose heads the painted windows fling rich halos of gorgeous light, while from the roof of the choir is suspended a colossal crucifix, at the foot of which are kneeling angels. A triple arch of lace-work marble crosses the church by the transepts, separating the choir or east end from the nave. Old pictures by Van Dyck and Hemling adorn the walls, and from the ceiling depends a chandelier made by Quentin Matsys who, as everybody knows, changed to an indifferent painter from an artistic and excellent blacksmith, or designer of works in iron, merely to suit the whim of a purse-proud mamma-in-law. It is twilight, and the Cathedral is a very shrine of quiet art and religious beauty.

Outside, whither we go and begin to imbibe beer instead of beauty, there is a new phase of wondrous architecture in the Hotel de Ville, a structure built a few years—it don't make any difference whether it is fifty more or less—built, I say, a few years before the discovery of America, and small as it is, possessing more real architectural beauty, than all the American buildings existing, even were their united merits condensed into one representative edifice.

Then as it grows darker, there is a rich clang from the belfry, and the chimes tell the quarter hour in music, like the sweep of a skilful hand over the chords of a responsive harp.

We know precious little about chimes in America. To be sure, they have a set of bells in Trinity spire, New York, but no one ever hears them at the proper time for hearing chimes—that is, after dark. Then they do not sound every day, but are reserved for holidays and festivals, when Mr. Ayliffe plays a few patriotic airs, to which nobody listens, and which are quite drowned by the omnibuses of Broadway and Wall street. Far different is it in these quiet Belgian towns. Here every quarter of an hour, and in some cases every five minutes, the chimes sound. Every year they are set to fresh tunes selected by the municipality, and programmes of the music thus played, for a century back, are kept in the church archives. The taste, it must be confessed, is dubious. For instance, the bells which sound divine from Louvain Cathedral at the quarter and half hours, perform, when the hour strikes, the last page of that ugly yet popular dance "The Lancers," the "hands all round" movement, and yet the silly music is so transfigured by the bells, that it actually sounds pretty.

Let me babble about a few of the chimes I have lately heard. There is Lichfield Cathedral in England, a noble, proud building with its three spires and rich ornamental front. They are completely restoring it, and one gentleman has presented an organ that is worth about one quarter as much as the altar screen, and by no means equal to many in the Boston and New York churches; for in respect of church organs, we are certainly ahead of England. By the way, speaking of organs, reminds me of the only tribute I have yet seen paid to the memory of an organist. In Newcastle upon Tyne there is an old church—the principal one in the place—built any number of centuries ago, and dedicated to St. Nicholas. Over the altar is a magnificent window erected only three or four years since, by public subscription, to one, M. Ions, who had been some twenty years organist of the church, and was not over 40 years of age when he died. The window, however, is by no means symbolical of the special tastes or pursuits of him whose memory it preserves. The chance was certainly a good one of departing from the conventional symbolism of East windows, and of producing a window not only peculiar in its object, but in its appearance. Yet the oft-repeated subject of the Lord's supper is again repeated here, and no one who did not carefully read the Latin inscription, would suppose that this was the memorial window of a popular organist. Still it is well to see, that somewhere in the world, good organists are appreciated by somebody, for as a general thing an organist's task is a thankless one. In England, however, it is not nearly so bad as in America; for in the former country, the organist is master of his choir, and has only men and boys to deal with. No petted, spoiled lady singer to humor and coax, no bending to silly female caprice and whim, no requests to "make the soprano prominent," and to "play the alto loud." But on the other hand, American organists get better paid, many of the Cathedral organists of England, not receiving more, for daily duty, than 100 pounds sterling per annum, a sum which in America is often paid the mere Sunday players.

But I am wandering from the Chimes. At Lichfield they are very beautiful in still twilight, nor is there ever any undue excitement or noise in the town to interfere with them. Many of the English parish churches have also beautiful chimes, but they are heard to far greater perfection in Belgium, where chiming is an absolute mania.

Travel, in these days of quick transit, is very much like the changes of scenery in a spectacular play, and the whistle of the locomotive only reminds one of the whistle of the scene shifter; so let us suppose the scene changed to Belgium.

It is night, and we are in the upper room of a quaint, peaked, gable house, the front window looking on an old Hotel de Ville of the 14th century, and a row of peaked houses, one of which, once occupied by a king, is described in his history by Motley. The back window shows a jagged confusion of curious red-tiled roofs, just beyond which shoots up in pale, creamy whiteness a rich tower, gradually losing itself in a still more elaborate spire, adorned with a profuseness of decoration, unknown in modern architecture. You might almost think that the structure was transparent, for as you look, you can plainly, through the delicate stone open work, see the stars in the sky beyond. In the dim light the soft whiteness of this spire—which seems to be built by giants, and then embroidered and adorned by fairies—looks like a mere phantasmagoria—an opium eater's dream—which may fade away the next minute.

As you gaze at it, suddenly, as clear and sharp as a Damascus blade, and yet as soft and grateful as a handful of dropping rose leaves, "falls on the listening ear of night" the music of the Chimes. At first you are content merely to enjoy sound; but soon the ear distinguishes a tune, and if you are an ultra-classicalist, great is your dismay and indignation, to discover that Verdi's influence is felt up in the old spire; for the chimes are playing the chorus, from "Lombardi,"

"Dio del tetto natio."

And a little later you can define the air of Pagano:

Oh! speranza di Vendetta

Gia sfavilli, nel mio core

Da tant' anni a me diletta

Altro voce non ascolto—no!

Five minutes elapse when an arpeggio chord is struck, and in another five minutes is repeated. Then the quarter of an hour gives a longer phrase, and at the half hour comes a passage from Gounod's "Faust," the "Lombardi" selection recurring at the next regular hour. In your sleep the chime music mingles strangely with your dreams, and this sweetest of all the voices of the night remains as your dearest memory of rich old Antwerp.

A locomotive whistle, a brief whirl, and the scene is changed.

It is another quaint old town, but the view is gay and lively, and the hour is not far from high noon. You are in a wide market place, with a rambling old City Hall, much addicted to pinnacles, and sadly given to gush out at the sides into superfluous wings and extensions. On the left peaked houses, like-wise peaked houses on the right. On the other side a cathedral, the lower part thereof encrusted with little shops, (don't print it chops), like a ship's hull with barnacles: while at the end of the Cathedral is a grand square tower, as far as it goes, hardly inferior to that of Antwerp, but now without the spire which it once possessed. The sun is shining brightly, and the booths in the market place are guarded by a marble statue of Maria Theresa, who, bare-headed, looks as if she would give her kingdom for a loan of a parasol.

Just at the hour of noon the chimes in the tower strike up such a merry peal! It would never do to hear it by starlight, when only sentimental melodies are desired; but here in the broad day, and in the gay public street, the sparkling music of Ah! non giunge seems delightfully appropriate. So you think of Bosio, and Patti, and the other delightful singers you have heard in Sonnambula, and you wonder whether, after all, any opera could be advantageously substituted for Bellini's favorite. Then the Chimes, having by this time finished the air, start at it again with quite brilliant variations, and you listen with your head perched on one side, and your tongue ready to cry brava! brava!

To be sure a market woman, insensible to Bellini, deems this an opportune moment to offer you a cabbage and a half peck of carrots at reduced rates, and in replying in pantomimic negative, you lose quite a pretty roulade; yet notwithstanding this leguminous diversion from the main theme, you hear enough to ever retain this sight and sound as your happiest, brightest memory of Mechlin or Malines.

Robert, toi que j'aime. Transcription. B. Richards. 40
These celebrated opera melodies will continue to please for a long time, and, next to the pleasure of hearing them sung by a celebrated cantatrice, is perhaps the pleasure of hearing them in good transcriptions, which unite the rich and expressive melody with fine harmonies, and brilliant runs, trills and arpeggios. Richard's transcriptions are among the very best.

Lilla's Highland March. C. Lorenz. 15
A little sparkling thing, for Lilla or any of her friends. Easy.

There is not such a vast number of good duets in the world, and this book contains a large proportion of them. The "full gilt" are just the thing for presents, the "cloth" are elegant and durable, and the "plain" as good, inside, as any.

ADALBERT GYROWETZ.

CHAPTER VII.

Arrives in London.—Distinguished reception.—The Lord Mayor's Dinner.—Duke of Cumberland.—A feast for an Alderman.—"Father Haydn" comes.—The Salomon and other Concerts.—The London Musical "Season."—The "Surprise Symphony" when it was a Surprise—G., too, called upon for Symphonies.

From Paris, via Calais to Dover—with a touch of sea-sickness—and, upon landing, Gyrowetz found himself in a new world. Everything was different from France or Italy; different air, different style of building, both public and private; different arrangements for everything; totally different manners; the greatest cleanliness, and quite another people. At the same time among the lower classes he noted rude incivility and entire want of consideration towards strangers, all whom they included under the name "French dogs."

At six o'clock one morning Gyrowetz reached the Canon Hotel in London, where the register of his name, occupation, &c., came under the notice of another guest at this house, who immediately sought out the new comer. It was Giarnovich, the violin virtuoso—the same whom Gyrowetz had known in Vienna—and who at one time ranked among the first violinists in Europe.—Giarnovich (often written Jarnovitch) at once offered his friendship and all the aid in his power—a kindly act anywhere, but especially in London, then if not now—and moreover invited him that very afternoon to a private concert at the Prince of Wales's (afterward George IV) to whom he would introduce the new comer and perform some specimen of his compositions. Gyrowetz wished to excuse himself on the score of the necessity of rest and the like, but Giarnovich would take no refusal, and thus it happened that on the day of his arrival in London his position was favorably fixed, for he was kindly received by the Prince, and his quartet, which was played, was a success. At this little concert were several Lords and French émigrés, among them the Duke of Orleans—father of Louis Philippe. One of his first six quartets and his symphonies had already reached London and had found some sale; but his reception at the Prince's set the fashion, and he became for a time quite the musical lion. Invitations to dine and to musical parties became of daily occurrence; and in his old age what he remembered with pleasure was, that in the first circles he was treated like a friend, and not merely as the fashionable musical notoriety.

But the reminiscences of London—let them be translated literally—a part of them fall in the time of Haydn's first visit—and in the list of composers and virtuosos given in Haydn's note-book, we find the names of Gyrowetz and Giarnovich.

"The invitations grew so numerous that Gy-rowetz often had cards five or six weeks beforehand, that he might be sure of appearing. These cards were arranged in a sort of machine above the chimney-piece, that he might have them before his eyes and not forget. To all grand dinners and parties he received a card of invitation; to all private festivals and pleasures, to evening receptions, routs, card parties, and balls he was invited; he was treated as a friend and guest, and found everywhere the most friendly reception. He had also the honor to be invited two years in succession to the grand dinner in the city which was given in the Mansion House, on the occasion of the election of the Burgomaster, or Lord Mayor, and at which the king and all the notables of London appeared. There he happened to sit near the famous Mr. Fox and Lord Cardigan (?), whose acquaintance he thus made, and with whom he often afterwards came in contact, and had the honor to converse upon many a topic. He had the happiness so to conduct himself as to win the general favor of the English.

"The Duke of Cumberland was one of the greatest patrons of music in London. Gyrowetz's music had made a deep impression upon him, and the composer had the happiness to be treated with marks of special consideration by his highness. It oftened happened that he had the high honor in the theatre of being invited into his Grace's box. Similar marks of honor were paid him also in the streets, for when the Duke happened to meet him, he called him into his carriage; at which the people passing were astonished, but also pleased that his highness was disposed thus to prize and distinguish an artist. And so Gyrowetz lived in London, valued and universally respected.

"He was once invited to a great house to join a number of French émigrés at a green turtle dinner. More than ten various dishes, all from turtle, were placed upon the table. After the company had thus seen, that a complete dinner might be prepared from this animal alone, another large room was thrown open, where a superb feast of various meats was set out, which was eaten with marvellous appetite—the turtle dishes having been prepared merely as a rarity and a show. The guests were the former Finance Minister Vildeul and family, the family Dillon, &c., &c.—among them the celebrated 'handsome Dillon,' the favorite of the Parisian women. The evening was spent in play, and as the company was numerous, with a large proportion of women, the play of 'sequeze' was chosen, with which the evening was closed. It happened that Prince Philip von Lichtenstein (of Austria) was one of the guests, and uttered various expressions, which might easily have been made the occasion of trouble; Gyrowetz luckily succeeded in smoothing over matters and prevailing upon the prince to leave the house; and so the amusements of the evening were not interrupted.

"As to Art, he now received orders from the music dealers for new compositions; namely, sonatas for the pianoforte and quartets; and from Salomon for symphonies for the great concerts in Hanover Square—which latter was Gyrowetz's principal business in London.

"For these works he was very well paid and put in a condition not only to live respectably, but to lay up something. In this manner passed away a year in London; for him very pleasantly, and employed in the best possible manner.

"Joseph Haydn was called thither at this time, and had six symphonies to compose for the Hanover Square concerts. Gyrowetz awaited his revered friend with feelings of intense longing and joy, and upon his arrival (Jan. 1, 1791) he hastened to him, not a little to the relief of Haydn, at thus finding in the strange city an acquaintance, upon whose honesty and friendship he could safely reckon. The first musicians then in London—Giarnovich, Dussek, Cramer, Groedell (Crosdill) Janovich (also, in English books, Yaniewicz), Clementi, &c., came also to pay their respects to the greatly respected Haydn, to show him the reverence they felt and to testify their delight at his arrival; to all which the composer uttered his thanks with heartfelt joy and emotion.

"The English public, however, at first received him with no such feelings; they found him too old, and said they would indeed listen gladly to his symphonies, but that they had no desire to make the personal acquaintance of such an old man.

"Such remarks, had wounded Gyrowetz, as well as all the other artists; and now the question was, by what means could they make Haydn the popular favorite: as Gyrowetz now personally knew all who in London gave the tone, both to the public and in private society, and who ranked as authorities in all matters pertaining to music and the arts generally, he went to these people and explained how great a man Haydn was, what a renown he enjoyed in all Europe, and that it would redound little to their honor if his reception was less brilliant than his merits warranted.

"In answer to these representations the gentlemen promised to do all in their power to secure the popularity of Haydn. A grand supper was therefore prepared in one of their houses in his honor, to which the men of leading influence and the first musical artists of both sexes were invited. On this occasion much was said upon the excellencies of Haydn as a composer, and upon his great talents, and every effort made to recommend him to those present; his own excellent manner was also in his favor, and his sitting down to the pianoforte after supper and singing several jolly German songs, created quite an enthusiasm, so much so that a repetition of them was demanded. Another gentleman followed up the plan by a similar meeting at his house, at which again were assembled the notables of London, and where Haydn was again treated with the greatest attention and honor—and so in a short time he became a favorite, and was urgently invited into the highest society. [Compare Haydn's letter of January 8, 1791, to Mad. Genzinger, in Dwight's Journal, Vol. XX. p. 387, and see how unaware Haydn was that any effort was necessarily made to secure him that public consideration, which so much pleased him.]

"Now drew near the time when the concerts should begin—the principal ones were the Hanover Square Concert, (for which Haydn and Gyrowetz were engaged), the Ancient, and the Freemasons' Concerts—to all of which the most celebrated artists from abroad were usually invited. In the Ancient Concert, works of deceased masters only were given; in the others music of no exclusive styles. Cramer and Salomon were the first orchestral leaders; Cramer always directed with the violin in the oratorios—Salomon in the Hanover Square concerts. [In those days the London concerts were not directed, as now by a conductor with a baton, but by the first violinist, and, as in the case of Haydn's Symphonies, by the composer or some distinguished musician at a piano-forte!] Both Cramer and Salomon were remarkable violin players. The concerts were given weekly, upon regular days, and lasted through the 'season,' which began in March and continued through April, May and June in London, after which the provincial concerts took their course. These latter were also made very brilliant—the most distinguished singers and instrumental performers were engaged, and nobly were they paid. In England the autumn is mostly spent in the country, where people make the time pass pleasantly by family recreations, light amusements, music, and especially in hunting and shooting.—The young ladies were in general musically educated, and much practised in playing the piano-forte, or in singing,—a pleasant resource for the autumn evenings. The men, on the other hand, had little or no musical culture—though they liked to hear music, and sometimes allowed themselves at a dinner or supper to be prevailed upon to roar or troll out an English song with their untutored voices. This sort of life lasts usually until Christmas, when the city amusements begin again, and the concerts, both public and private.

"The best concerts were those in the Hanover Square rooms under the direction of Mr. Salomon, to which Joseph Haydn was engaged, whose symphonies were the leading feature and were received with great applause. In these concerts vocal pieces, concertos for various instruments, and sometimes choruses were also produced, so that they often lasted until midnight, and not seldom the women dropped asleep. This gave Haydn the idea of writing something which should wake them up; and this was the occasion of the favorite Andante with the drums [in that known in English as the 'Surprise Symphony'], at which in fact the women did wake up, and several of them screamed. Gyrowetz happened to visit Haydn just as he was upon this Andante. The composer was so delighted and pleased with his idea, that he sat down to the square piano-forte and played the movement, heartily laughing, and at the fortissimo prophetically exclaiming, 'There the women will jump!' In the course of the season, this symphony had to be played several times. In the series of concerts, several new symphonies by Gyrowetz were performed, alternately with Haydn's, which were also composed expressly for Salomon—of which, three Sinfonies Concertantes were particularly successful—and all of which were received so well as to secure their publication.

"And so the winter months passed most pleasantly away, with concerts, and invitations and all sorts of recreation.

CHAPTER VIII.

Second year in London.—Haydn goes and Pleyel comes.—G.'s memory at fault.—Visits "the first gentleman in Europe" at Brighton.—State of music in England.—Glees and Catches.—Baumgarten.—Philidor.—Lights and shades of English life; Newgate; Westminster Abbey; Oratorios and egg-shells.—Knows Sheridan.—Falls among thieves again.—Drury Lane; Storace and Michael Kelly.—Trial of Warren Hastings.

"At length came the time [summer of 1792] when Haydn must return to Vienna, but with the promise to come again in the future. Not long before, the distinguished composer, Pleyel, had reached London, with the intention of giving six concerts for his own benefit in opposition to those of Salomon, for which Haydn was engaged; but as saw that he should meet with no success, he returned to Paris, without effecting anything.—[It is hardly necessary to say, that Gyrowetz has trusted his memory too much in this matter of Pleyel—for the readers of Dwight's Journal will recall a very different state of facts as exhibited in the Haydn-Genzinger correspondence and in the Haydn diaries, as published there. The old gentleman, too, writing nearly fifty years afterward seems to have thought that Haydn was in London only during one season (1791), while in fact he was there during two.]

"After the season closed Gyrowetz was invited by his highness the Prince of Wales to his villa at Brighton, as accompanist, he being fond of singing; the celebrated songstress Storace was also there, with whom the Prince often sang.—Here Gyrowetz had the distinction of being retained several weeks, of dining with the Prince, of freely sharing in all the country amusements and of being treated far more as a friend than as an artist. Returning to London he lived on as before.

"His time was partly devoted to composition and partly to becoming acquainted with English musicians, he wishing to learn their opinions upon various musical topics. From their observations he saw clearly, that at that time, little was known in England of Mozart and Beethoven. [How should they know anything of the latter? Did Gyrowetz himself at that time 1791-2, know anything of the young organist and piano-forte player, who had not yet left Bonn, and was but 21 years old?]

"Hardly anything was known in London beyond their 'Glees' and 'Catches'—a sort of canon—which were mostly sung on festive occasions, at dinners and suppers, and gave rise to the proverb: 'No song, no supper.' Among the musicians he became acquainted with a certain Baumgarten—a German by birth and director of the orchestra in the Haymarket theatre. This man was one of the most thorough contrapuntists whom he met in all his travels; he alone it was, who could give a satisfactory explanation of all chords and keys, of all progressions and resolutions, and decipher and explain with mathematical proofs the foundation and construction of the chords. [The reader may recollect a similar tribute to Baumgarten's memory in a note to the Haydn Diary, from the Harmonicon.]

"Another celebrated man whom he had the opportunity of knowing, was Philidor, distinguished not only as a composer of several French operettas, which were given with success in Paris, but also as the first and best chess-player of his time. Philidor had established a casino in London for chess-players alone; this was a large hall, in which were 30 or 40 tables with chessboards. Philidor carried on games with all the players at once, walking from table to table; when an opponent had made a move he was called, looked at the position, made his own move, and went to another; and so on until the games were ended, he generally taking the stakes as victor."

[Daniel Willard Fiske, one of the best authorities living in the history of chess, doubts the correctness of Gyrowetz's statement that Philidor was the proprietor of this club-room—but the old gentleman's reminiscence seems to be founded upon personal knowledge.]

Of his further recollections of London much has lost all interest and is omitted. He went everywhere, saw everything and made England and the English a study. He saw thirteen persons hung from one scaffold at Newgate;—was followed and laughed at in Wogsaal (Vauxhall) by a party of young men, because he wore black silk breeches and boots—which was not the mode then in England;—knew a gentleman who thoroughly understood all the rules of the science and art of music—harmony, counterpoint, four-part writing—but was utterly incapable of producing anything original, owing to the absolute want of any musical idea;—was present at the great annual performances of Handel's Oratorios in Westminster Abbey, which he describes, but adds nothing new to the well known descriptions of them—except the following:—"During the pauses the audience employed itself generally in eating hard eggs, ham and cold roast meats, so that upon leaving the Abbey, people had to wade through a mass of egg-shells and other offal." The chorus singing was excellent—of course the solos were.

Gyrowetz spent most of one summer at Hampstead and Highgate, and became acquainted there with "the celebrated author, Sheridan," who occupied a villa, to which a double garden was attached, connected by a tunnel under the street. He was often invited to Sheridan's house, had much talk with him upon music and found the orator-poet-player-spendthrift a man of great musical knowledge. A very pleasant summer Gyrowetz had of it, and a profitable, as he found many pupils both in singing and composition, and could compose sonatas undisturbed, for which he was well paid. He had great trouble with thieves—and, indeed, England in those days was as pre-eminent for land thieves, as she now is for "water thieves, I mean pirates"—quoth Shylock. About Hampstead mounted "street robbers (highwaymanns hight)" abounded, who lay in wait for the higher classes, when driving into London, so that they were obliged to have their carriages accompanied by two or three mounted servants for protection—just what the English novelists of the last century are so fond of describing.—Gyrowetz on one occasion saw one of these "highwaymanns" pursued by several of these guards—but he escaped by leaping from his horse and flying into a wood, where his pursuers could not follow.

One evening, coming out of Drury Lane theatre he was surrounded by a band of pickpockets, who searched him thoroughly and took everything he had about him. His shouts and cries for help were useless, they were drowned in the noise of carriages and the universal confusion—and this took place, while the king with his guard and torchbearers was passing by and hundreds of foot passengers were in the street. On the whole he thought himself lucky to escape without farther injury than the loss of the contents of his pockets.

Drury Lane Theatre was at that time one of the best; and its performances were English opera and the spoken drama alternately. The orchestra was good; Mrs. Crouch, prima donna, and O'Kelly, first tenor, were excellent. Storace was composer, and was in the habit of arranging melodies from quartets, symphonies, sonatas, &c., to English words, for which he was much better paid than for original compositions; but the directors had the honesty to name all the authors plundered upon the bills—after this manner, "The music compiled from Haydn, Gyrowetz, Pleyel, Koseluch, &c." Really English composers were then unknown.

Gyrowetz received three cards, for himself and two friends, to the trial of Warren Hastings in Westminster hall (May, 1792). As he was crossing Westminster place to the hall one morning about 11 o'clock, a thief sprang between him and his friends, caught the gold chain of one of them in hopes of stealing the watch,—the chain broke and the thief escaped with but a part of it as his booty. It was a dangerous matter to arrest one of these thieves, as they usually had plenty of companions near. Gyrowetz heard Pitt, who spoke in a calm voice—and who was pale and thin. Hastings was a little man, who spoke in a clear, loud voice in his own defence, which was finally successful.

Chopin's Polish Songs.*

(From Fitzgerald's City Item, Philadelphia.)

Not long ago I was attracted by the title of these songs, and, through the kindness of a friend, I soon had the pleasure of seeing them. I was instantly struck by their beauty. The biographers of Chopin have strangely slighted them, and I can find no mention of them anywhere. But I remember that Beethoven's songs were never spoken of, and Mozart's songs (a great quantity of which no American has ever seen) are slighted even by those who receive the credit of writing complete biographies. There is much great music which I know I shall never behold, and I feel much sorrier because we know there are quantities which are never spoken of. What a series of fine articles might be written on old songs which have been neglected by a foolish world!

Every one knows Chopin as the author of a number of peculiarly beautiful Mazourkas, many charming waltzes, and some great nocturnes. He has written a few sonatas, marches and ballads. The wonderful delicacy and originality which characterized him, will make him beloved by every musician. The world does not appreciate him. The world is stupid—because it is ignorant. It will always be thus, and artists will depend upon the praise of the few rather than the spasmodic approval of the mass.

But it is about Chopin's Polish songs that I intend to speak. I consider them delicious compositions. They are sixteen in number. I give the names of them below. Those that I have seen (they have not all been issued yet in America) I can describe.

1. The Maiden's Wish.
2. Spring.
3. Troubled Waters.
4. Bacchanalian Song.
5. What a Young Girl Loves.
6. Out of my Sight.
7. The Messenger.
8. My Beloved One.
9. A Melody.

* Chopin's Polish Songs. Boston: Oliver Ditson & Co.

10. Horseman before Battle.
11. Two Lovers.
12. My Joya.
13. Melancholy.
14. The Little Ring.
15. The Return home.
16. Lithuanian Song.

No. 1. Is somewhat Tyrolian and possesses a clear, simple melody like the voice of a young girl;—it is rather thoughtful, and there is a feeling of longing through it which expresses the words thoroughly.

No. 11. Is a funeral dirge, which reminds me slightly of the "Marche Funèbre." It is the finest number I have yet seen. The minor key is piercing sad, and the rise and fall of the benumbed passion fills it with a strange deep sorrow which thrills you. The feeling is broad and mysterious, and the taking of the low D and then the octave produces a fine effect.

No. 5. Is a graceful little bit, very characteristic and melodious, without being trifling.

No. 14. Is a lover upbraiding his mistress for having broken her troth. It is admirably suited for a tenor voice and is full of passion, and while it reproaches her, is characterized by a feeling of tenderness, which shows that in the midst of his anger he loves her still.

No. 16. Is a quaint song somewhat in the style of the old Huguenot chansons, and comes to a fine climax. I like it next to No. 11.

All the above possess flowing melodies—markedly original, and the feeling of each song is distinct and complete. They possess every element to make them become widely sung, and I am surprised—no, not surprised, but annoyed, to think that they are not better known. They may be considered trifles—but they are trifles that no other composer could have written so simply—so purely—so beautifully. Their simplicity is their strength, and the same charm which Chopin has given to his best compositions is not weakened in these morceaux. Blessings on the man who could not help writing down such happy thoughts.

The Old-Fashioned Choir.

BY BENJ. F. TAYLOR.

I have fancied sometimes, the old Bethel-bent beam,
That trembled to earth in the Patriarch's dream,
Was a ladder of Song in that wilderness rest
From the pillow of stone to the Blue of the Blest,
And the angels descending to dwell with us here,
"Old Hundred" and "Corinth" and "China" and "Mear."

All the hearts are not dead, not under the sod,
That those breaths can blow open to Heaven and God!

Ah, "Silver Street" leads by a bright golden road,
—Oh, not to the hymns that in harmony flowed—
But those sweet human psalms in the old-fashioned choir,

To the girl that sang alto—the girl that sang air!
"Let us sing in his praise," the Minister said,
All the psalm-books at once fluttered open at "York," Sunned their long dotted wings in the words that he read,

While the leader leaped into the tune just ahead,
And politely picked up the key-note with a fork,
And the vicious old viol went growling along
At the heels of the girls, in the rear of the song.

I need not a wing—bid no genii come,
With a wonderful web from Arabian loom,
To bear me again up the river of Time,
When the world was in rhythm and life was its rhyme;
Where the stream of the years flowed so noiseless and narrow,

That across it there floated the song of a sparrow;
For a sprig of green caraway carries me there,
To the old village church and the old village choir,
When clear of the floor my feet slowly swung
And timed the sweet pulse of the praise as they sung,
Till the glory aslant from the afternoon sun

Seemed the rafters of gold in God's temple begun!
You may smile at the nasals of old Deacon Brown,
Who followed by scent till he ran the tune down—
And dear sister Green, with more goodness than grace,

Rose and fell on the tunes as she stood in her place,
And where "Coronation" exultantly flows,
Tried to reach the high notes on the tips of her toes!
To the land of the leal they went with their song,
Where the choir and the chorus together belong.
Oh, be lifted ye Gates! Let me hear them again—
Blessed Song, Blessed Sabbath, forever amen!

More Letters by Mendelssohn.

The following notice of the new volume is from the pen of FERDINAND HILLER, of Cologne, who, besides being one of the first composers living, has not his superior in the field of musical æsthetic criticism and belles-lettres. We are indebted to Mr. Bridgeman, of the London Musical World, for the translation.

After publishing Felix Mendelssohn's Reisebriefe, the brother and the son of that great and never to be forgotten artist have now issued a collection of his other letters, comprising the entire period from 1833 to 1847, when his too short career was brought to a close. If, on reading the earlier volume, our heart warms at the youth, the freshness and activity of the happy young man, so early self-reliant, this fresh selection exhibits to us the fine picture of the mature man, incessantly pressing forwards, and never false to himself. The three lustres, with the history of which we have to do, must be divided into three parts, though these parts in reference to the length of time to which they refer, are, it is true, very unequal. The first comprehends the two years (in reality scarcely a year and a half) which Mendelssohn passed in Düsseldorf; the second, the seven or eight years during which he directed the Gewandhaus Concerts in Leipzig; and the third and last, the years during which he lived alternately in Berlin and Leipzig, not belonging actually to either town, and busying himself with plans for creating some new and perfectly independent position. Under all these circumstances, he had his full share of what was good and beautiful; but, like every true genius, he gave away much more than he received. On the other hand, there was no want of causes to irritate, mortify and deeply grieve him, and his disposition, not only easily excited, but highly sensitive as well, always required a considerable period in order to recover that pure joyousness which formed so pleasing and leading a feature in his character. It was a lucky thing for Mendelssohn, however great his bitterness on account of it, that the Berlin Sing-Academie did not elect him as their conductor. The one-sided nature of his occupation in that capacity would have exercised a disturbing influence upon the varied development of his powers, and it was afterwards proved, often enough, that the air of Berlin did not suit him. At Düsseldorf he found, in a fresh and active artistic life, in which he disports with the same satisfaction as in the Rhine, a beneficial antidote against the feeling of "loneliness" he had brought with him from the capital. It is true that his duties at the theatre were not brought to any particularly agreeable conclusion; he had allowed himself to be burdened with all kinds of employment of the most material kind, and contrasting rather too glaringly with his delicate and somewhat spoiled nature. But he easily shakes off his annoyance, composes, as he did always and everywhere, a mass of admirable music, and goes to Leipzig, before feeling quite at home in Düsseldorf. There, while in the midst of his work on St. Paul, he was struck by one of the heaviest blows by which he could be struck: the death of his father. We may measure the greatness of this loss, to a certain extent at least, if we read his father's two letters included in this present collection. There reigns in them a most noble, and truly paternal, because genuinely friendly tone. They display, moreover, such acquirements and wisdom; the writer enters so deeply into the most important questions in music, that we could not help being filled with the most sincere respect for so excellent a man, even if we had known nothing else about him and had not been more nearly acquainted with him. Of a truth he was worthy of being the son of Moses, and the father of Felix, Mendelssohn.

In the summer of 1836, Mendelssohn was in Frankfort, where, for some weeks, he conducted the Cäcilien-Verein, after the great impression produced at the I. Schlegel Musical Festival by his St. Paul had powerfully aided in enabling him to recover somewhat from the heavy blow he had received. From this city he writes as follows to his sister Rebecca: "This is my state of mind at present, all day long: I cannot compose, write letters, or play the piano; the most I can do is to draw a little." We cannot help regretting that the editors, in a spirit of delicacy easily intelligible, have not published any of those utterances of feeling which spring from the affection which caused Mendelssohn to return, for the purpose of soon becoming a happy bridegroom, to Leipzig in the autumn, and during the rise and growth of which he associated, in the most amicable manner, with his friends, "as in a waking dream," speaking of his joys and his woes in a state of the greatest excitement and with truly ingenuous frankness. He was married in the spring of 1837, and, on returning from the trip which followed the wedding, brought back with him, among other things, the Psalm, "Wie der Hirsch schreit," one of the many proofs of the power he possessed of always devoting himself, under the most varying circumstances, to the highest tasks of art. In the autumn, he produced, for the first time, at the Birmingham Festival, St. Paul, with extraordinary success. Indeed, the description, in these letters, of his visits to England afford testimony of the great enthusiasm which the English evinced towards the German artist all through his life, an enthusiasm so lasting, that in consideration of it we feel inclined to forgive them many sins in matters connected with music. But what Mendelssohn himself says, in many places, concerning the impression he carried home with him of such brilliant triumphs, is highly characteristic.

The period during which Mendelssohn resided and worked in Leipzig, with the intervening journeys to the Rhine, to Switzerland, and to England, when he was surrounded by perfect domestic felicity, was probably the most unclouded period of his life. The beautiful intercourse which he never neglected to maintain with his family in Berlin, was once more heavily shaken in the year 1852 by the death of the deeply-loved mother. "The centre of union in which we might still feel ourselves children, is now wanting to us," writes Felix, and he makes his sisters the most affectionate proposals as to how they should arrange so as to continue for the future as closely united as previously. We know how united they were, and what a terrible impression was produced upon him by his sister Fanny's death in the last year of his own existence.

After the accession to the throne of Friedrich Wilhelm IV., who, every one is aware, exhibited the greatest interest for Mendelssohn's talent, and overwhelmed him with well-merited marks of favor, negotiations were commenced with the highest authorities in Berlin, but, despite all the good will displayed on both sides, they did not end in the desired result. Mendelssohn was to play an active artistic part in the Capital; he was to have the guidance of the musical section at the Academy; he was to be at the head of a Conservatory to be subsequently established, and Heaven knows what else. But it came to nothing.

It is to the impulse given him by the art-loving King that we are indebted, however, for the music of A Midsummer Night's Dream, Antigone, Œdipus, and Racine's Athalie. Such music is, undoubtedly, worth more than anything an official position, however influential, in which Mendelssohn might have been placed, would have created for the world. But all those who were intimately acquainted with Mendelssohn can easily imagine how little satisfaction he must have felt at all these experiments, all these offers, which dissolved like shadows under his grasp, and this continual vacillation with regard to the immediate future. The letters published in relation to this are of the greatest interest, and afford another proof how difficult it is to put new wine into old bottles—for such is really the old-new moral to be gathered from the numerous letters on the subject. Great satisfaction, on the other hand, was afforded Mendelssohn by the foundation of the Conservatory in Leipzig. In this he was seconded, in the most friendly manner, by every one, especially the late King of Saxony.

A gloomy weight bears down the last letters we have of him, and we shudder on reading, in a letter addressed by him, on the 29th July, 1847, from Interlaken to his sister Rebecca, the words, "And with all our phrases, and inquiries, and words, I have constantly but one thought: how short is life!" Four months later he had ceased to exist.

Of all the works of art that he presented to the world, and which may be entitled perfect, his life was really the most beautiful. And as the man and the artist force their way to the surface, we find in his career, taken as a whole, all the qualities which distinguish his creations. A kind of harmony is spread over all, and in it we see light and almost playful charm, moral seriousness, heartfelt, warm sentiment, unutterable truthfulness of conviction, sharp conception, and strong, energetic power of realization; a marked prominence of that individuality, which, though great and original, knows its limits, and strives not to overstep, but to render them as perfect and rounded as possible within itself; no sacrifices to the golden calf, but no instance of pietistic avoidance of brilliant beauty, when genuine, and not abused for a bad end; frequently an amiable concession to the wants (social or artistic) of larger circles, but always employed for the purpose of exercising an ennobling influence, and never, allowing itself to be dragged down by them. Honorable and conscientious is he in his life and in his productions, in his deeds and in his words.

The thousands who know and love this extraordinary artist from his works, will learn from these letters, where he shows himself in the smallest as well as the most important relations of life, to esteem him more highly, and to respect him more warmly than ever. We should like to quote half the book, were it not far preferable to refer every one, who takes any interest in art, to the whole work. In the first place, the unconscious autobiography, written in a spirit of the greatest candor, is indescribably attractive; and then we have the labor which preceded and that which followed his greatest works; his behavior towards the managers of concerts, musical-festival committees, officials, ministers, princes, and kings; the profound attachment, always the same, towards his family; the kindly sternness displayed towards his more intimate musical friends, and the conscientiousness with which he entered upon the most varied musical undertakings. How unreservedly he appreciates talent, when not opposed to his own convictions of the dignity of art, but how admirably and sharply he combats all that is vain and empty, especially when puffed up with presumption! Nothing can be more apt than what he says, for instance, about the whilom celebrated "Rhine Song," of 1848, in the midst of all the rumpus and fuss which surrounded it. We must regret, though we may not be able to object to, the fact of the excellent editors' having been so very reserved with the opinions concerning celebrated men and works of the present day, which are doubtless in the letters. But their principal aim was, very properly, to place in a particularly clear light before us the most inward nature of the beloved object of their work, and in this they have perfectly succeeded.

We must not measure these letters by any so-called literary standard—they are chatted rather than written, and, in throwing them off, for they are mostly confidential, Mendelssohn did not, as a matter of course, care about that perfection of style which he exhibits in his smallest song. When, however, he has to give reasons for an opinion, or to establish a decision, his words, in their unvarnished simplicity, are marked by a masterly conciseness and significance, a degree of exhaustiveness, but seldom to be found in the most famous critics, aestheticians, or historians. This is the case in his letter to a Herr X. on the difficulty of being at the same time airy and yet decided as regards the outlines, when treating fanciful subjects; in his letter to Herr Souhay on the import, conveyed in words, of instrumental music; and in a hundred observations, of various lengths, out of which we might cull a splendid résumé for composers. There is one striking fact, in connection with this, which, perhaps, casts an instructive light upon him; namely, the moderation of his expressions, a moderation which invariably causes him, when speaking of anything, however powerfully it may move him, to employ words rather below than above the level of what he feels. He does not speak of creation, of enthusiasm, of inspiration, but of work, of plunging his glance inwards, and of his pleasure in his task. Thus the want of pathos and passion, for which many persons blame his productions, may, perhaps, arise principally from the dread he entertained of that emptiness which is liable to ensue so easily from the slightest exaggeration.—Enough!—this fine book shall not serve as the title for an essay. It was a necessity for me to speak my mind about it to my friends, far and near. May its valuable pages find as many readers as they deserve to find, and, at the same time, illustrate and glorify the thoroughly harmonious and refulgent form of him, who, though, passed away, remains for ever with us.

The orchestra pitch, now introduced in the Berlin Opera House, is the same as used in the last century in the performance of the operas by Mozart and others.

London.

The Times has the following summary of the Operatic season at Her Majesty's Theatre, which closed about the middle of August. (A like review of the season at the other house,—the Royal Italian Opera,—will be found in our last number).

A stronger or more serviceable company of principal singers than Mr. Mapleson this year provided for his subscribers could scarcely be desired—if, as times go, it could possibly be obtained, which is very doubtful! His chief prima donna has now no rival in her own special walk. If there were any fault with which to charge Mdle. Titiens it would be a fault on the right side—that of having done too much. The zeal of this accomplished artist is almost without precedent. Like Giulia Grisi—to whose throne and sceptre she has succeeded, as Queen of Lyric Tragedy—she seems both willing and able to play almost any given part in the operatic repertory. Out of the 15 operas represented at various intervals this season, only three can be named in which Mdle. Titiens took no part. She appeared seven times as Leonora in the Trovatore; twice as Elvira, in the Puritani; four times as Lucia di Lammermoor; four times as Lucrezia Borgia; three times as Selvaggio, in Signor Schira's Niccolò de' Luppi; three times as Valentine, in the Huguenots; six times as Amalia, in Il Ballo in Maschera; once as Norma; four times as Reiza, in Oberon; twice as the Countess, in Le Nozze di Figaro; once as Donna Anna, in Don Giovanni; and 20 times as Margaret, in Faust—in all no less than 57 performances out of about 70. Her most remarkable successes this year have been in Norma and Margaret—not because of their superior excellence when viewed by the side of her other efforts, but because they first showed how earnestly she is striving to become mistress of the bond fide Italian school, and because the last was a character which even her greatest admirers thought wholly out of her line. The result triumphantly proved them wrong, inasmuch as a Margaret more poetically conceived and beautifully represented, a Margaret more nearly approaching the ideal of Goethe's incomparable Gretchen, it would be hardly possible to see. The part in which Mdle. Titiens challenged most discussion was that of Bellini's Elvira—the music of I Puritani, in the opinion of many good judges, being in certain respects unfavorable to the exhibition of her peculiar and in their way inimitable powers. The three operas in which Mdle. Titiens did not sing were Il Barbiere di Siviglia, La Figlia del Reggimento, and La Traviata.

In Rossini's comic masterpiece Mdle. Trebelli, as Rosina, confirmed the favorable opinion she elicited last year. As the engagement of Madame Alboni was only for a limited number of representations, the performances of that incomparable singer were confined to two parts—Azucena (Il Trovatore), and Fatima (Oberon); and on certain occasions, when Madame Alboni's services were elsewhere in request, Mdle. Trebelli supplied her place, to the general satisfaction, in both these characters; besides which she appeared, from time to time, as Maffeo Orsini (Lucrezia), Urbain (the Huguenots), the Sorcerer (Ballo in Maschera), Siebel (Faust), Cherubino (Figaro), and Laodamia (Niccolò de' Luppi)—in which last the grace and meaning she threw into the charming romanza, "La pella Mea," composed by Signor Schira and interpolated in the opera expressly on her account, obtained for it a popularity which travelled from the stage to the concert-room. The sparkling French opera of Donizetti and the lyric melodrama of Verdi brought forward one of the new singers announced in the prospectus—viz., Mdle. Artot, who, whether as the dashing Vivandiere or the consumptive courtesan, showed talent, both as singer and actress, of a very high order. That Mdle. Artot—who besides these characters only assumed one other, viz., that of Adalgisa (Norma)—will be heard of again next year there can be little cause to doubt. Like Mdle. Fioretti, at the rival house, Mdle. Artot convinced the London musical public that genuine art had still some representatives on the continent. Mdle. Volpini—a young singer from the Italian Opera in Paris, whose name was not announced in the prospectus—produced an extremely favorable impression as Oscar the page, in Il Ballo in Maschera, and made a more than creditable attempt, near the end of the season, in the far more responsible part of Zerlina (Don Giovanni). Mdle. Therese Ellinger, from Vienna, early in the season, successively assumed the parts of Azucena (vice Alboni) and Maffeo Orsini (pending the arrival of Trebelli). This lady was also an unexpected acquisition, her name not having appeared in the prospectus.

Of the other lady singers in Mr. Mapleson's company it is enough to say that Mademoiselle Louise Michal, the Swedish protégée of Madame Goldschmidt Lind, has been eminently serviceable, although only two parts—those of Margaret de Valois (Huguenots) and Elvira (Don Giovanni)—fell to her share; that Madame Lemaire, always ready and always correct, took the character of Puck, in Oberon, when that of Fatima devolved upon Mdlle. Trebelli; that Madame Tacanni is remembered by her very natural impersonation of the old woman (Martha) in Faust; that Mdlle. Rosa Erina (anglicised Rose Hersee) gave the "Mermaid's Song" in Oberon very prettily; and that Mdlle. Louise Liebhart (a Hungarian, from Vienna)—another about whom the prospectus said nothing—by her assumption, late in the season, of the character of Susanna, in Le Nozze di Figaro, fully warranted the general satisfaction caused by a report that she is re-engaged for next year. Mdlles. Volpini, Ellenger and Liebhart may thus fairly be accepted as atonement for the absence of Mdlle. Kaiser, Mdlle. Rosa de Ruda and Mdlle. Kellogg, all of whom had been announced. The greatest disappointment was felt at the non-arrival of Mdlle. Kellogg, a young singer who, in Gilda (Rigoletto) and other parts, has earned considerable celebrity at New York and various North American cities, and who had already once failed to answer to her name in 1862—the excuse being then, as now "sudden and severe indisposition." Mdlle. Kellogg is said to be under 20, very good-looking, and possessed of dramatic powers that have awakened the admiration of no less respectable an authority than Miss Charlotte Cushman.

On referring to the list of tenors, barytones and basses put forth in the managerial preliminary document, we find the names of three gentlemen who were not forthcoming. These are Signor Rovere, a barytone "buffo" in the "dry" style, one of the earliest apprentices on the first institution of the formidable rivalry at Bow-street, and subsequently engaged by Mr. Lumley, some 10 or 12 years ago; Signor Fagotti, a barytone "serioso," who played in Verdi's Rigoletto and Mercadante's Il Giuramento, when Mr. E. T. Smith gave Italian opera at Drury-lane Theatre; and Signor Bagagiolo, a bass, who was to have come out as Oroveso. The place of Signor Bagagiolo, at the eleventh hour, was unceremoniously filled by Signor Bossi, a gentleman who, with lively readiness, has shown himself apt, at a given moment, to assume any part that might be offered him, large or small, from Don Pasquale to Masetto. With Signor Zucchini at hand, there was no need of a dry Bartolo, or a dry Sulpizio, and so Signor Rovere was not missed; while, with Signor Violetti, M. Gassier, and Mr. Santley in the company, there were "singing barytones" enough and to spare, whether for serious or comic parts; and so no one cried out for "Fagotti." Signor Violetti (an old favorite), after playing Giorgio, in the Puritani, and Basilio, in the Barbier, vanished without a warning, and was no more heard of. M. Gassier has been indefatigable, representing many parts in various styles—Riccardo (I Puritani), Enrico (Lucia), Alphonso (Lucrezia), Triolo (Nicolo de Lapi), "First Conspirator" (Ballo in Maschera), Mephistopheles (Faust), Babekah (Oberon), Figaro (both in the Barbier and Le Nozze), Don Giovanni, for example—displaying more or less excellence in all. A more useful artist, and one with a larger repertory at command than this gentleman it would be difficult to find. What is also a point of infinite consequence, M. Gassier never disappoints the public, and thus is of the greater value to his manager. As much in this respect may be said of our countryman Mr. Santley, now without a superior as "barytone cantante" on the Italian boards. The improvement of Mr. Santley, whose first appearance in Italian opera is of such recent date, is astonishing. An accomplished singer he was from the first; but he has so completely mastered the language and habituated himself to the style and traditions of his new employ, besides making extraordinary progress in the histrionic department of his profession, where he was at one time sadly deficient (witness—to cite but two instances—his death scene as Valentine, in Faust, and his entire assumption of the venerable patriot, Nicolo de Lapi), that the highest hopes may reasonably be anticipated of his future career. The parts sustained by Mr. Santley this year have been Count di Luna (Il Trovatore), Nicolo de Lapi, St. Bris (Huguenots), Germont the elder (La Traviata), Valentine (Faust), Scheramin (Oberon), and—by no means least—Count Almaviva (Le Nozze), in which his last execution of the grand air, "Vedrai mentr'io sospiro," was beyond praise.

In the tenor department Mr. Mapleson had literally an embarras de richesses; so much so that no less than three representatives of the popular character of Edgardo, in Lucia di Lammermoor, were brought forward at different periods—Signor Giuglini, Signor Baragli, and Mr. Sims Reeves. The second of these—a new-comer—may be dismissed in a line. His style of singing was so over-wrought that even a good voice and agreeable presence failed to enlist the sympathies of his audience. In plain language, though met with a fair amount of encouragement, Signor Baragli did not please; and his subsequent appearance in the last act of Lucia (after the second performance of Le Nozze di Figaro) passed unnoticed. He was entrusted with no other part. Mr. Sims Reeves was engaged towards the end of the season, expressly to play Sir Huon, in Oberon, for which his musical acquirements, no less than his splendid voice, fitted him. That he should make his first appearance in a part which, during his early career, had won him celebrity in Italy and France, no less than in England, was only natural, and the enthusiastic welcome he obtained as Edgardo was recorded. His value in Oberon can hardly be overrated; and remembering his fine performance of the character of Florestan in Fidelio, with Sophie Cruvelli (1851), it was unanimously regretted that Beethoven's great work should not have been revived for him, more especially as it was announced in the prospectus, and still more especially as all the frequenters of Her Majesty's Theatre were longing to see Mdlle. Titiens in Leonora. Signor Giuglini, the other Edgardo, has again been one of the mainstays of the house. This polished Italian vocalist was never in higher favor, and has never served his director with more indomitable perseverance and good will. Signor Giuglini appeared (with Mdlle. Titiens, Madame Alboni, and Mr. Santley) on the first night of the season, (April 11) as Manrico, in the Trovatore, and has since then successively assumed the following parts:—Arturo (I Puritani), Edgardo (already alluded to), Gennaro (Lucrezia), Lamberto, (Nicolo de Lapi), Renal de Nangis (Huguenots), Alfredo (La Traviata), Riccardo (Il Ballo in Maschera), Don Ottavio (Don Giovanni) and Faust—his performance of which last-named character has raised him higher even than he stood before in the regard of connoisseurs. Besides the rarely inaudible Signor Soldi, who has displayed his never wanting energy in the small tasks allotted to him, two other tenors have appeared—Signor Alessandro Bettini (husband of Madame Trebelli), a light tenor, unpretending, though by no means without ability, as his more than respectable attempts in such characters (among others) as Count Almaviva (Rossini's Count), Tonio (La Fidia del Rappimento), Oberon and Basilio (Mozart's Basilio), sufficed to prove; and Signor Geremia Bettini, a "tenore robusto," who created so marked a sensation in Pollio, on the one occasion when Mdlle. Titiens played Norma, as to raise a strong and very accountable desire to see him in other operas. A seventh tenor would have been Signor Gambetti, but he, though named in the prospectus, did not appear. Mr. Sims Reeves, however, (who had not been announced), was a substitute unlikely to be viewed with disapproval. There remain to be mentioned Signor Delle Sedie, who only appeared in one part—that of Renato (Il Ballo in Maschera), which to him stands in much the same intimate relation as Count di Luna to Signor Graziani, each opera containing an air by the delivery of which each singer has gained a multitude of admirers; Signor Marchesi, who played Leporello, at the first and only performance of Don Giovanni, on the last night but two of the season, and whom it would be unfair to criticize on the strength of a single appearance; Signor Fricca (Herr August Fricke), a tall and powerful-voiced German bass (from Berlin), who represented Marcel in the Huguenots; and Signor Casaboni, also a bass, who has made himself useful in several subordinate parts, winning good opinions as the Commandant in Don Giovanni.

MR. ALFRED MELLON's popular orchestral concerts took their turn, as soon as Opera, Parliament and West-end had adjourned. Mr. M. is a very able and energetic conductor and caterer for the musical appetite, and wields a large and well-appointed orchestra, made up mainly of the same excellent musicians who serve under Costa at the Opera, the Birmingham festivals, &c. He mingles classical with popular and trivial; symphony, overture and concerto with pot-pourris and ballads; indeed once this summer he presented Beethoven's Ninth Symphony and a "comic fantasia" entitled "Three Blind Mice" (first mouse Mr. Pratten, flute; second mouse Mr. Lazarus, clarinet; third mouse Mr. Nicholson, oboe) in the same programme! He has had, too, his "Mozart evening," his "Mendelssohn evening,"

&c., the former with this programme for the first part:

Overture (Idomeneo)	Mozart.
Air, "Deh vieni" ( Figaro )	"
Concerto (D minor) pianoforte.	"
Air, "Gli angeli d'Inferno" ( Flauto Magico )	"
Symphony in G (Jupiter)	"

Mr. Mellon has also trenched upon the province of the Oratorio Societies in several of his concerts, having given the "Creation," Rossini's "Stabat Mater," Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," &c.

Paris.

GRAND OPERA. Mlle. Theresia Tietjens, queen of the lyric stage in England since the retirement of Grisi, made her debut here in the last week in August as Valentine in the Huguenots. M. Paul Smith, the critic in the Gazette Musicale, after summing up her career, and contrasting her willingness to sing to the Parisians with the conduct of the Lind (who, he says, parodied Hamlet, haughtily declaring: "France not delights me, nor the French too,") thus describes the result of the first hearings:

"Yes, Mlle. Tietjens is one of the elite of artists; she has usurped nothing of her brilliant and numerous successes. She is one of the most frank and vigorous organizations for a singer and an actress that we have ever met. Her voice, a little fatigued in the medium, has in the high chords an amplitude and a force which fully satisfy the ear. She sings easily, largely; but perhaps she has the defect of counting more on inspiration than on art, on power than on method, and of lacking that finish which we demand of our artists. As an actress, she has no rival to fear; her gestures are excellent, her poses expressive, and the suppleness of her movements lends itself to the most varied nuances."

The other characters were: Gueymard as Raoul; Faure as Nevers; Obin, Marul; Cazaux, St. Bris; Milles. Hamaker and De Taisy, as the Queen and the Page Urbain.

The new conductor of the Imperial Opera, M. Georges Hainl, makes all go like magic in his orchestra, according to the same critic;—it went at least like clock work under M. Dietrich. The sudden dismissal of the latter caused a fluttering; one of the letter writers gives this explanation:

"It appears that the first performance of Les Vêpres Siciliennes was fixed for the 20th July. At one rehearsal held before the second, Verdi, who was present, fancied he perceived signs of bad feeling towards himself among certain members of the band. He demanded an explanation, in very warm terms, of M. Dietrich. The latter answered, probably, quite as warmly, the upshot being that Verdi seized his hat and left the theatre. The same evening, before the performance, Dietrich received a letter from the Minister of the Interior, to the effect, 'qu'il s'ait admis à faire valoir ses droits à la retraite.' M. - Georges Hainl, of Lyons, was then called on to assume M. Dietrich's duties, and conducted the third representation of Les Vêpres."

ROSSINI has been composing a Grand Mass, for chorus and full band, which he calls Messa di Gloria—his most important work since the Stabat Mater.

ADELINA PATTI, with the praise of all Europe, (always excepting the London Athenæum) is "playing and singing her way through Germany along paths strewn with gold." These are Chorley's words, who adds:

Some of our contemporaries profess themselves to be outraged at the sums this young lady receives. She is engaged to M. Bagier for Paris and Madrid, they tell us, at £120 for each performance. Let us remind them that they have chosen to present her as a first-class singer—the equal of Malibran, Mesdames Grisi and Persiani, having an added charm of her own—that of youth. If they be right in their estimate (to which we have never subscribed) they are wrong in their logic, by which she is proved to be exorbitant. Setting aside the known fact, that first-class singers are becoming rarer and rarer every day, Mdlle. Patti is not paid more than Malibran—not so much as Mdlle. Lind—but a little in excess of La Bastardella, who, in Burney's time, when he was managing the concerts at the Pantheon (this was eighty years ago or thereabouts), received 100 guineas nightly, for two songs! "False gods are made by fanatics," says the poet, but the fanatics do ill to cry out against the worship of the idols which "themselves have made."

Of other arrangements for the Italian Opera, a correspondent of the London Musical World writes:

M. Bagier has declined the services of Signor Bonetti, and engaged in his place, as chef-d'orchestre, Signor Castagneri from Barcelona. Among his other engagements are Mdle. Calderon, who failed some years since at Covent Garden; a Madame Agnesi; a baritone, Ricciardi; the baritone, Delle Sedie; a tenor, Nicolas; the tenor Fraschini. In the current of the winter, moreover, M. Bagier contemplates presenting his subscribers with the tenors, Mario and Bettini Geremia. The first new work with which we are threatened is La Forza del Destino.

At the Theatre Lyrique the rehearsals of the Troyens of M. Hector Berlioz are actively proceeding, both at the theatre and the residence of the composer. It is expected that the first public apparition of this long-awaited novelty will occur in November. By the way, M. Berlioz has gone to Baden-Baden, to superintend the revival of his Beatrice and Benedict.

Germany.

The London Athenæum has the following items and opinions:

Herr Litolf's opera, produced at Baden-Baden,—at the time being a busy centre of operatic creation,—will disappoint those who have expected much from it, being feeble in idea and bombastic in style. This does not surprise us, from our knowledge of his Pianoforte Concertos, and his long drawn and extravagant "Robespierre" overture.—M. Benazet lends an ear to the "music of the future," having just given to please its votaries Herr Wagner's "Tannhäuser." The "Beatrice and Benedict" of M. Berlioz has also been revived. Why not have kept the original title, "Much Ado about Nothing," so admirably does that define the style of the music to which the deformed, transformed version of Shakespeare's comedy-drama is set? The names belong to the English dramatist; but the shrewd French critic has contrived to discharge all the wit, and to destroy parts of the meaning of the original play. The inanity of the dialogue between "Lady Disain" and Signor Montanto—the abolition of Hero's story, making her presence in the drama superfluous—the thrusting among the characters an Italian singing-master, merely that two choruses and some silly talk about music may be dragged in, and the total absence of situation, are strange faults as occurring in the work of one so sarcastic on the platitudes and licenses of brother-librettists as M. Berlioz. In his musical distribution of the work (to speak this time from experience, not hearsay), there are similar awkwardnesses—such as two long-drawn choruses behind the scenes—in the instrumentation, a too frequent recurrence to such devices as the mute on the violin-strings, which, when used too frequently, must weary the most delicate ear. Yet, there are points in the opera such as the stretto in the duet between Beatrice and Benedict,—the two-part nocturno, which is so deliciously scored that on the stage it does not (as in the concert-room) sound too long—and the opening and close of Beatrice's grand scena in the second act, which tell what their writer could have done had he not started perversely, mistaking confusion for depth and ingenuity—had he not become too fixed in the habit of so doing, it may be feared to be now capable of cure. The opera is a work to be heard once with attention by every liberal musician, but which few will be tempted to hear twice. The execution this year is attempted to give a fair idea of the music, but nothing more.—Madame Chardon-Demeur's share in it excepted, which is graceful, expressive and vocally sympathetic (to employ the Italian phrase.) She has gained greatly since she last sang in London. Thus much concerning a work which has naturally excited curiosity. But M. Benazet's management has arrows of every form and date in its quiver.—Madame Viardot, now a resident at Baden-Baden, has given one performance of her Orpheus.

While talking of this district, which in late summer teems with music, we may say that the Mannheim play-bills show a serious constancy to such hackneyed serio-comic works as "Martha" and "La Dame Blanche."

Prof. Hesse, of Breslau, is dead, aged fifty-nine, the second-greatest organ-player in Germany.—Herr Schneider, of Dresden, being still alive. Hesse wrote for, as well as played on, the organ; but his writings, so far as we knew them, are poor, dry: if mechanically valuable as showing off tricks of the hands and feet, in idea not up to the level of even the writings of Rinck.

The opera "Axur, King of Ormus," by Salieri, will be revived in Stuttgart. It will be given at the end of this month, on the occasion of the King's birthday.

BRESLAU.—This city, as well, indeed, as all Germany, has just experienced a great loss in the death of Herr Adolph Friedrich Hesse, who expired on the 5th inst., after a long illness. Herr Hesse was indisputably one of the best performers on the organ, and one of the most eminent composers for that instrument of the present time. He was born on the 30th August, 1809, and was therefore nearly 50 years of age.

WIESBADEN.—A grand musical festival was given in celebration of the Duke's birthday. Among the artists engaged were M. Vieuxtemps, Herren Jaell, Th. Wachtell, Oberthür (the last gentleman from London) and Mad. Dustmann-Mayer, from Vienna. All the places were taken in advance, and more than three hundred persons unable to obtain admission. From sixty to seventy francs were offered for a single ticket. The programme consisted of a Concerto by M. Vieuxtemps; a duet concertante by M. Vieuxtemps and Herr Jaell; and Schumann's concerto in A minor, besides other pieces. A few days afterwards, Herr Wieniawski gave a concert. Among the visitors now stopping here is Mad. Tedesco.

Italy.

ROME.—A grand sensation has been excited by a completely unexpected visit which the Pope has paid Dr. Franz Liszt. The latter, after having been ill for some time, left the city about the middle of last month. He took up his abode in some rooms of the Dominican Monastery, now deserted, attached to the church of the Madonna del Rosario, on the Monte Mario, whence there is a magnificent view of Rome. He lived like a hermit, busying himself solely with his art. Some prelates informed the Pope of the fact, and, on the 18th ult., his Holiness, accompanied only by Monsignor De Merode, a cameriere segreto, and a few guardie nobili, proceeded to the Madonna del Rosario. He first went through his prayers, and then presented himself to the famous anchorite. Dr. Liszt played two sacred compositions, one on the harmonium and the other on the piano. When he had concluded, the Pope thanked him in the most gracious manner, and added: "It is a great thing to possess, as you do, the gift of being able to give utterance to the strains of higher spheres than our own; but the most beautiful harmonies are only to be heard above." The Pope examined, with great interest, various objects in the room; conversed for some time with the artist, whom he then left, after bestowing on him his apostolic benediction.—*London Mus. ### The New Organ and its Uses.

We gave, a short time since, a few hints of the magnitude and excellence of the Great Organ which is being set up in the Boston Music Hall, with a brief sketch of its contents, i.e. the number and distribution of its stops or registers. Our neighbor, the Musical Times, gives the following description of the majestic house, in which all these thousands of tuneful voices—from the colossal thirty-two feet basses to the tiniest pipé (peep it might be called) in the top of a choir of "Mixtures", only three-eighths of an inch long—reside:

At present the chief interest to the visitor is in the case. But let us observe at the outset that the word "case" seems singularly inappropriate and belittling; the word suggests a piece of furniture, a side-board or the like, more or less ornamented; while the thing is an edifice in itself, an edifice of grand proportions, massive in its solidity, yet as graceful in its outlines and as rich in all its details as a poet's dream. Huge caryatides support the structure,—figures full of strength, and carved with wonderful skill; above rise the enormous pipes, marshalled in glittering rows, or grouped into monstrous columns; statues crown the pinnacles,—singing, or playing upon instruments, or listening; angels exquisitely carved in alto rilievo surround the central towers; and below, over the arch above the key boards, is the head of Sebastian Bach, the great master of the instrument. Everything is sumptuous: no bare spots, no plain surfaces; symbolical lyres, lutes, harps, wreaths, and flowers cover every panel; sweet faces of angels, and stony-eyed fates, look down from arches and pilasters. Yet there is no confusion, nothing is overlaid. The whole vast front has such a symmetry, a unity, and splendor of design, that it would seem to have been created by magic, to have risen in its beauty at the sound of the wonderful harmonies within.

The writer well says: "It is difficult, while sitting before this magnificent work, to imagine ourselves in puritan Boston"; and then mentions a current report, which we believe to be in the main correct, that "each of the chief organists of the city will have an opportunity to exhibit his powers." "Bach will have his interpreters, and so will Handel; while the modern school will also be represented." But let no one imagine that all these masters and all their interpreters hereabouts can be represented on a single occasion such as the inaugural festival, or "opening" of the Organ. That would require weeks, instead of a single evening; and to the listener it would be as bad as sitting through all the examination exercises of the pupils in the French Conservatoire. Of course the writer does not mean this; we only speak of it because it is so natural that the friends of various organists, here and all over the country, should plead for and expect a hearing of their own favorite on that occasion; and the wish does not proceed from any vanity, perhaps, but from a real interest and pride in the occasion. The "opening" must be in some sense a consecration of the noble instrument. The programme must have unity and reasonable brevity. Perhaps some spoken word, some Ode recited, will consume a portion of the time. The music—which we understand is to be drawn wholly from the Organ itself—must, for that short time, be representative, significant, removed from triality and not jumbled together in unmeaning miscellany. Sebastian Bach, the genius of the organ par excellence, the master of masters, to whom the Beethovens, the Mozarts, the Mendelssohns looked up, already gives the keynote in the very aspect of the organ, his grand, cheerful, earnest, honest face looking out there from the centre of "his huge house of sounds" If any composer have the lion's part in such a programme, it should be he; and we are fortunate, even should no distinguished organist from Europe grace our ceremony—in having among us one whose life-study and inspiration thus far (for he is very young) has been Bach. Handel's great hearty voice, too, must be heard, for he already has the hearts of all the people. Here are two:—and where else to look for any match for this great company? Probably Mendelssohn's organ works are next in importance, being at the same time much more modern, and contrasting by their individuality of style, their Mendelssohnian flavor. One of our organists, at least, is steeped in Mendelssohn, and can discourse him con amore. Many, too, will want, and fortunately they can have, some of the plain, solid church of England style; weary of fugues they may propose, like Robert Browning:

Bid One, Two, Three, Four, Five, clear the arena!
Say the word, straight I unstop the Full-Organ, Blare out the mode Palestina.

And then, as feasting fitly follows solemn ceremony, the Organ, candidate elect and passed and duly consecrated, may be called upon for a post-prandial speech as it were; a rambling, entertaining tissue of thoughts prompted at the moment out of its own boundless, curious resources; things pathetic, brilliant, strange,—just enough to give a touch of its qualities as an organ, a few specimens of its inexhaustible effects and combinations. Nor need we go far for the talent that can serve this maiden speech, as an interpreter, and that without dangerously compromising the dignity of Art.

This, or something like this—of course not unconditionally—is the kind of “opening” which seems to be gradually and necessarily shaping itself. It would seem to reconcile, as far as one evening can do it, the various demands of the occasion, of the traditional character of the Organ, of high Art, of artists and of the audience. After the opening, there will be plenty of occasions for all sorts of proper uses—no unworthy ones, let us hope—of an Organ, whose resources even the most skilful organists can not in years exhaust, and which it will cost even the best of them months of trial fully to discover and learn to bring them out.

The question, asked by everybody: Who is to open the great organ? is thus disposed of; and the other question: Who will be the organist? does not require immediate or speedy solution. There is time enough for it; the instrument need not wait the coming man in silence. Organ concerts, vocal concerts, oratorios, &c., in which the organ plays an important part, are almost sure to become of frequent occurrence. Every opportunity for hearing the organ, for hearing organ music of all worthy schools, for giving each true organist his chance, for gratifying, edifying, educating the public ear and feeling, will naturally be afforded, while by the same means this large investment of artistic enthusiasm and faith will be reaping its returns and justifying itself economically against all penny-wise predictions.

Not to speak of the greater and special occasions, the oratorios and festivals, which will be sure to organize themselves around this grandly inviting nucleus, there will doubtless be a continual year-round series of ordinary organ performances, which will often be the richest opportunities of all. At a fixed day or hour, once, or even twice, in every week, throughout the year, let it be known to all concerned that the Great Organ will be played by some one of the most accomplished organists, for a small entrance fee, and strangers who visit Boston will count it into their programme even more than travellers do the famous Freyburg organ, which is by no means so great as ours;—nay, musical people will make pilgrimages to the great Boston organ, only let it be known that at certain times, so frequent as to chime with every one's convenience, they may be sure to hear it—and, we may add, to see it, for to the eye, too, it is a great work of art. Here will be room for all the organists, the decent ones, and all the schools—for sheer nonsense is of no school. Thus the Bach-ist may give whole afternoons of Bach, as often as he may find “fit audience, though few”; and it will surely be a constant and a growing audience, the real inner church of faithful, true believers. Handel will have his hours and his interpreters; and Mendelssohn and all the masters will have theirs. Nor will the modern or “free” school, as contrasted with the “classical,” lack chances to disport its fancies, and dispute Bach's laurels if it dare. And our young artists, too, may try their own inventive talent, as the spirit moves them, feeling their way to mastery by (temperately) airing their attempts at composition; perhaps the great organ is the magnet that, drawing to itself, shall draw out for us a latent genius, who shall himself be “classical.”

Our neighbor, from whom we have quoted, opens another topic of great importance in connection with the organ and the Music Hall, and their use for choral performances, which we propose to take up hereafter.

MISS ADELADE PHILLIPPS. This excellent artist and estimable lady, after a series of operatic successes in various parts of Europe, in Belgium, in Holland, at Barcelona, at Prague, at Paris, has been in Boston for a few weeks on a short visit to her friends, before returning to resume her engagements. She is in admirable health and spirits, and judging from a few songs with which she favored us one evening, has still continued to refine and perfect that rich voice of hers, and is more than ever an artist in the expressive use of it. She is undoubtedly one of the finest contraltos of the day. Whether she is to spend the winter in Paris or elsewhere, is not yet determined.

DEMPSTER, the popular ballad singer, has turned up again, fresh and ruddy from the mountain dews of Scotland, whence no doubt he brings new songs.

MR. JULIUS EICHBERG, whose sound musicianship, artistic talent, industry, affable address and savoir-faire there is no need of vouching for, continues to receive pupils in Singing, Piano, Composition, and Violin. Rarely will one find a better master. See Card.

Mlle. DE LA MOTTE resumes her Classes for instruction in Piano playing. Her system of teaching in classes has stood the test of quite a long experience in Boston; and her numerous pupils, as well as their interesting concerts which have crowned each year's work, have borne witness to her high aim, fidelity, good taste and judgment in training pupils, singly or in classes.

A GOOD SIGN.—A few days since we were waited on by a Committee from a Musical Society in Chicago, who wished to know where they might procure the vocal “parts” of Schumann's “Paradise and the Peri.” We are glad to see societies waking up to such things. They will find it difficult; but it will reward study, and the charm will outlive the pains of mastering it.

ANOTHER. A club of amateur singers are about organizing themselves, at the South End of our city, for the practice of such Cantatas and choral works as Mendelssohn's “Hear my Prayer,” “As the heart pants,” &c. MR. HERMANN DAUM, the pianist, is to be their leader.

STILL BETTER. We believe there is to be a “Bach Club” in Boston this winter, for the study of some of those difficult but inexhaustibly interesting Cantatas of Bach's, which Robert Franz has recently been editing.

☞ The conclusion of our examination of “Mr. Hayter's Church Music” must lie over till another number.

THREE OPERAS IN THE FIELD. The last despatches from the three commanders, Anschütz, Maretzek and Grau, will be found on the next page.—How soon each of them will undertake the siege of Boston, it does not clearly appear. But there are intimations that Max will plant his batteries before us—some of them “Parrots” such as we have not yet heard speak—somewhere about Christmas time, while the Germans will be entrenched in the New York Academy. They, the Germans, are to move on Philadelphia first, early in November, where they are sure to be received with open arms, although Italian sympathies are strong among the Quakers; then, if they hold New York throughout December, January and February, it will be in the limbo between winter and summer before they favor us. Until which time we seem to be principally exposed to Grau.

MENDELSSOHN'S LETTERS. Although the second volume has been for some time announced in Germany, and reviewed by Ferdinand Hiller (his interesting notice will be found on a preceding page), we cannot learn that it has yet been received in this country.—We trust Mr. Leypoldt of Philadelphia will see to it and give it to us in English in the same attractive shape that he did the “Reisebriefe.” Julius Rietz, the Dresden conductor (formerly of Leipzig), has added to the book a complete chronological list of all the compositions by Mendelssohn, manuscript as well as published.

One of our Boston prima-donnas, who has studied for some years in Florence, seems to have gone over to Italy in the fullest sense of the word; we read in the papers:

At Pargana, Italy, May 25. Prof. Macistao Luigi Vannuccini, Director of the Orchestra of the Grand Opera, Florence, to Lizzie D. Chapman, of Boston.

The Maestro was her teacher; the Yankee girl has learned her lesson well.

SINGING BEFORE KINGS. It appears that our “little Patti” had a voice in harmonizing the ensnared elements of the German Confederation at the late Frankfort Congress. A London paper says:

Mademoiselle Adelina Patti was summoned from Ostend to Frankfort to sing at the gala performance which took place at the Stadt-Theatre in honor of the Emperor of Austria and the assembled Princes of Germany. The Senate, at whose expense the performance was given, admitted no person not invited by themselves into the house, which presented a fairy-like appearance. Il Barbiere di Siviglia was the opera selected for this solemnity. Adelina Patti was admirable, and though, according to etiquette, all marks of approbation were forbidden, the whole audience did nothing but applaud her most enthusiastically. It was the Emperor of Austria himself who first gave the signal for the “bravos,” and it was at the request of his Imperial Majesty that Strakosch's waltz, “La Gioja insolita,” introduced by Madlle. Patti into the singing lesson, was repeated. However exorbitant the prices offered for tickets, the general public was rigorously excluded. It is related that an Englishman, finding his offer of one hundred pounds sterling for a stall refused, bribed a member of the chorus into allowing him to take his (the chorus-singer's) place on the stage. It was only through Madlle. Patti's kind interference that the faithless chorus-singer was not dismissed. The fair and celebrated young artist received 10,000 francs for her performance. At the general request, she was to sing the next evening before the ordinary public.

DEARTH OF MUSIC IN BOSTON.—Another month has passed without any musical entertainment. The state of things is almost unparalleled. We do not remember two consecutive months for many years, if ever, during which no music was offered in Boston. Why does not the indefatigable Gilmore see that two or three concerts by his active band, with perhaps Lorini and Morensi for auxiliary attractions, would put money in his purse? The project is worth a trial. At any rate, let us have some promenade concerts, if nothing more.—Mus. Times.

MADAME LORINI, Mlle. Morensi, and others of Grau's troupe, have been concerting in Portsmouth, Bangor, Augusta and other Eastern cities.

MAX MARETEK again takes the field in an operatic campaign. The following, according to the Tribune, is the programme:

M. Maretek having recovered from a protracted and distressing illness, is happily again at work making preparations for the season at the Academy of Music, which will commence on the 5th of October. The Manager has issued a circular which announces that the following artists are engaged, whose reputations are familiar to the musical public:

Prime Donne Soprani; Madame Giuseppina Medori, Mdle. Clara Louise Kellogg (who, having entirely recovered from the illness which prevented her from fulfilling her contract with the Director of Her Majesty's Theatre, London, last Summer, has entered upon a farewell engagement with the Management of the Academy of Music, prior to her departure for Europe), Madame Antonietta Brignoli-Ortolani, and Mdle. Lisa (her first appearance). Prima Donna Contralto: Mdle. Henrietta Sulzer. Comprimaria: Mdle. Stockton. Primi Tenori: Signor Francesco Mazzoleni, Signor Giovanni Sbriglia, and Signor W. Lotti. Comprimario: Signor T. Rubio.—Primi Baritone: Signor Ferdinando Bellini, Signor G. Yppolito. Primi Bassi: Signor Annibale Biacchi, Signor Domenico Coletti. Comprimario: Signor W. Müller. Conductors: Max Maretek and Jaime Nuno. Leader: Mr. Ernest Grill. Chorus Master: Mr. Hartman. Stage Manager: Mr. Amati Dubreuil. Prompter, Signor L. Biondi; Maître de Ballet, Signor D. Ronnani.

THE REPERTOIRE OF THE SEASON WILL BE: Ione, Petrella; I Duo Foscari, Verdi; Lucrezia Borgia, Donizetti; Rigoletto, Verdi; Robert le Diable, Meyerbeer; Huguenots, Meyerbeer; La Figlia del Regimento, Donizetti; Il Poluto, Donizetti; Maria di Rohan, Donizetti; La Sonnambula, Bellini; Don Giovanni, Mozart; Norma, Bellini; I Puritani, Bellini; Il Trovatore, Verdi; Martha, Flotow; La Favorita, Donizetti; La Zingara, Balfe; Ernani, Verdi; Un Ballo in Maschera, Verdi; Lucia di Lammermoor, Donizetti; Roberto Devereux; Macbeth; Peri's Judith and Gounod's Faust.

In addition to this, an entirely new (4-act romantic and tragic) opera, written for the Academy, the particulars of which will be given in future.

Regular opera nights, Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays. Extra performance every Saturday.

Prices of admission: General admission, $1; secured seats, extra, 50 cents; family circle, 50 cents; amphitheatre, 25 cents; private boxes, from $6 to $20.

The promise is that the season will be brilliant and remunerative.

Mr. Gottschalk, the pianist, has been engaged for 100 nights previous to his departure for Europe, by Mr. Maretek, for the sum of $12,000.

Mr. Gottschalk has had very brilliant offers from California, but has concluded to remain here. His concerts in New York will commence on the 28th of September, at Irving Hall. He is preparing at present some brilliant programmes, mostly new pieces.

GERMAN OPERA.—Doubt is expressed whether, after all, Theodor Formes, the Berlin tenor, will come over to join the Anschütz Company. No wonder if, as we have seen it hinted, German artists dread New York, after the late riots, even more than they dread the ocean. The Musical Review gives us some further hints of Anschütz's plans:

Several artists of great note have been engaged by him, and will arrive from Europe some time during the present month. Among these may be mentioned Dall' Aste, one of the greatest basses of Europe; Titascheck, a celebrated tenor, and a great baritone, one of the brothers of Carl Formes. Who will compose the rest of the company is yet a secret, which will not be divulged for a week or two. But we have the assurance that they will compare favorably in their artistic merits with those whom we have already mentioned.

The following are the names of a few of the great operatic compositions which will be produced by Mr. Anschütz's company: Gounod's "Faust," "Eury-anthe," by Weber; "Hans Heiling," and "Templar and Jewess," by Marschner; Spohr's opera of "Jes-sonda"; "Der Wassertrager," by Cherubini; and Flotow's "Indra."

Great efforts will also be made for the reproduction, on a grand scale, of several of the works of Mozart, Beethoven, Meyerbeer, and other great musical composers.

Mr. Anschütz has engaged the Academy of Music for the months of December, January and February, so that the people of New York will not be able to enjoy any German opera until quite late in the season.

In the meantime, commencing in the middle of October, the company will perform in the principal cities of the Union. The first performance will take place in Baltimore.

MR. GRAU, (says the Transcript) is still abroad, engaging artists for his company. With such favorites as Mme. Lorini, Mlle. Moreni, Signori Brignoli, Amodio and Susini, and the addition of some foreign artists to heighten the attraction of his troupe,—Carl Formes for instance, whom he is said to have already secured,—we presume he will not let the operatic field go uncontested. The occupation, however, of the New York Academy by Maretek and Anschütz successively till Spring, will preclude any presentation of opera by him in that city except at some one of the theatres, if any can be procured,—an experiment that has rarely been successful, from the difficulty in diverting the world of music and fashion from its established resort. So it is not unlikely, we understand, that Mr. Grau may commence operations in this city; at any rate an occasional raid from his troupe may be anticipated.

WORCESTER, MASS.—The Palladium still tells us of good music stirring the "heart of the Commonwealth"; said heart being more blessed just now with such stirrings, than this "brain," or "hub," which has been doing nothing the whole summer long, except getting ready its big organ.

Two different impromptu musical entertainments during the opening days of September, have struck a chord that announces the departure of dog-days and the coming of the exhilarating autumn months with their new life; their new work after summer play; their revival of music, which slumbers through August, unless awakened by the sound of clanging brass and tinkling cymbal. The first, in a pleasant home where music is cultivated for its refining and ennobling influence; where Mozart and Haydn and Beethoven are familiar household deities, and where the mother's love is not less devoted, nor her care less watchful, because she "keeps up her music"—learned in the longer days of girlhood. Several professional musicians were present, and they played and sang choice bits from the "masters," old and new. Among them were Beethoven's Baguettes—anything but trifles musically, and interesting as beautiful. It is well to give and to receive the pleasure that such occasions afford.

The other was an organ concert at Dr. Hill's Church, late in one of the short afternoons of these lessening days, at just the hour when the church is filled with that "dim, religious light" which comes between the bright afternoon sunshine and the glare of evening gaslight. A hundred or less had received hint of what was coming, and went with new enthusiasm, kindled by all the talk there is now afloat about organs and organ music, and whether we have performers equal to the great organ that next September will doubtless see in our Mechanics' Hall—a mooted question that more than one of our organists will answer to the satisfaction of the public. On Friday afternoon Mr. W. E. Thayer certainly proved himself equal to the work; and more than once the question arose whether Worcester might not be represented at the opening of the Boston Music Hall organ in October. But to the programme. It was this:

Cansanetta and Turkish March
Melodious Fugue in G minor.
Andante from 3d Sonata.
Overture to Le Serment.
First Chorus in Te Deum.
Andante from 6th Sonata.
Toccata in D minor.
Pastoral; and Triumphant March.

W. E. Thayer
Bach
Mendelssohn
Auber
W. E. Thayer
Mendelssohn
Bach
W. E. Thayer

The selections from Bach showed very faithful study of these master-pieces, and were rendered not only with technical correctness, but, in an artistic spirit, without which they must lose much of their majesty and grandeur. The Fugue and the Toccata, so curiously quaint, and yet so fresh and inspiring, were well relieved by the two slow movements from Mendelssohn's sonatas, the one from the 3d being especially fine. The overture was brilliantly played, particularly the closing portion, and gave Mr. Thayer's hearers an idea of what they may hear in the way of concert-music when our grand organ is completed. Of his own compositions, of which he played four, we would be glad to speak more at length. They were highly creditable to him, and the public would be glad to hear still further from his pen. With the interest there is now in organs and organ-music, we ought to hear more frequently works such as these which a favored few enjoyed on Friday afternoon.

WEBER'S MUSICAL COMPOSITION.—2 vols. $4.00

The very best way to become a good harmonist, is to study under a competent teacher. But very few persons, however, have time to become practical, thorough masters of composition.

While this is the case, very many wish to acquire a good general knowledge of harmony; sufficient, for instance, to enable one to understand and appreciate the harmonic combinations of the great masters. Such a knowledge greatly increases one's power of enjoyment of good music. Now Weber's theory is an interesting book. You can read with relish a chapter of it every day, and by a little thought fix the ideas of the chapter pretty plainly in the memory. And so in the course of a few weeks, one may read, understand, digest, and even remember the whole subject.

ADALBERT GYROWETZ.

CHAPTER IX.

His last year in London.—"Semiramis" in flames.—Out of health, and journey home.—How he gets into Brussels.—Entrance of Dumouriez's army.—Much talk with Captain Bonaparte.—Returns to Paris.—The National Convention.—Mars.

For a new Italian opera house, called the Odeon, Gyrowetz received an order to compose "Semiramis." Borghi was vice-director, M<sup>re</sup>. Mara—the possessor no doubt of the most wonderful voice which has been heard in a theatre for more than a century—was the prima donna, and Pacchierotti was first tenor. It was no small honor to him to be employed to write for such singers. In concert with the performers, with whom he communicated freely, and whom he labored to please, the opera was written, studied, and finally the last grand rehearsal took place. Next day the new opera was to be performed, and score, parts, instruments—every thing was left in the house. The rehearsal had hardly been over an hour, when an alarm of fire was sounded. The new theatre was in a few minutes in flames, and with all its contents was reduced to ashes. The fire was supposed to be the work of an incendiary acting in the interest of the other Italian opera. [Was this the fire to which Haydn refers in his diary? He however calls the theatre the "Pantheon," and gives the date January 14th, 1792. I think not, but have no means of deciding.] This was a severe blow to the composer, inasmuch as he lost all the advantages which would have accrued, in case the opera had proved a success, as he had reason to believe from its reception by the performers and by those present at the rehearsals. Pecuniarily, save the loss of his manuscript, he was not a sufferer, for Lord Belford, the real owner of the theatre, paid him his £300. Belford, to his credit, paid the instrumental performers the cost of their instruments, and suffered none connected with the theatre to be losers.

Among the notes of his third year in London, one relates to his failing health aggravated by the loss of his opera; another, to a second invitation to the Lord Mayor's dinner, where he again talked with Fox upon music and other topics; a third is upon his concert in the Hanover Square rooms, given by the advice of friends, for which he composed several new pieces, and by which he made a handsome sum; and finally upon the state of his health again, which forced him, by advice of the physicians, to seek his native climate, from which he had now been absent seven years.

The story of his journey is interesting enough to be worthy of a full translation—which is as follows:—

The journey was via Dover, where he spent a few days to rest, and conquer the pain which parting from London caused him,—a city in which he had received such honors, and where he had left so many good and noble friends. There were at this time in Dover several French emigrants, who also had the intention of crossing over to the Continent, and who, learning Gyrowetz's plan, proposed to make the passage with him at common cost. He accepted and a skipper was found, with whom the price for the passage was agreed upon. The captain said his vessel was outside the harbor, and came with a boat to take them and their effects out to her. On leaving the harbor, the captain hallooed to a vessel lying outside, to run down and take his passengers. No notice was taken of his call; after a time he hailed her again with the like result. The passengers, however, noticed that he himself kept on his course directly for the French coast, and the very natural suspicion arose, that his hailing was but a ruse, that he was a traitor, and intended to deliver them into the hands of the French revolutionary authorities. The passengers drew their pistols and ordered the captain to return immediately to Dover, which, with all due cursing and swearing, he finally did. It was midnight when they landed; all the inns were closed, and they were forced to spend the night in the open air. Next day another vessel was hired, and at nine o'clock A. M. they sailed again. The weather was fine; the surface of the sea was covered with herring, swimming and playing about, shining and sparkling in the sun. At midnight they reached Ostende, where a coach and four post horses were hired to take them on to Brussels. The offer was again made to Gyrowetz to join the party, which he accepted, and, via Bruges and Ghent, they reached the city gates of Brussels the next midnight. The gate was closed and entrance into the city was denied them. One of the passengers then wrote a few words with a pencil upon a bit of paper, and handed it to the sentinel with a request to take it to the commander of the garrison and await an answer. In a few minutes the man returned—the gate was at once opened—and Gyrowetz overwhelmed with curiosity to know who his fellow travellers were. But he could learn nothing. So they drove into the city and sought an inn in which they might tarry; they drove from street to street; nobody would open his doors. They offered a ducat per person, for the mere privilege of coming under a roof, for it was now November, the night was cold and windy, and snow was beginning to fall. But all was in vain. Under these circumstances, the policeman who had accompanied them, said he would enquire at the office, if they might not possibly get a room for the night there? The application was made, and a small room, probably a lock-up, full of dirt and dust, was opened, where they turned in, it saving them at all events from spending the night in the open air. For these miserable quarters they had to pay a thaler apiece, as drink money. When morning came they all left their wretched hole, and sought decent lodgings. Gyrowetz found a handsome room in the hotel d'Etoile, and engaged it. After getting his baggage thither, he dressed himself properly and went out about noon into the park, where the fashionable world of Brussels usually assembled. While rambling about, he came across a crowd, which was staring at a group of fine-looking officers with epaulettes, accompanied by people of rank, all on horseback, who treated the officers with the most marked distinction. Gyrowetz drew near, looked at the strangers, and how great was his astonishment to see in them his travelling companions!

"And who are those officers?" he inquired.

"The Duke of Berry and two members of his family!" was the reply. "who have emigrated in consequence of the revolution." He understood now why at midnight the gates of Brussels were so instantly opened to them. It was, however, the last time he ever saw his fellow travellers.

Gyrowetz's desire was to set out immediately for home, but all the post horses were taken by French emigrés, at enormous prices, and he was compelled to remain in Brussels and await events.

The grand French army under Dumouriez, was already on the confines of the Low Countries, not far from Mons, where the Austrian army of 25,000 men stood, where they had thrown up strong defences and bulwarks, and where a few days later a severe battle was fought. In this conflict the French, through their immense superiority in numbers, 300,000 men (?), and after monstrous loss of life—they actually piled up their dead, and used their dead bodies to enable them to scale the Austrian defences—forced the Austrians to retire. The thunder of the cannon could distinctly be heard in Brussels, and the people there could perceive it drawing nearer and nearer the city, until next day the enemy was hard by; the Austrians continually retreating, but obstinately fighting—a sight plainly to be seen from the city walls, where thousands of spectators were posted. Gyrowetz had the temerity to go out of the city with the "Jaeger" (Austrian riflemen), who had been commanded to impede the French flying artillery by their fire. He was advised, the moment he saw a French artilleryman applying his match, to throw himself prostrate, that the ball might pass harmlessly over him; this he did, but soon was ordered to go back to the city with all haste—which he also did, and there from the walls watched the progress of the battle.

The rear guard of the Austrians was composed of a regiment of Hussars in green uniforms, who were drawn up in a triangle near the gate of the city, and the spectators saw many a one, hit by a ball, fall from his horse; and how many a red hot shot was thrown upon the roofs in the town, until at length an armistice was proclaimed, and in the evening the city capitulated—the articles being agreed upon in the very gates. By this capitulation the Austrians were to be allowed to leave the city unhindered on the following morning, and the French march in and take possession.

Next morning, as the Austrian army marched out, notwithstanding strict orders to the contrary, the soldiers plundered the magazines and sold the stores for a song to the citizens. This Gyrowetz had to look upon and hold his peace. And so he saw the army of his Emperor retreating to Clairfait, and the entire army of Dumouriez advancing. Now came the quartering of the forces, and he had to receive several French officers into his own room; but they were all men of culture and good manners, and behaved towards him with kindness and consideration. In this hotel was a table d'hôte, to which many officers came, one of whom, learning that Gyrowetz was a German, took a place near, and during the dinner had much conversation with him. After dinner, the officers gathered into a group, and conversed apparently upon military topics. Gyrowetz's new acquaintance stood in the midst and the others heard him with marked attention, though several were evidently of higher rank than he. The composer learned afterwards that of those officers some were colonels and others of still higher grades, among them Kleber, St. Cyr, Sieyes, &c., and that his friend was a captain, named—Bonaparte. Next day the same party was again at dinner. Bonaparte conversed much with Gyrowetz, and seemed to him to hint at his entering the French military service, a suggestion which he looked upon as a mere joke, and thought no more of it. The next day, the same thing again and with the like result. In the course of this day, a well-dressed young woman entered Gyrowetz's room, where he was alone, and told him she was in the greatest difficulty, that she was expecting daily the arrival of her uncle, a General, who would furnish her with money; but at this moment she was in the utmost need of three Louis d'ors, which she would repay—if he would lend them—immediately upon the arrival of the General. As he was in funds, he gave her the sum requested, never expecting to hear from it again, although the young woman seemed to be no common person. Enough—she received the money, departed with grateful looks, and Gyrowetz thought no more of it.

Again, the next day at table, the same topic was broached, and this time Gyrowetz was plainly asked if he would not enter the French service as an officer. He excused himself on the ground that he was but an artist, and had never paid any attention to arms. Bonaparte answered quickly. "O you will soon learn that; think over the matter, and after dinner come with me, and we will see how the soldiers are amusing themselves in the public houses ["Salen"—dance houses?] and to-morrow talk about it."

They visited various halls—but what sights! what disgusts, as they saw the soldiers publicly guilty of the most scandalous and unheard of conduct, at which Bonaparte was enraged to the highest pitch, and said to Gyrowetz: "See these wretched, abominable men, these monsters! Ah, this must soon be different—this state of things cannot and shall not last." From which Gyrowetz might infer that Bonaparte was by no means a bad, but a good, moral man, whose aim was the improvement of mankind! And so they separated for the time.

The evening Gyrowetz spent in the theatre, where French operettas were pretty well given. The orchestra was also good. In the churches, too, the music was good—not better even in Paris—and here also the boys' clear, true voices were especially noteworthy.

Once more at dinner, and this time seriously and urgently, the effort was made to induce Gyrowetz to enter the French army. After giving the usual excuses in vain, he finally told them, that all their persuasions would be without result, for he would never serve against his native land, nor take up arms against it. This closed the topic, and Bonaparte never mentioned it again.

In the afternoon, the young woman, quite unexpectedly to Gyrowetz, came and returned the three Louis d'ors, with hearty thanks. Taking all the circumstances into account, he came to the conclusion, that this was merely a means adopted to try his character, and perhaps, we may add, to learn his pecuniary condition.

It was natural that the composer should now have a strong desire to know more about this Captain Bonaparte, and what he really was—more especially, because daily after dinner he was surrounded by a group of officers higher in rank than himself, to whom his demeanor was that of a superior, and who listened to him always with marked attention. He therefore applied to Col. Kleber (who was afterwards commander-in-chief in Egypt, and there assassinated) and requested an explanation. Kleber's answer was: "You will very soon hear very great things of this young man!"

Soon after this, Bonaparte was recalled to Paris, thence sent to command at Toulon, where he began the career which ended in the Empire.

At length Dumouriez's army moved on in pursuit of the Austrians, and Gyrowetz was forced still to remain in Brussels, where he saw the entire French army on its march. Its bands were then very bad, but improved afterwards, under the influence of the German music corps. All the roads leading to Germany being now closed by hostile armies, Gyrowetz concluded to return to Paris rather than remain in Brussels.

In Paris he was received by Imbeault with all kindness, and received at once an order for several new symphonies. He lodged in the hotel Bauvois, in the Rue St. Antoine, near the place Victoire, where several members of the National Convention had quarters, and as they dined at a table d'hôte, he became well acquainted with them. From them he often received tickets to the Hall of the Deputies, and was impressed particularly with the tumult and confusion which reigned there; one deputy would pull another down into his seat by his coat tail that he might get the floor, and yet, when he succeeded, it was rare that he could find a listener, the voice being drowned by the uproar. Only when Marat, then considered the finest speaker, arose, was there universal stillness. He was a small, insignificant looking man, spoke very slowly and distinctly, but with a very loud voice. Business was often interrupted by reports from the army, or by the presentation of trophies—colors, guns and other things—which were received with tumultuous shouts. Good news from the army was immediately proclaimed by beat of drum, and the enthusiasm of the young men so aroused as to bring them in troops to the enlisting stations, to such a degree, that sometimes the directors of the theatres were without actors, and their houses had to be closed—all were gone off into the army.

CHAPTER X.

Music and Theatres in Paris in the first years of the Revolution.—Gluck and Cherubini to empty houses.—The Many-headed Tyrant and its Artists.

Gyrowetz's reminiscences of his two visits to Paris became much confused in the old gentleman's mind. Why not, after so many years!—hence those in relation to the theatres and music, so far as they can be of interest now, are here brought together. They are of interest as aiding us to form a picture of those strange times in Paris, 1789-92, when the Revolutionary day of storms was just gloomily breaking.

The Grand Opera he found with a good company but small audiences, owing to the fact, no doubt, that those of higher classes, still in Paris, who had supported it, were not in a state of mind to attend to operas. Gluck's "Iphigenie in Aulis" was given one evening to an empty house. In those days Gluck's operas were given once annually, in honor of the great master's memory.

There were at that time thirty-three theatres, great and small, open daily in Paris; and in all of them, after the performance, the Marseillaise and other national songs in the spirit of the time were struck up by the orchestras, and sung with such enthusiasm and exaltation by the audiences, or rather roared out with such rage and animosity, that no description can convey an idea of it.

Singers and members of the orchestra enlisted, so that performances were often prevented, and other performers had to be sought at any price. One evening the opera "Le marechal ferrant" was given at the Palais Royal, in which one of these substituted tenors had the leading part. He displeased the audience, which began to be noisy, but consented, at the appeal of the director, to hear the second air, which pleased still less. The audience began now to rage and roar—the curtain was dropped, the director was called out and asked, where the other tenor was? He apologized, stating that he was at that moment doing sentinel's duty as a soldier of the National Guard. The audience shouted in reply: "Send for him at once, and go on with the opera." This was done, the singer was sent for, and the opera began again from the beginning.

Gyrowetz was also present in one of the theatres, when the celebrated dancer, Vestris, excused himself from performing in the ballet "Psyche" on plea of illness. He was so stormily demanded by the audience as to be forced to come forward, ask pardon, and perform his part. Such occurrences were not uncommon. The artists had to treat their audiences with the greatest respect and delicacy; but on the other hand, the public delighted to be kind and attentive to the real artist, who was sure to be treated with due respect and distinction.

Imbeault took Gyrowetz one evening to the Theatre Feydeau, to hear the second performance of a new opera, "Lodoiska," by Cherubini, [given the first time July 18, 1791]. He was astonished to find the house empty on occasion of a work by so distinguished a master,—beautiful as it was, the opera did not please. But Paris was at that time not in the mood for the higher music; the people of wealth and rank had fled, and the lower classes cared for little else than revolutionary songs. Gyrowetz, by advice of his friends, upon reaching Paris the first time, burned the letters of introduction which had been given him in Rome, Naples, Milan and Genoa, to the first Parisian families, for fear of being compromised.

He found thieves also in Paris; for one evening in the Theatre Italien, he was robbed of his pocket book containing 600 francs in assignats, which was not so bad as the loss of various souvenirs of his London friends, which were in it. His letters of credit he had luckily left in the care of Imbeault.

Adolph Friedrich Hesse.

On the 5th of August died one of the leading musicians of the age, namely Adolph Friedrich Hesse. He was born on the 30th of August, 1809. The loss suffered by the noble art of music—a loss so severe at the present moment—will be more felt than it is now in Breslau, when people find what a vacancy has been left by his decease. During the last twenty or thirty years, Breslau has achieved a certain reputation as a music-loving city. It was always fond of art; for a time, the drama flourished here; painting too, was fairly represented, but no muse can boast of ever having been honored in the same degree as that of music, both inspired and uninspired, is honored at present by the general public as well as by more exclusive circles. There is no doubt that the special attention devoted to it by the initiated is owing to the exertions of certain gifted individuals, who imparted a great and varied impulse to it. Hesse represented artistic merit of the first rank. Something of his fame was reflected upon Breslau, and every inhabitant had reason to be proud of calling him a fellow townsman. Great as was the effort which it cost him to do so, he came forward as a public man, commanding, at various important performances, and at the admirable concerts of the orchestra of the theatre, the musicians by his unfailing and particularly quick ear, and ruling, by his strong energy, the audience. In this respect his loss will long be irreparable for us; for it will be some time before any one else will direct, with such decision, the taste of his auditory, and ensure their respect in virtue of the power proceeding from an artistic reputation. When Hesse appeared at the conductor's desk, he appeared as a master who was not only supreme in the realms of tune, but, by a glance, reduced the heaving mass beneath him to dumb attention. It was evident that his whole heart and soul were absorbed in the task of conducting, and that every fibre in his body took part in it. Perhaps the superhuman exertions in which all his faculties, mental and physical, were concentrated, produced, unobserved, the disease which the quick eye of the physician recognized as an affection of the valves of the heart, but which, considering Hesse's mild and kind disposition, as well as his calmly contented, nay, happy life, no one else would ever have supposed attended with danger.

Fortune, indeed, had been kind to Hesse, not because he could boast of numerous works of distinction; not because he was esteemed and respected, far beyond the boundaries of his native land; not because he had, on the whole, achieved with ease an agreeable position, free from care, but rather because, all through his life, he enjoyed a certain degree of independence, which is always the best guarantee of a contented existence. His career was, so to say, marked out for him from his childhood; he had not to make a choice, and thus he was subject to no pangs with regard to his vocation. He found what he ought to do prescribed for him, and, as a person properly brought up, and who has sought the company of good and strict masters, he always did his duty as laid down for him. His zealous love of music never allowed his activity to cool, and the very fact that he first devoted his attention to sacred music preserved him, at an early age, from all vagabondizing virtuosity, and rendered him a serious man, true to his duty, who consistently pursued his course, never allowing himself to stray from it, and fearing only one thing: that he would not come up to the expectations which people were justified in forming of him. His physical qualities often helped to facilitate the severe exertions to which he subjected himself, although he may not always have been successful. When, instead of a worthy successor of Handel and Bach, people would have preferred a French operatic composer or a concert virtuoso. Many an anecdote of Hesse's life proves this, and among others, the anecdote connected with his stay in Darmstadt, when he could not prevail upon the distinguished musical amateur, Ludwig of Hesse-Darmstadt, who conducted his Grand Ducal Orchestra himself, to "listen to the rumbling on the organ." On the other hand, he did not lack triumphs by which he caused German music, in all its simplicity, severity and loftiness, to be highly appreciated.

For the large build of the organ, and its management, Hesse's person appeared to have been expressly made; here, in his own element, he displayed a higher flight of the imagination, and that immediate inspiration, the property of genius alone, in a higher degree, than most of his colleagues. He did a great deal, also, it is true, upon the piano, but he was most anxiously desirous of reproducing truthfully and intelligibly masterpieces, and, with too much modesty, mistrusted his own powers. He was an admirable teacher of this instrument, and, what is more, a concert-player who could perform before the most select audience; the certainty of his touch and the purity of his intonation; the clearness of his style and the ease with which he surmounted the gravest difficulties, were always admired both before and after Liszt had been here. But he was far from falling into all the system of grimacing patronized by modern pianoforte romanticists, and however much people might have been inclined to suppose, from his bodily formation, that he would have stormed away upon the piano, working simultaneously with hands and feet, he was no friend of mere brute force upon the instrument, which was entirely subjected to him. People listened with delighted astonishment, when he executed, as no other person could execute, with incomparable delicacy, the most graceful passages, the gentlest adagios, the softest emotions, full of sweet and melting sentiment. Even in his compositions, he is never untrue to this gracefulness, gentleness and softness; these compositions possess the elegiac character of Spohr's works, subsiding completely into and playing with the melody; they are, in the highest degree artistically worked out, and the most learned master, the strictest contrapuntist will not find the slightest thing to which he can object in them. They are deficient, however, in elevation of ideas, soaring towards Heaven and carrying the hearer with them; but then such flights are to be found only in a Beethoven and a Mozart, to whom our modest contemporary could not rise. He was only too happy when he could listen to their heavenly strains. How often has he said to us, after hearing some modern opera: "What a difference between this and Fidelio! in the latter we have elevation in, and with, simplicity, while in this what useless and repulsive ostentation!" He was an enthusiastic admirer, also, of Weber and Haydn, as heroes of genuine German music, although he was by no means intolerant with regard to composers with modern and foreign tendencies.

It was, perhaps, in consequence of the circumstances and temperament of Hesse, that he never rose, when creating, to heroic enthusiasm. As we have already remarked above, he was a man of a jovial and kind nature, a Silesian, a Breslauer in the fullest acceptance of the word, who clings to the place where he was born, does not willingly leave home, and makes himself comfortable wherever he is. This is not a reproach for Hesse. No one can struggle against his nature, and Hesse was one of those who do not leave the place of their birth. With a little exertion and a greater amount of ambition, it would have been an easy thing for him to take a leading position in the first cities of Europe; he contented himself with giving music-lessons in Breslau, and his greatest delight was, if he did get out of the "precious hole," to collect laurel wreaths in other parts, and deposit them on the altar of his darling Silesian home. We can only feel grateful to him for this. Who would not have liked to read the accounts of his travels to Paris, London, Prague, etc., in which he would not have related his triumphs, but rather recorded what he had observed, as though no homage had been paid to himself, but as if he had gone forth in the service of his mistress, the muse of music, to make the world again acquainted with the magic of old compositions, and strew flowers upon the graves of the heroes from whom he had learned his beautiful art, and to whom he was attached with childlike reverence, another mark of his genuine Silesian character. Though his external appearance promised nothing of the kind, he was a pleasant and joyous companion.

But there is still one fact wanting to complete this description of his character, and that is his literary productions, in which Hesse, far superior in this respect to many others, exhibited a mind embracing the entire range of music. Editors know how carefully and how scrupulously he wrote his criticisms. The latter were mild in tone, but full of sterling thoughts, if not always polished in form. Whenever an artist appeared, Hesse was always willing and ready to act as a living mediator, by means of criticism, between him and the public. When Hesse had spoken, that was sufficient to enable the public to form its opinion.—Lonl. Mus. World (from the Breslauer Zeitung).

Letters of Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy.

(From the second volume of his correspondence just published.)

TO HIS FAMILY.

Leipzig, the 6th October, 1866.

I have been attempting for the last week to find an hour's leisure to answer and thank you for the dear letters I have received from you, but the days I passed in London were not worse, with all their distractions, than has been the period since Fanny's departure, though, at length, now that the first concert has gone off successfully, I have got a little repose again.—On the same day that I accompanied Hensel to Delitzsch, Chopin was here; he would stay only one day, so we passed all of it together, and played music. I cannot conceal from you, dear Fanny, that I again found that you did not do him sufficient justice in your opinion; perhaps, though, he was not in the best mood for playing when you heard him, as may probably often be the case with him; but his playing again enchanted me, and I feel convinced that if you, as well as Father, had heard some of his better things, as he played them for me, you would say the same. There is something fundamentally original in his pianoforte playing, and, at the same time, so masterly that he may be called a really perfect virtuoso, and as I am fond of and delighted with, perfection of all kinds, I had a highly agreeable day, though so different from the preceding ones with you, Hensel. I was pleased at being once more with a regular musician, not with half virtuosos and half classicists, who would fain combine in music les honneurs de la vertu et les plaisirs du vice, but with a man who has a well-marked tendency of his own. And though the latter may be as far distant from mine as the poles from each other, I can get on splendidly with it, but not with the half-and-half people in question.—The evening of Sunday was truly a curious one; I was obliged to play him my oratorio, while inquisitive Leipzigers furtively forced their way in, to see him, and he, between the first and second part, dashed off his new "Eudes," and a new concerto, before the astonished Leipzigers, and I then went on with my St. Paul, just as if an Iroquois and a Caffir had met to talk together.—He has also an extremely pretty "Nocturno," a great deal of which I have got by heart, to play it for Paul's amusement. Thus we had a merry time together, and he promised, most seriously, to come back in the course of the winter, when I am to compose a new symphony and have it performed in his honor! We swore this before three witnesses, and we shall see if we both keep our words.—My Handelian works, also, were introduced before his departure, and Chopin exhibited really childlike delight at them; but they are in truth so beautiful that I cannot be too much pleased with them; 32 large folios, bound in the well-known elegant English fashion, in thick green leather, with, upon the back of each in large gold letters, the title of the entire work and the contents of the particular volume. Besides this, on the first volume are the following words: "To Conductor F. M. B. The Committee of the Cologne Musical Festival of 1835." There is also a very kind letter from the whole Committee with all their signatures. I take out by chance Samson, and at the very beginning light upon a grand air of Samson, which no one knows, because Herr von Mosel cut it out, and which is inferior to no other air by Handel, and as I have as much pleasure in reserve from all the 32 volumes—you may imagine my delight. Before he left, Moscheles came, and, in the very first half hour, played the second volume of my Songs without words right through, to my very great satisfaction; he is quite unchanged, only a little older in appearance, but fresh and merry as ever, and he plays magnificently: he is a perfect virtuoso of another kind, and a master besides. I have had one after the other the rehearsals of the first Subscription Concerts, and thus, on the evening of the day before yesterday, my Leipzig musical directorship began. I cannot describe to you how pleased I am with this commencement, and with my position here altogether. It is a quiet and regular business post. You perceive that the Institution has existed for 50 years, and, in addition to this, people seem very much attached and well-disposed to me and my music. The orchestra is exceedingly good, thoroughly musical, and I think that in another half year it will become still better, for the good-will and attention with which the people here receive and instantly follow my observations quite touched me at the two rehearsals we have had up to the present time; there was always a difference, as though it was another orchestra playing. There are some objections to certain of the performers, but they will be gradually remedied, and I think I may look forward to a series of very agreeable evenings and good performances. I wish you had heard the introduction to my Morres-stille (for it is with that the concert begins); the silence in the room and in the orchestra was so great that you could hear the most delicate gradation of tone, and they played the whole adagio in a perfectly masterly manner; they did not play the allegro as well; accustomed to a slower tempo, they always manifested a tendency to drag; the end, on the other hand, where the slow 4/4 time commences, was a great success; the fiddles went to work with an impetuosity which quite startled me, and Publius was delighted.—The following pieces: Aria in E major, by Weber; violin concerto, by Spohr; and the introduction to Ali Baba, did not go so well; the one rehearsal was not sufficient, and there was often unsteadiness; Beethoven's B flat major Symphony, on the contrary, which composed the second part, sounded magnificently, and the Leipzigers were in ecstasies after each movement. Such eager attention as there was in the entire orchestra I never saw surpassed; they kept a look-out like so many—Schiesbügel, as Zelter would have said.

After the concert I received from the members of the orchestra, and offered them, a mass of congratulations;—first came the orchestra, then the Thomaner (fine young fellows, who come in so punctually and lay about them, that I have promised them an order of merit), then Moscheles, with a retinue of amateurs, then the two musical papers, and so on. On Friday we have Moscheles's concert. I am to play with him his Piece for two Pianos; he will then play my new Piano-forte Concerto; my "Hebriden," also, will be in the swim. This afternoon, Moscheles, Clara Wieck and myself, play Seb. Bach's Triple Concerto in D minor. How amiable Moscheles is still towards me; what a deep interest he takes in my appointment here; how delighted I am that he is so contented with it; how, to my surprise, he plays my E flat major rondo better than I could ever have expected; how we dine in his hotel, and take tea, with music, of an evening in mine—all this you can fancy for yourselves, for you know him, especially you, my dear Father. These are happy days, and though I cannot do much work, I soon make up for lost time, when I derive so much enjoyment as I do now.

The first concert did not render me nervous, but to my shame I confess that I never before felt so embarrassed on leaving; I think this arose from its having previously given rise to so much writing and discussion, and I had never before seen a concert of the kind; the locality and the lights confused me. And now, hoping you are all well and happy, and begging you to write very often, I remain yours,

FELIX.

Musical Pitch.

Extracted from "THE ORGAN, ITS HISTORY AND CONSTRUCTION." By E. J. HOPKINS and E. F. RIMBAULT. LL.D.

Much has been written, at various times, to show that the musical pitch has been gradually rising for the last two centuries; and the opinion has even been expressed, that in Tallis's time it was some two tones lower than it is now. The difficulty, or rather impossibility, has been to reconcile this theory with the notation of the venerable pieces of Church harmony of the sixteenth and early part of the seventeenth centuries. All who have been accustomed to assist in the choral performance of the services and anthems of the early English Church composers, must have observed that the parts, generally speaking, lie so low for the voices that they can be sung only with some difficulty, even at the present supposed elevation of a major third above the original pitch; and this circumstance has naturally led to much speculation as to whether they ever could have been sung at a pitch much, if at all, below that in present use.

Several different theories have been propounded, with the hope of settling this by no means unimportant question. Some have supposed that the range of the human voice must have been lower at that period than it is now; others, that the composers could not have studied the compass and convenience of the voices for which they wrote; while others maintain that the compositions in question were not contemplated by their authors to be sung to any definite pitch, but were intended to be transposed, to suit the voices, as occasion might require. All these explanations, however, are accompanied by some circumstance that proves fatal to its unqualified reception. Let us examine them in the order they are above given.

It must be needless to insist on the extreme improbability that nature has found it necessary to revise that which has always been ranked among her most perfect works; namely, the vocal organ of the human species; particularly as there exists no real difficulty to render the retention of so unevenly an hypothesis necessary. But were it otherwise, the questionableness of such a theory is soon rendered evident by making an analysis of the music already alluded to. In the Services of Tye, Tallis, Bird, Gibbons, Bevin, Farrant, Hilton, and others, the notation of the treble part in no case ascends higher than D<sub>2</sub>, the fourth line in the treble; while in a few instances it descends as low as tenor A, the second line below. The bass constantly ranges down to FF, and sometimes to EE; and the inner parts lie proportionally low. The anthems of the same composers slightly exceed the above upward range in the treble part; but that only rarely. Now, if the pitch, at the time alluded to, were some two tones lower than at present, the above writers must have considered the sound corresponding with the modern B flat, or B<sub>1</sub> natural, the third line in the treble, as marking the full average upward range of treble voices, and an occasional tenor E, the fourth line in the bass, as not too low for them; and further they must have viewed DD flat, and even CC, the second line below the bass, as sounds quite within the reach of the ordinary bass voices;—ideas certainly most opposed to our knowledge and experience of the compass and capabilities of the several voices in existence in the present day. But, inasmuch as the theory of the former existence of a complete series of different, that is, deeper voices, rests solely on the presumed lower pitch of the seventeenth century—and this latter point is not yet proved—acquiescence in it may for the present be fairly withheld.

With regard to the second suggestion, "that the composers could not have studied the compass and convenience of the voices for which they wrote," the answer to this must depend entirely on the decision arrived at in reference to the former question, and, therefore, may also stand over for a time.

The third supposition is, "that the compositions in question were not contemplated by their authors to be sung to any definite pitch." This, however, does not meet the difficulty. Unless the old English treble voices were as deep as the modern counter-tenors, and all the other voices proportionally lower, Tallis, Gibbons, and the church composers of the period, must invariably and intentionally have written their music in a pitch in which it could never have been sung, and have thus rendered recourse to transposition not simply a matter of occasional expediency, but one of constant necessity. Nay, more, as their services, &c., were from the first intended to be accompanied by the organ (the composers themselves, in many cases, taking their seat at the instrument), and as the organs of that day were tuned according to the unequal temperament;—as, moreover, the music was always written in the scales that were especially favored by that temperament, but out of which, according to the above theory, they must uniformly have been transposed;—it follows, if the above hypothesis be correct, that the learned composers referred to must have avoided using the good keys in performance, if not in writing, and preferred the bad. Now, it is not possible that proceedings so needlessly complex and objectionable as those just detailed could have been recognized, still less have received preference, at the hands of those who were, in all other respects relating to their art, such methodical and deep-thinking men.

In the attempted solutions hitherto advanced, the judgment of the great English composers of the time referred to, and even the original perfectness of some of Nature's own work, the compass of the human voice, have been questioned, while one thing, the mutability of which is so well known, namely, the pitch, has been treated as though it was indisputably a very low one in the sixteenth century.

Now, although the opinion is directly at variance with all the hitherto received notions on the subject, there are the strongest reasons for believing that the ecclesiastical pitch of the sixteenth and early part of the seventeenth centuries, so far from being some two tones lower than that now in use, was a whole tone higher than the present concert pitch.

During recent visits to several of the organs of Germany, the writer was frequently struck with the extreme sharpness of the pitch of the old organs. Of the three great instruments at Hamburgh, two—namely, those in St. Catharine's Church, which is the oldest, and that in the Church of St. Jacobi, built in the seventeenth century—proved to be a whole tone above the writer's tuning-fork, marked "Pitharmonic" pitch. The transept organ in St. Mary's Church, at Lübeck, another old instrument, on being tested, was also found to be a whole tone above the same pitch; while that in one of the other churches in the same old town, was a full semitone above the same pitch. On the inquiry being made of the organists of the three fore-mentioned churches, how they accounted for this circumstance, they explained that their organs were tuned to the Church pitch; and it subsequently transpired that in Germany three distinct standards of pitch had at different periods been used to which to tune organs,—namely, orchestra pitch, which was the lowest; chamber pitch, a semitone above the former; and church pitch, which was the highest. On extending these inquiries to an organ-builder of that country, that person stated that he had almost invariably found the old organs, which he had been called upon to tune, repair, or replace by new ones, a semitone or a whole tone sharper than the present concert pitch. Not the least interesting proof of the former existence of a high church pitch is to be found in the fact that Sebastian Bach, in his Church Cantatas, in the most cases wrote the organ part a note lower than the other parts; which circumstance is alluded to by Mr. Macfarren, in his analysis of the contents of the first volume of cantatas, published by the Leipzig Bach Society, printed in the Musical World for 1858.

The above facts, in conjunction with others, tended to confirm an opinion the writer had long previously entertained—namely, that in England, as in Germany, there must have existed, at the period of the Reformation, and from that time to that of the Rebellion, a church pitch quite separate from the orchestral or instrumental pitch; and not only so, but even higher than the modern concert pitch. Every circumstance directly supports this hypothesis, which at the same time removes and reconciles all the difficulties and improbabilities, which have encumbered every other view of the same subject.

To begin with a reference to the English Church Music. If we read the notation of the old services a tone higher, the average compass of the treble parts will then be made to the extent from middle b or c<sub>1</sub>, up to c<sub>2</sub> or f<sub>2</sub>; and the bass parts, as a rule, no lower than gamut G or FF—precisely the ranges which are known to be the best for the corresponding voices in church music. By this very simple means the necessity is obviated for supposing that the range of the human voice has undergone any modification; it removes all occasion for suggesting that the whole race of church composers of the sixteenth and early part of the seventeenth centuries understood or studied the convenience of the voices so little as invariably to have written too low for them; and it renders it quite superfluous to suppose that that industrious class of writers made a practice of setting their services and anthems in wrong keys, leaving singers and organists to transpose them into the correct ones. William Turner, writing in 1724, says: "When Guido Aretinus reduced the Greek scale into the form now used, there was no sound practised above E la, which gave birth to the common proverb, viz., he strains a note above E la." Without going back so far as this quotation would take us, if the pitch in Tallis's time had been some two tones lower than at present, it is difficult to comprehend a cause for treble voices having to "strain" at c<sub>2</sub>; but if it were a tone higher, it is easy to understand that then, as now, the sound of f<sub>2</sub> sharp could only be produced by the exercise of some exertion.

In addition to the theoretical evidences already advanced, there are many practical reasons for believing in the former existence of a church pitch in England higher than the present one. For some time past it has been the custom with Mr. Tarle, the organist of Westminster Abbey, to play Gibbons' anthem, "Hosanna to the Son of David," which is printed in C, in D major; by which transposition the music is rendered more effective in performance, and far less laborious to the choir to sing. The writer also has for years made a practice of playing Gibbons' service in G instead of F, and many other pieces a tone higher than they are printed, which experiments have uniformly been attended with so good an effect on the general character of the music, besides affording so much relief to the voices, as to strengthen the supposition that such transpositions were not departures from, but restorations of, the original pitch. Again, the writer observed, at the Bicentenary Festival of the Sons of the Clergy this year (1854), that Mr. Goss played Gibbons' anthem, "God is gone up," in G, instead of F, as written, in consequence of the parts otherwise lying so low for the voices. The tenors descend to B, and in one case to gamut A. By the transposition they had not to go below tenor C or B; but if taken "some two tones lower," they ought to have descended to FF—a sufficiently low note even for bass voices now-a-days.

Another practical illustration that a high vocal pitch was most probably recognized by the early English church and choral writers, may be gathered from the custom observed at both the metropolitan Madrigal Societies, of almost uniformly taking the pitch of the old English madrigals a semi-tone or more higher than the notation represents, that is, in about the German chamber pitch of former times, to the great improvement of the general effect.

Since the above observations were first written, two interesting facts have come to the writer's knowledge, which strongly support the opinion as to a former high church pitch. In the library, at the Exeter Cathedral, is preserved a MS. copy, written about the beginning of the last century, of Tallis's Service in D, transposed into E; and in Dr. Rimbault's library is a copy of Gibbons' service in F, transposed into G; in both cases the notation, no doubt, being raised, to compensate for the lowering of the pitch, in order that the originally intended sounds might be preserved.

In 1644, church organs were ordered to be demolished by Act of Parliament; and so implicitly was the nonsensical decree obeyed, that very few organs escaped the general destruction; and even the two or three that were spared have subsequently undergone so much alteration in the course of improvement that they could afford little or no assistance in solving the question which has just been considered.

The organs built by Smith and Harris after the Restoration were not tuned to so high a pitch as the presumed choir pitch of the time of Tallis and Gibbons. Smith's pitch, however, was much higher than is commonly supposed, as may be gathered from the following passage, extracted from the "English Musical Gazette," for January, 1819:—"It is a remarkable circumstance that all Schmidt's organs were a quarter, and some even half a tone above pitch; this was so severely felt by the wind instruments, at the performances of the Sons of the Clergy, that they could not get near the pitch of the organ. In consequence of this, it was agreed upon, that the organ should be altered to concert pitch, by transposing the pipes, so that the present DDD was formerly CCC, and so on through the organ." To this it may be added, that the pipes to the CCC key are new ones; the two Open Diapason pipes, of wood, standing in the angles of the case to the left of the manuals. The pitch of the Temple organ was also originally very sharp; but was lowered in 1843. Yet neither the St. Paul's nor the Temple organ is even now more than a quarter of a tone below pitch; consequently they must both originally have been quite up to the present concert pitch, and therefore almost mathematically correct, if not quite so. Harris's organs were generally lower in pitch than Smith's. That at Wolverhampton—part of the one that was originally erected at the Temple—was so until a few years since, when its pitch was raised. It is not certain what was the cause of this difference. Probably it arose from the fact of the French foot measure being greater than the German; which measure applied to the organ pipes, would necessarily lead to such a result as that just mentioned. But to return from such speculations to the written music of the latter part of the seventeenth century. On referring to the sacred compositions by the contemporaries of Smith and Harris, we perceive this coincidence in support of the opinion that the pitch of that period was flatter than the earlier choir pitch; namely, that certain notes, such as E<sup>b</sup> and F<sub>2</sub>, which scarcely ever appeared in the treble part of the earlier church music, were now of quite common occurrence.

Soon after the commencement of the eighteenth century, the pitch had again fallen. Possibly Harris's flatter pitch was preferred and accepted as the standard. It is known that the organ in the Chapel of Trinity College, Cambridge, commenced by Father Smith, and "cut down" and finished by his son-in-law, Schrider, in 1708, was originally adjusted to the pitch which has been shown mathematically to have been a minor tone below the present pitch. The writer of the "Reformation of Cathedral Music," page 25, says Dr. Smith (Harmonies, 1749) gives 393 as the number of vibrations of A in a second. Fisher, in 1823, gives 430. Woolhouse ascertained the Philharmonic pitch, in 1835, to have 424. The same note referred to the scale of vibrations C=512, and derived as a prime harmonic from the subdominant F, will have 526.6. Now the ratio of any of these to 393 is almost exactly as 10:9, which is the ratio of a minor tone, shewing the rise of pitch within a single century."

What is very remarkable is, the pitch had, soon after the commencement of the last century, fallen as much in France and Germany as in England. Of the three fine organs at Strasburg, built by Silbermann, those in the cathedral, finished in 1716, and that in the Protestant church proved, on trial in 1853, to be a whole tone below the pitch of the same fork by which the Hamburg organs were tested the preceding year, and found to be a whole tone sharp. The third organ in St. Thomas's Church is nearly as flat. The organ in the church of S. Maria di Capitol, at Cologne, built in 1767 by König, was originally flat; and, like the Trinity organ, has since been sharpened.

In this case, again, the greater depression of the pitch is manifested by the increased upward range of the notation, as is clearly demonstrated by the music of Handel and other composers of the last century, even without the authority of Handel's tuning-fork, the existence of which further authenticates the supposition. William Turner likewise speaks of the treble voices in his time going some three or four degrees higher than Guido's gamut, which, however, would then have consisted of the same range of sounds as in Tallis's time, or within a semitone of it.

It is evident then, (1) that the organ pitch has within three centuries varied to the extent of two whole tones; (2) that there have at different times existed three distinct pitches, the highest being the oldest; that in use soon after the commencement of the last century being the lowest; and (3) that the present pitch is about midway between the extreme high and low pitches of former times, and is as nearly as possible identical with Father Smith's.

England.

The principal musical event of the past month has been the Festival of the three choirs of Worcester, Gloucester and Hereford, which took place this time, by rotation, in the Cathedral at Worcester, on the 8th, 9th and 10th of September. The total of band and chorus was 300. Mr. Done, the cathedral organist, was the conductor. We clip a few paragraphs from the daily reports in the London Musical World, to show what was done.

Tuesday, Sept. 8. This morning, at half-past eight, full service was held in the Cathedral, the admission being of course free to all comers. The Te Deum and Jubilate were by Sir F. Osley, the anthem Elvey's "Praise the Lord O my soul." For the sake of the collective reputation of the choristers of Worcester, Gloucester and Hereford, I wish that I could express my satisfaction at the manner in which the service was got through.

Then followed a sermon by the bishop, and at 12 o'clock the cathedral was again densely crowded, to hear Mendelssohn's Elijah.

In the first part Madame Lemmens Sherrington, Miss Banks and Miss Palmer, together with Mr. Wilbye Cooper, sang the solos with marked effect; in the second Mlle. Titiens, Madame Sinton Dolby and Mr. Sims Reeves distinguished themselves, as they never fail to do, while Mr. Weiss, who sustained the part of the prophet throughout, never sung with more earnestness and dignity. The trio of angels was repeated, at the request, I believe, of the Bishop: at any rate it seemed to be quite an understood thing, as the conductor made a dead stop, looking round for an evidently expected signal. Why is the sound a school for conductors? We should then be spared such muddling work as occurred but too frequently this morning. One does not like to be hypercritical upon gentlemen who assume the baton only once in three years, but the want of energy, and general sluggishness of the performance, cannot be allowed to pass entirely unnoticed. The attendance was about 1700; the collection £333.

In the evening was a miscellaneous concert:—Mozart's Symphony in D; Bennett's Naiades overture; selection from Cosie fan tutte; arias, duets, &c., by Sims Reeves, Santley, the baritone, Tietjens, Mme. Sinton-Dolby, the Misses Phillips, and others.

Sept. 9. This morning Mozart's Requiem, Beethoven's Engedi (Mount of Olives), and Mendelssohn's Hymn of Praise have been given, but much as I love each of these great master pieces I cannot but think that there was one too many for a single performance. The conductor seemed more at home with Mozart than he was yesterday with Mendelssohn, the Requiem on the whole going very fairly, stricter attention to the various tempi, and less absence of light and shade being observable: the chorus too, throughout, honorably distinguished themselves. For the soloists, Mlle. Tietjens and Mad. Sinton Dolby, Messrs. Wilbye Cooper and Weiss, we have nothing but praise to offer. Nor was the Mount of Olives less satisfactory, the grand "Hallelujah Chorus" bringing the first part to an end most admirably. The Lobgesang fared far better than Elijah, the time (with one or two trifling exceptions) being generally correct, while both hand and chorus seemed thoroughly to have warmed to their work and played and sang their best. Of course Mr. Sims Reeves produced the effect he always does in the recitative, which he has made so peculiarly his own, "We called through the darkness." This, the succeeding chorus, "The night is departing," and the sublime chorale which follows, were worthy of praise. No less noticeable were the two duets "I waited for the Lord," and "My song shall be always Thy mercy," in which Madame Lemmens Sherrington divided the honors with the great tenor, that lady's solo, "Praise thou the Lord," being also irreproachable. Since its first production at Birmingham, in 1840, each hearing of this work makes one more bitterly deplore the death of its composer, whose intention it was to have made this the first of three compositions of similar character.—What a glorious addition to our stock of classical music would have been two more such examples of the Sinfonia cantata. Again was the cathedral completely filled, nearly 1800 being present, a result exceedingly gratifying as some 700 more than were present on the corresponding day three years since, when the Last Judgment and a selection from Judas Maccabæus were done.

Sept. 10. I am glad to find the taste for Mendelssohn is so much in the ascendant here. We have had Elijah and the Lobgesang, and last night we had a no less great masterpiece. The First Wulburgis Night, which, taken altogether, went very well, despite the usual tendency to drag the time, which seems the special weakness of the conductors of these festivals. Miss Palmer, Mr. Wilbye Cooper and Mr. Weiss sustained the principal solo parts, giving the fullest effect to the music. The rest of the scheme of the second concert was like that of the first.

The entire first part to-day was devoted to Herr Schachner's oratorio, Israel's return from Babylon, the novelty par excellence of the festival. The late hour at which this morning's performance terminated prevents my giving anything like a detailed analysis of Herr Schachner's work, or how the various numbers were rendered. It must be sufficient therefore for my present purpose to mention the bare facts; viz., that the principals, Mlle. Tietjens, Miss Palmer, Mr. Sims Reeves and Mr. Santley, all sang their very best, that Mr. Dane was most zealous in his endeavors, that band and chorus exerted themselves to the utmost, and, although various opinions were expressed as to the merits of the oratorio, I believe the general feeling is one of satisfaction. Be it what it may, the step is one in the right direction, and the managing committee deserve all credit for being the first to introduce even a quasi-novelty into their programme. A selection from the works of Handel, beginning from the Esther overture, which for many years ushered in the Tuesday morning's service, constituted the second part. Jephthah furnished occasion for Mr. Reeves to display the wonderful pathos that he alone knows so well how to infuse into the recitative "Deeper and deeper still," with its tender air "Waft her, angels," and to Miss Banks the opportunity of singing "Farewell, ye limpid springs and floods" with much unassuming and natural feeling. Samson contributed for Madame Lemmens Sherrington, "Ye men of Gaza;" for Mr. Wilbye Cooper, "Total eclipse;" for Madame Sinton Dolby, "Return, O God of hosts;" for Mr. Weiss, "Honor and arms;" and for Mlle. Titiens, "Let the bright seraphim."—That these were one and all well done will be easily understood, and that Mr. T. Harper's trumpet obbligato to the last named air was, as it always is, one of the most interesting features, will be readily conceived by your readers, who are (I should think none of them are not) acquainted with the respective pieces and their interpreters. Nor must I omit a strong word of praise for the choir, which consisted of some 250 fine fresh voices, the soprano and basses being especially noticeable, and the singing remarkably steady throughout. The attendance was again enormous, 2170 persons being present; the Thursday of three years since (when Elijah was performed) mustering but 1624. The collection, however, was not so large, being £240 against £255.

Paris.

GRAND OPERA. Mlle. Tietjens performed in the Huguenots four times, and then returned to England. Her victories in Paris may not have satisfied her English admirers, but the Gazette Musicale says of her, that "each time the success, which she obtained from the first day became more pronounced, more decided; each time she was applauded, recalled with more warmth, and in short, to sum up all in one word of irresistible eloquence, each time the receipts rose to that figure which is the ultima ratio of authors, artists and directors";—according to which ultima ratio "negro minstrelsy" is perhaps the height of art!

A new tenor, Villaret, won favor in Guillaume Tell, the "Sicilian Vespers" and Il Tronatore. Mme. Gueymard and Mlle. Wertheimer sang in the last named piece.

OPERA COMIQUE. Le Caid was taken up again in the early part of September with Mlle. Girard and M. Bataille, in the principal parts; both much applauded.

THEATRE LYRIQUE. This opera house, now dignified with the title Impérial (which covers the trifle of 100,000 francs subvention, opened on the 3d of September, under M. Carvalho's management, with Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro." Mme. Carvalho took the part of the page, and Mme. Ugalde that of Susanna. Mlle. Brunetti was the Countess; and the two baritone parts (Figaro and the Count) were taken by MM. Petit and Lutz.

ITALIAN THEATRE. The director, M. Bagier, has engaged, for double service both at Paris and Madrid, the following artists: Prime donne soprani, mezzo-soprani and contralti: Mmes. Anna de Lagrange, Borghi-Mamo, Calderon, Gassier, de Méric-Lablache, Carlotta and Barbara Marchisio, Adelina Patti, Vauder-Beek, Mariotti. Primi tenori: MM. Baragli, Fraschini, Mario, Musiani, Nicolini, Pagans. Primi baritoni: MM. Agnesi, Delle-Sedie, Giraltoni, Guicciardi, Guadagnini, Morelli. Primi bassi: MM. Antonacci, Bouché. Primi buffe: MM. Rovero, Scallèse;—and a long list of comprimarie or secondary parts. Two new works of Verdi are announced: La Forza del destino, and Simon Boccanegra. Among the old works to be taken from the shelf are: Rossini's Moise, Bellini's Beatrice di Tenda, Donizetti's Linda and Maria di Rohan, and Pacini's Saffo.

Germany.

VIENNA. Rehearsals of Gluck's Iphigenia were going on with vigor. Ander, the tenor, having recovered from illness, made his re-appearance as Jean of Leyden in the Prophète, Sept. 10th; and Wachtel, the coachman tenor, has sung twice in the part of Raoul in the Huguenots. Weber's Oberon filled the theatre, with Wachtel in the part of Huon, and Mme. Dustman as Rezia, a part somewhat beyond her physical force.—The Singakademie announces for the coming season a Requiem by Mignon; the "Minstrel's Curse" by R. Schuman; Handel's "Acis and Galathea," and a Cantata and Christmas Oratorio by J. S. Bach.

The Austrian capital will have two Italian Operas in the approaching season. In that under the direction of Signor Merelli, file, will appear Milles. Patti and Trebelli, and Signor Alexandre Bettini; in that formed by Signor Salvi, Mesdames Artôt, Barbot and Lotri. Signori Mongini, Graziani (tenor and barytone), Zucchini, Angelini, &c.

STUTTGART. An opera by Salieri, (a composer of much note in Vienna in Mozart's time), called "Axur, king of Ormus," was to be produced in the latter part of September.

Our Musical Season.

It is time that our musical societies should be stirring for the winter's campaign. Notes of preparation have usually been heard earlier than this. Golden October has come round again, and so far nothing has taken shape, nothing addresses itself to motion; no series of concerts (we mean of the higher order) are announced or even rumored,—nothing except the opening of the great organ, and whatever else may vaguely be imagined to organize itself about that as a centre, or proceed from that as a starting-point. It is naturally a foregone conclusion that there will be Oratorios and other choral concerts with the organ, as well as organ concerts without voices—save such as its own five or six thousand pipes can furnish. The spacious Music Hall, all beautiful and bright and clean again, with that magnificent temple of sound filling the stage end, which was formerly so bare, and drawing all eyes to it like a magnet, and with the noble Beethoven statue, now for the first time set before a worthy background, will invite more than ever to the grander festivals of Art. How rich the place already is in memories of exquisite and sometimes holy hours! What Symphonies and Oratorios, highest moments of Mozart and Beethoven, Handel and Mendelssohn, and all the great ones, haunt its walls! And now the occasion shall be greater—for are we not a nation purified by fire and entering on a new life, with Victory and Peace and Liberty, which henceforth shall mean liberty for all, demanding celebration in exhaustless Symphony and Song? Now too the means, with such a renovated Hall, and such an Organ, and all the new musical interest which these excite, are much increased.

Therefore we have reason to anticipate a musical revival, and in the best sense; that is to say, a revival of what has constituted, at one time or another during the past twelve or fourteen years, the proper musical glory of our city; a revival of the great days of the Orchestra and of the Oratorio societies, not forgetting the sweet seclusion of like-minded circles listening to choice "chamber music."

Let us consider, then, what can we have, and what are we likely to have. Of Organ concerts we need say nothing—they at least are a foregone conclusion—save to repeat the hope that the great organ will be the means of familiarizing our ears and souls, as much as possible, with the great music of Bach; this in itself would be an era in our musical culture, and would go far to compensate for meagreness and failure in almost all the other branches.

Nor need we take into account the Opera, the fitting prospects of whose visitations we have noted elsewhere. Opera—as we generally get it—while it is one of the always popular and fashionable things, only indirectly touches the musical life and growth of a community. It belongs more to amusement than to culture. Occasionally, when we chance to have some great work worthily presented, it does more and kindles an artistic fervor. But opera, to afford to do such good work, must be a permanent establishment, and not a speculating visitor, whose art it is to dazzle a baby public with bright colors, and make us buy, in the heat of the hour's folly, what we do not need so much as better things which cost less and last longer. But we can count some good things, some real treasures of the mind, even amid the fitful fevers of past opera seasons. We hope that the three armies this year threatening to invade us, will not do so wholly to our harm, but will give us, in addition to things hacknied, sentimental, trivial or dazzlingly effective, also now and then a taste of the really great works of lyric art. Some novelties, about which we shall at least be curious, like Gounod's "Faust," are promised, and we shall no doubt hear good singers, each productive of a fresh sensation. From the (to our town) novelty of a well-appointed German opera we certainly shall expect some gain to our stock of lyrical impressions. We think we shall be pretty sure to make acquaintance with Fidelio, and a few more works of Mozart,—would that we might add also Gluck; possibly "William Tell," which is German enough in spirit, though Rossini wrote it; possibly too, Weber's Oberon or Euryanthe; and Cherubini's Wasserträger; as well as lighter works of Nicolai, Lortzing, Kreutzer, &c. But we linger here too long in passing; our concern now is with the concerts, not the operas.

To begin with the most important, those of the Orchestra, the so-called "Philharmonic," or Symphony concerts. No organ, opera, or oratorio can supply the want of these. We write them all with little or compared to Orchestra, when worthily engaged in its peculiar work of rendering a great Symphony. But then it must really be an orchestra, a grand one, well appointed, with twice or thrice our usual complement of strings. In our straitened circumstances, however, we must do the best we can; we cannot command half the artists that New York can, or Berlin, Leipzig, London, &c. But on a smaller scale, of 40 or 50 instruments, much has been and may still be done. More depends on the works selected for interpretation, on the programme, and the earnest study bestowed on its execution, than on numbers. Have not nearly all the Symphonies of Beethoven, of Mendelssohn, the best of Mozart and of Haydn, become household words among us, poor as we are compared to the great musical centres? And can we ever do with less? We are glad, therefore, to learn that Mr. Zerrahn means once more to reorganize and revivify his orchestra, and give a series of at least four sterling concerts, in which some of the best of the Symphonies, and some important novelties, will be produced. He contemplates the excellent plan of announcing his whole season's programme beforehand, so that subscribers may know to what they commit themselves. We have heard him speak of Schubert's glorious Symphony in C as among the possibilities; also, among the novelties, Liszt's "Faust" symphony, and Nicolai's choral overture based on the hymn: Ein feste Burg. We may be allowed the suggestion, that, inasmuch as the great Organ is about to set the pitch here according to the new French standard, which is less extravagantly high than that to which we have been accustomed, it will now cost less straining to the voices to achieve the choral parts of the Ninth Symphony; and does not this new facility, combined with all the inspirations of the great passing crisis, suggest this as a good time for a new attempt to render that sublime creation? We long to see the bronze Beethoven looking down upon an orchestra engaged in such a task.

On the good stand taken by these concerts will depend somewhat the tone and character of the more mixed and cheaper Afternoon Rehearsal concerts, which will naturally follow. The Amateur orchestra, also, (Mozart Club), will doubtless do some good things.

In the quieter way of Chamber Music we learn that Messrs. Eichberg, Leonhard and Kreissmann have determined to give another series of such charming concerts as they held at Chickering's last year: when we shall have instrumental works of Bach, Beethoven, Chopin, and the rest, with songs of Schubert, Schumann, Franz, sung in their true spirit. The Mendelssohn Quintette Club will of course continue their good work, bringing out more of the last quartets of Beethoven, as well as brightening the impression of the old favorite works in that kind. We hear that they think of commencing their concerts without resorting to the old ungracious, tiresome process of a subscription paper, and without any stipulated number of concerts. We think the plan a good one and quite as likely to succeed. But if the number of concerts is to be fixed, we would suggest the advantage of doing as Messrs. Mason & Thomas have done in New York, publishing the programmes of the whole series beforehand. By this means, the more earnest among the audience will have a chance to prepare themselves somewhat by private study for the right reception and enjoyment of the various masterpieces. We trust that our pianists, too, some of whom are masters, will feel the spirit move them to give some evenings with the fine composers for that instrument.

In all these concerts, the art of arts, perhaps, is that of programme-making. Variety is the spice of life, it is true, and contrast is a vital element in unity itself. How to secure these without vitiating the whole, without loss of artistic self-respect, is the question. The temptation is quite natural, and the practice far too common, to try to conciliate the truly musical, and at the same time catch the crowd; to render outward tribute unto Beethoven, but to claim more to one's self (the player). We trust no one will fail to read the letter of Mendelssohn upon another page, especially the passage where he speaks of "half virtuosos and half classicists, who would fain combine in music les honneurs de la vertu et les plaisirs du vice."

We really believe we shall not have occasion to complain again of the past three or four years' poverty in Oratorios, compared with good old times. The Organ alone is guaranty of that. It will shoot new life into the old Handel and Haydn Society; new purposes, new hopes, new sense of youth already begin to stir under its venerable ribs, with energy enough we hope to lead to something. The "Messiah" at Christmas will derive an added glory from the organ; but we expect much more than that. There are other great works which we have a right to hope to hear. It is even time that our famous Oratorio Society should begin to grapple with old Bach, or own itself behind the age. Some good things we know they have in contemplation; among them Handel's music to Dryden's "Ode to St. Cecilia," for the first time, and a revival of Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise." "Israel in Egypt," with its triumphant Miriam's song and "horse and his rider" chorus, and "Judas Maccabæus" would suit the temper of the times. New life and long life, say we, to the "Handel and Haydn." But are there no other bodies of singers, who might keep this alive and young by wholesome emulation? And is there not other great choral work to be done, requiring organ, orchestra, great Music Hall and voices, besides Oratorio, opening important fields for other organizations? The writer, in the Musical Times, from whom we quoted in our last, complains that the H. & H. Society have heretofore had the exclusive monopoly of the Music Hall on Sunday evenings,—the only evenings on which sacred concerts are remunerative." This, if true, is too suggestive of "the dog in the manger," and we agree with our neighbor that music would probably be the gainer by having the Hall and all other conveniences open to fair competition. But of this hereafter.

Hayter's Church Music.

Resuming our examination of this book where we left off (see Journal of Sept. 5), we have yet to speak of what is the most characteristic and almost the largest portion of its contents. For it will be remembered, we found its chief peculiarity, among other "collections," to consist in its avoidance of the usual psalm tune monotony, and its borrowing even the themes of its psalm tunes from larger classical works of all kinds. This tendency is still more apparent in the collection of larger pieces, which, with a lot of those mere musical cadences called "Chants," make up the last half of the book.

The first example is unpromising; Mr. Hayter has not put the best foot forward. The piece is entitled Deus Misereatur, by Mozart; and in it you soon recognize some lineaments of the beautiful Recordare in the Requiem looking out through strange disfigurement of the original structure, where voice follows voice in canon, while here, the four parts move pari passu.

Next come a couple of Jubilates (always with English words). The first, bearing no composer's name, has a familiar sound, and is a graceful, flowing, charming composition. The second, by Novello, is still better; having a figured bass, and generally a free and individual movement of the parts, ingenious but not finical, learned but yet natural and expressive. The Benedictus presents itself in five dresses; at first Winter-clad, and rather cold and commonplace; the next time anonymously, but pleasantly and cheerfully, with a touch or two of Spohr harmony; then with the name of Hayter—rather a forced effort, chilly and ungenial modulations alternating with weak passages in thirds; then as that ringing glorious strain, full and sonorous, the Dona nobis from the first Mass of Haydn,—verily a good selection; and finally with the sweet, serious, placid smile of Vincent Novello.

An entire Te Deum follows, arranged by Hayter from the first Mass of Haydn, making an effective piece.—The next piece: Benedic anima mea, bears the Italian name of Sarti; a learned composer, but this piece runs too much in sweetish thirds, though it has fine passages. It is not nor indeed are the most of these pieces, church-like in the severer sense of the term; compare it with either Bach or Palestrina, their style is secular—a thing which can be without lacking all religious element.

Next come an Easter Anthem by Novello, with a kindly warmth in it, and a nice Christmas Anthem by Hopkins, (we presume the organist at the Temple Church in London), in the course of which a breath of Handel's pastoral symphony creeps into the accompaniment. A couple of short funeral anthems, both anonymous, both of a soothing and consoling character, but in no way remarkable as compositions, and a Sanctus in old English style, strong and solemn, by Dr. Croft, close the list.

There is certainly much in this book which choirs may find of value; much that must be refreshing after most Yankee psalm and anthem manufactures; much that is musician-like, though faults and crudities may here and there be pointed out. We regard it as a progress, but we still hope to see a collection of religious music wholly drawn from deeper sources.

Mr. GILMORE, with his well appointed band, and almost orchestra, commenced a series of brilliant and entertaining popular concerts at the Tremont Temple last Saturday and Sunday evenings. CAMILLA URSO played her violin for him, and its charm is infallible. Mr. RUDOLPHSEN, the bass, sang, and Mr. ARBUCKLE displayed his fine skill on the cornet. Overtures, operatic potpourris, &c., were played by the band, both with reeds and with brass alone, with remarkable purity of intonation, precision and brilliancy of effect.

MARSTON'S Opera troupe are to open at the New York Academy next Monday evening, in Roberto Devereux, the principal parts by Mme. Medori, Mlle. Sulzer, Signors Mazzoleni and Bellini. During the week, Rigoletto and Norma are to follow.

In New York the various series of classical concerts are announcing themselves. The Philharmonic Society has commenced its rehearsals. Mr. THEODORE THOMAS will give four grand orchestral concerts, and as many public rehearsals, at Irving Hall, with the addition of a full chorus.—The Brooklyn Philharmonic, too, with Eisfeld for conductor, commence their seventh season of five concerts and 15 rehearsals, the first concert to be on the 31st inst., with Mendelssohn's Scotch Symphony and Beethoven's "Ruins of Athens" overture for the main features.—Mr. MILLS will give four piano concerts, and Messrs. MASON & THOMAS announce the following prospectus of their Soirées of Chamber Music:

Obituary.

HERMANN WOLLENHAUPT, THE PIANIST.

This eminent pianist and composer died on Friday evening, the 18th inst., after a very brief illness. He left his native place, Schkeuditz, in Prussia, at the age of 18, having achieved a fine reputation as a pianist, and came to New York in 1845, where he has resided ever since. His name soon became known by his performances at the Philharmonic and other concerts, and the reputation thus achieved gained him at once a large influx of pupils from the best families. This success decided him to settle down as a teacher and he became one of the most eminent instructors in the country. He but rarely appeared in public, as he devoted all his leisure time to composition. His works for the piano-forte are numerous, and are distinguished by marked originality, exquisite grace, freshness, and brilliancy. All these works, though written here, are probably better known in Europe, where they have made for their author a brilliant reputation and have become standard teaching pieces. They have been republished in almost every European city. Mr. Wollenhaupt, having determined to end his days in New York, sent for the whole of his family to join him before he had been two years in the country. For them he made a home, educating his sisters and displaying the noblest traits both as a son and a brother. He did yet more. He sent his brother Bruno to Germany to study as an artist, and afforded him all the advantages that a seven years' stay could offer. He was well repaid for the sacrifice, by the eminence which that brother has attained as a violinist and musician. No man was more respected among us for his rare intelligence and genius, and no man was more beloved for his honorable, generous, open-hearted nobility of character. In every relation of life he was just, tender, and true, and he goes to his grave mourned by all, and with heartfelt regrets, that but few have deserved so well, that a life so useful should have ceased so soon, when so many affections were intertwined with his, and the promise of the future was so bright. All the well-known musicians were present at his funeral, and the piano warerooms and music stores were closed in respect to his memory. His body was interred at Cypress Hill Cemetery, Long Island.—Tribune.

GERMAN OPERA. A fortnight ago we copied from a New York paper the latest on dis about the famous singers whom Herr Anschütz had engaged in Europe for the coming season. That very day the new importation arrived in New York, where the orchestra, chorus and corps de ballet have for some time been rehearsing; but on opening the goods, they were not found to correspond in a single particular with the invoice which has been circulating in the newspapers. Entirely a changed set of names—and for the most part heretofore unheard of, (which does not prove that they may not be as good as the best). No Titaschek, no Dall' Aste, no Formes, neither Carl nor Theodor nor—what is the baritone brother's name? Instead of these we have the following list, furnished to the Philadelphia Evening by Mr. A. Birgfeld, the business agent of Mr. Anschütz:

The leading tenor robusto is Herr Himmer, who has been for several years at the Berlin opera. The new prima donna for the heavier parts is Madame Himmer-Frederici, from the same theatre. Both are very fine artists. The soubrette is Mlle. Pauline Canisso, from Vienna, who sang with success in Paris last year and has received high commendation from Rossini and others. There is another soubrette, Mlle. Caroline Lang, from Pesth. A singer of the florid style is Mlle. Caroline Puckner, from Vienna. The light tenor is Herr Holler, from the Brunswick opera. The first basso is Herr Lorenz Remy, from Vienna, where he was selected by Salvi for the Italian opera. The barytone's name has not been given to us, but he is said to be very fine. Mme. Johannsen, and Messrs. Kronfeld, Graff, Weinlich and others of last year's company are re-engaged. The orchestra and chorus have been greatly enlarged and improved. A number of operas never played in this country will be produced, including Weber's Enryantke, Spohr's Jessonda and Gounod's Faust, which has made such a sensation in London lately. The company will begin its performances in Baltimore about the 1st of October and will then go to Washington for a fortnight. The season at the Philadelphia Academy will begin on Monday, the 2d of November, and continue throughout the month. The great excellence of the company and the novelty and variety of the repertoire make it certain that it will be attended with great success.

Since noting the above, we find that the German Company were to make their first trial at Brooklyn, last Thursday evening, in Der Freyschütz, for a single night only.

STIGELLI, the tenor, in a private letter, dated Monza, Aug. 28, to a friend in this city, writes:

"I accepted an engagement at La Pergola in Florence a few days ago for the autumn season. The company will be of the best quality. I shall sing in Gounod's fine opera of Faust, which is certainly the most remarkable novelty which has made its appearance for some years. The music is more German than French, fresh, generally original, and full of felicitous phrases and ideas, which are essentially connected with the orchestration. Though filled with "good music", it possesses a charm for those who are not technically skilled in the science. The libretto is as well done as the grandeur of Goethe's poem permits, reduced to the small proportions of an opera plot. The authors have seized on the principal points for scenic effect, and these, with the delightful music, together charm the auditor. It needs a dramatic tenor, a "belle et bonne" soprano, an excellent bass and good choruses."

THE WRONG MAX. The Tribune's postscript to its account of Maretzek's operatic plans, which we copied in our last, was in error about Gottschalk's being "engaged for 100 nights by Mr. Maretzek." Max Strakosch is the man, the same under whose agency the virtuoso's business has thrived for a year or two past.

The Transcript has the following:

One of the finest church organs yet erected in this City of Organs has recently been built, and is now being placed in the Second Church, Dr. Robbin's in Bedford street.

This splendid instrument is the work of the Brothers Hook; and they have exercised their utmost skill in producing an organ worthy of the beautiful church it will adorn, the critical judgment of our community, and the prominent position they have attained as builders.

The Society have been fortunate in having the services of Mr. B. J. Lang, who has been unremitting in devising the details of its action, and musical characteristics, and in oversight of its construction. The Music Committee of the Church have had their ingenuity somewhat taxed in procuring an outward form, or case, which, while it should harmonize with the architecture of the church, should at the same time enable them to preserve the beautiful Gothic front window—in all of which they have been eminently successful, the present design having been furnished, under their advisement, by Wm. C. Preston, a young artist of growing popularity.

As a musical instrument the organ is of rare excellence, combining stops both grand and beautiful. In mechanical peculiarities, it embraces many modern European improvements now first introduced. As an adjunct to the architecture of the church, it is all that could be desired; neither too ornate nor simple; but embodying all the details of the early English Gothic requisite for unity with its surroundings. The form of the instrument is that of two Gothic temples, united by a screen, with gables of tracery—the corners of each having grouped Gothic columns, supporting light pinnacles. Both gables and pinnacles are crocketed, and terminate in appropriate finials.

Each of these temples, which are of black walnut, will present two gabled fronts, with pipes of harnished metal, in fine contrast with the more sombre hue of the wood; and the many colored lights streaming in between them, over and through the gables and tracery of the screen, produce a most beautiful and pleasing effect. The organist and choir are thus placed as it were between two organs.

This instrument, the bellows of which covers eighty square feet, is of itself a curiosity, has great capacity, and consists of a great organ, swell organ, choir and pedal organs, with the proper couplings, leaders and valves, and has 40 registers and 1712 pipes; it is played by three banks of manuals, and over two octaves of pedals.

From the singularity of form and position of this organ, it has required great mechanical ingenuity to arrange its several parts, and insure promptness of voice and freedom of touch, with easy action; but the Messrs. Hook have overcome all obstacles, and offer this, their last work, to the congregation and the public, with the full assurance that it is in all respects equal, at least, if not superior, to any one yet put up in this country.

Sept. 23, 1863.

OPERA IN NEW YORK. Of the opening at the Academy the Sunday Times says:

It will be good news to Fifth avenue, and the whole army of white kid glove and opera cloak importers, that nothing has occurred to disturb Max Maretzek's happy family arrangements; that the magnificent prima donna, Medori, arrived in excellent health; that the serenade in honor of her return passed off beautifully; that, in short, all the preliminaries, having been satisfactorily disposed of, the regular opera season will open on Monday evening, October 5th, under more favorable auspices than any that New York has ever before witnessed. The opening opera will be Donizetti's celebrated "Roberto Devereux," with Medori in her great part of Queen Elizabeth, Mazzoleni as Count Essex, Mlle. Sulzer as Lady Nottingham, and Bellini as the Duke of Nottingham. Already the box office of the Academy of Music is besieged, and it is safe to predict a most brilliant inauguration, heightened by the presence of all that New York can boast of fashion and beauty. The first opera night will, indeed, most fitly introduce a fashionable season of unusual promise.

A history of the opera in Berlin has been written by Count Cameillon Schneider of Prussia. Here is an extract: "The Berlin opera is a creation of Frederick the Great, and was opened on the 7th of December, 1742, with Graun's "Cæsar and Cleopatra."—Graun conducted at the piano. One of the first stars on the stage was the dancer Barbarina, the King's favorite, who afterwards married the Privy Councillor von Cöceji, the son of the Chancellor, and died at a very advanced age in 1799, in Silesia, where she had three estates, leaving her entire fortune—100,000 thalers—to an institute for noblemen's daughters."

At the late distribution of prizes at the Brussels conservatory, the successful candidate, Bernard Sternberg, was refused the prize on account of his extreme youth. He is not more than thirteen years old.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Ah! Who can tell how lonely. (Ah! Non pensar che pieno.) Romance from Beatrice di Tenda. 25

Song of Agnes in the well known opera. A varied, rich and pathetic melody, such as we should expect from Bellini, its composer. With Italian and English words.

Wild Shady Wood. (Selva Opaca). 25

Song of the daughter of Gessler in "Guillaume Tell." A splendid and satisfying song to those who can sing it, as also to the auditors. Has Italian, French and English words.

Forward! Onward! Never despair.

Henry Russell. 25

One of Russell's brave, manly ballads, with a strong word of cheer to the tolling thousands. A kind of song that does good in the world.

The Weeping Tree. E. B. Brewster. 25

Our war songs increase in number, and at the same time improve in quality. Of this one, the title, alone, renders it worthy of presentation. It has, besides, simple, touching words and melody.

Birds! that in yon pine trees sing. (Vögelein im Tannenwald.) Fr. Ald. 25

The words are by Linley, and fitted very well to the simple and pretty song of the birds, by Ald, who is very apt at doing such things well.

Instrumental Music.

The Sound of Harps. From "Il Polito." C. Grobe. 40

One of the very best songs from the Martyrs, or "Il Polito." Varied in Grobe's well known manner. It is a pleasure to record the appearance of each of these transcriptions, as they render familiar to ordinary players the best works of the masters.

The Shadow Song. (Polka Redowa). J. S. Knight. 25

Mr. K. has put it in the power of every lady to dance with her shadow; so a lady and her shadow, that's two. Two ladies and shadows make four. Four ladies and shadows make enough for a rotation. As the shadow song can be sung as well as played, there's the music. Any close cut lawn may be the ball-room, and an hour before sunset a good time for the exercise.

THE MUSICAL LYRA.—A Collection of Glee, Quartets, and New Operatic Choruses, original and selected. By Frederick H. Passé.

Price $1.00

It is no easy matter for a music teacher to find a good glee book for his choir or advanced singing classes. Some have been used before. Some are too difficult, some too flat, and some have too many old pieces; good of course for beginners in glee singing, but not novel enough for the present purpose. The Musical Lyra is a fresh book. Nearly all the music and words are entirely new. The words are good compositions or well selected; and the writers of the music deserve credit for combining great variety of arrangement, with simple harmony. The pieces from new operas are first rate.

ADALBERT GYROWETZ.

CHAPTER XI.

From Paris to Berlin.—Dresden.—Naumann and Himmel.—A feast "to be eaten."—Old scenes and friends in Bohemia.—Warm welcome home in Vienna.—Accepts a diplomatic appointment.—Munich; G.'s symphonies ascribed to Haydn.—Meets Kisevetter on the Rhine.—The artist's pride wounded; returns to Vienna and becomes Kapellmeister.

At length came the catastrophe which ended the career of Louis XVI. Learning the King's condemnation—he was executed January 21, 1793. Gyrowetz hastened his departure from Paris, leaving on the 5th of January, and going via Brussels, Venlo, and the Duchy of Cleve, all the usual routes being closed by hostile armies. He reached the Rhine opposite Wesel, which was at that time the headquarters of the Prussian army, and was set over the river, amidst floating ice—a dangerous passage for which he had to pay well. At supper, in one of the first hotels, he met a large number of officers of the higher ranks; among them Blucher, with whom he afterwards "had the honor to converse." At table the stranger was asked as to his name, object of his journey, and the like.

At the name, Gyrowetz, one of the officers sprang from his seat, embraced him—in true German style—and told him that he preferred his sonatas and nocturnes to all other music, and that they had given endless pleasure; closing with a pressing invitation to come and spend some days on his estate in the neighborhood with him and his family. The composer was, however, in too much haste to see his home once more, to accept the flattering invitation.

The journey to Berlin was made in his own hired vehicle, with a poor fellow of a Jew for a travelling companion, whom he took with him out of pity, but who made himself of great service on the way, and of whom the old gentleman says, "he showed a great deal of honesty," as though that was a rare thing among his race! The old prejudice!—less strong now than formerly—which gives one the hope that an equally wicked and absurd prejudice against the African race in our country may in time be overcome. At Halberstadt, where they arrived exactly at one o'clock P. M., they were told that dinner was over, and all they could obtain to eat was hard black bread and cheese. In Magdeburg next day they obtained a dinner, and Gyrowetz saw three French generals—prisoners—taking a walk upon the walls. Two of them were Dumas and Lafayette!

There is little of interest in the reminiscences of Berlin, to any one but Gyrowetz himself—for whom they had much, his path there also being strewn with roses. He heard Don Juan so wretchedly given as to be generally hissed. He visited a school where boys were taught to sing, who sang choruses and songs in the streets, and thus gained the means of support. He found that, while they learned to sing with much correctness of intonation, and effectively together, they had to go through a special course to develop the voice and the higher qualities, so as to fit them for the stage or the church.

In Dresden, the day after his arrival, he was the guest of Kapellmeister Naumann ["Sons of Zion come before him," in the old Handel and Haydn Collection, is a piece arranged from Naumann], where he met, at the excellent table, Kapellmeister Himmel, (not Hummel) of Berlin. Of course the grand topic was music. Naumann expressed himself in regard to instrumental accompaniments, thus: Loud accompaniments should be avoided, otherwise the singer must exert himself too much to be heard, and the melody be so overwhelmed as to make the effect stunning and confused, rather than attractive and pleasing; and that is the reason why singers nowadays lose their voices so much earlier than formerly. In church music the themes and figures should not be so frivolous and theatrical, as was the mode, but the composer ought to seek thoughts which should be modest and elevating to the soul of the listener—such as suit devotion.

Himmel joined himself to Gyrowetz as they left the house, complained of the dinner, and told his companion to come to him next day, and he should have a far better one. The latter, apologizing for intruding upon his hospitality, accepted, and was taken by Himmel at the appointed time to the Casino, then the most famous eating house in Dresden. The dinner was superb, the wines excellent, and champagne was not wanting. Gyrowetz was delighted, and warmly thanked his host for such noble hospitality. As they were leaving the table, the bill was presented to Himmel, who had ordered every thing, but he coolly turned the waiter over to the thunderstruck Gyrowetz—"The gentleman would settle it!" and so he did; Himmel had no money, and Gyrowetz had to pay! "What a fine invitation!!!" says the old gentleman. He remained some days in Dresden, but before leaving, there came to him a breastpin set with small diamonds, from Berlin, sent by Himmel, which in part made up for the expenses of his dining out.

There is nothing of much interest in his recollections of Prague, whither he journeyed next. Some of his old acquaintances received him with marked attention; some told him to come again, which he would not do, "for that was not his custom, nor did he come thither begging."

From Prague he went to Budweis, where he found his old mother, his eldest brother, a brother-in-law, and some other relations still alive, and who all did their best to make the visit a happy one. Among the persons mentioned in his reminiscences of this visit, is a Count Gavriani, who took the composer one day over to Chulmetz, to visit Count Fünfkirchen, in whose service he had begun life as secretary, and in whose chateau he had composed his first symphonies, serenades and other pieces, and had been so much encouraged to go on with his attempts, by the fact that he could try each new piece at once, and discover its excellences and defects. He went up into the chamber which was once his, and where he had begun those symphonies, with Joseph Haydn's for his model, by the imitation of which he had broken out his own path—a path which had happily conducted to success, and brought him a good reputation. He remembered there, how often, while engaged in composition, he had been so overcome by his feelings, as to weep and sob; and that to such a degree, as to be heard outside his room, and people would come to see what was the matter with him. At dinner he was placed next the Countess, and had to give the story of his travels to the company. And so passed the day, and he returned to Budweis in great happiness.

The state of music in Budweis in 1793 does not much concern us in 1863, and the remarks upon it may pass. A visit of some days to the Count of Bouquois, where he was treated as the equal of the family, and where music filled up the evenings, was in its results important to Gyrowetz, since he was there introduced to Count Sickingen, who, on learning that the young man was going to Vienna, told him to call upon him there and he would see to his advancement.

In Vienna he found every thing to gratify him in the reception he met from old friends, and the kindness of new ones. The publishers were all ready to pay well for his compositions, which consisted of sonatas, twelve nocturnes for piano-forte, violin and violoncello, and many German and Italian songs and duets, which sold well and some of which became popular also in Italy.

Esterhazy gave him an order for three masses, a vespers service and a Te Deum laudamus, which, when finished, were tried with full orchestra in a large saloon, and gained him great credit. Van Swieten was one of the guests, and was pleased to take the composer by the hand and express his satisfaction; and Van Swieten was an authority in Vienna in those days. He had been the friend of Mozart, and now petted the young Beethoven, which remark is not made, however, by Gyrowetz. The Vespers were produced at the Michael church, by Kapellmeister Weinkopf and the masses were occasionally to be heard in Austrian churches for fifty years at least after their first production. Esterhazy invited their composer to Eisenstadt, where he was treated with great distinction during his three days' stay.

On calling upon Count Sickingen, afterwards, he was received very cordially, and in the course of the conversation was pretty thoroughly examined as to the education he had received. The fact that he had studied jurisprudence in Prague, and was now able to converse in German, Bohemian, Latin, Italian, French and English, made such an impression upon the Count, that he inquired if Gyrowetz would like to enter the imperial civil service?

This was an opportunity by no means to be despised by a young man with no resources but musical composition, and he declared his willingness to accept a position. A few days later Sickingen was appointed to some kind of diplomatic position in the main Austrian army, then lying on the Rhine, under command of archduke Albert, and two secretaries allowed him. He immediately appointed Gyrowetz his corresponding secretary. For some time still they remained in Vienna, and the Secretary found his duties pleasant and not overburdensome, and had time to earn a handsome addition to his salary by composing sonatas and nocturnes.

Sickingen was then ordered to Munich, where he remained three months, and where Gyrowetz had the satisfaction of hearing his own symphonies in the palace of the Elector, and of seeing that they were favorites with his Transparency. One evening in the theatre he heard one of his early symphonies exceedingly well executed, by the superb orchestra led by Ecker. Supposing Ecker had chosen it to give him a pleasant surprise, he sought him out at close of the performances, and expressed his gratitude for a pleasure so unexpected. Ecker, was at first a good deal confused, but, begging his pardon, assured Gyrowetz that it was one of Haydn's symphonies. On demanding and receiving the score, sure enough it did bear the name of Haydn—it was one of the three sold by Tost in Paris, and there printed. Ecker on hearing the story, complimented the composer, and assured him that this piece was so much a favorite, both with the Elector and the public, as to be often performed.

As business increased, and with it cares and labors, Sickingen grew petulant and exacting; and his secretary, who found his labors, though hard and constant, pleasant and intellectually profitable, was often ill able to bear with patience the whims of his employer.

At the termination of the three months in Munich, Sickingen went to Schwetzingen, to the army. Here Gyrowetz became acquainted with Sartorius, and Kiesewetter, in after years an industrious and valuable writer on music, (whose works are in great part, if my memory serves, in the Boston Library), and other gentlemen connected with the military councils. At Schwetzingen there is a fine garden on the banks of the Rhine, from which he often saw the French pickets on the opposite side, waving their handkerchiefs to the Austrians, and carrying on all sorts of jokes and fun with them. Here he used to meet Kiesewetter, walking about playing the flute, of which instrument he was a master.

Business here increased to such a degree, that the Secretary had often to work the night through, and was at all times liable to be called from his bed, to copy and write despatches, all which he would have borne uncomplainingly, had not Sickingen's treatment of him begun to grow intolerable. On one occasion, he shut out all his officials from his table, because a Prince of Würtemberg was a guest, which caused great dissatisfaction. As to Gyrowetz, he could finally bear it no longer, and one day took the post and went off to Mannheim. Sickingen could not do without him, and went himself to find and persuade him to return. The difficulties were smoothed over for a time, but only for a time. Gyrowetz could not endure his position, resigned it, and, to save appearances, was sent as bearer of despatches to Vienna, where he expected to receive a position in one of the public offices. While awaiting his appointment, he employed himself in preparing and publishing sonatas and quartets, which attracted the attention of Baron Braun, then at the head of the Court Theatres, and led him to offer the composer a position as one of the imperial Kapellmeisters. This offer was the cause of much perplexity to Gyrowetz. Should he remain in the civil service, or devote himself to art? There was much to be said on both sides; but at length, with the advice of friends, he accepted the offer of Braun, and received the appointment.

The conditions were, in short, these; he bound himself to compose an opera and a ballet annually, and to take charge of their rehearsals. Whatever else he should compose he was to receive extra pay for. He must also be present at all operatic performances, to see that no faults of omission or commission occurred, and in case of any, he was to report them. He was subject to no person but Baron Braun, though Weigl, first Kapellmeister, outranked him—a cause of considerable trouble at first, but which was happily overcome.

His salary was, for the first two years, 1000 florins = $500. The third year 1200fl. After five years 1500fl., and at the end of ten years 2000fl. per annum, for life.

This contract was made in 1804, and the increase of salary took place, according to it, in the third and sixth year of his service; but when the eleventh year came round, he was asked to wait until the finances of the theatre were in a better condition. Meantime the contracts, owing to the various changes in the management, had been lost, and finally, poor Gyrowetz was unable to bring any documentary evidence that the 2000 florins per annum, for life, had been secured to him. Years afterwards, however, when Ferdinand had become Emperor, he allowed the chaplain, now growing old, an annual gratuity, for which, however, he had to hand in a petition every year.

Letters of Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy.

(From the second volume of his correspondence just published.)

TO "CONCERTMEISTER" FERDINAND DAVID, IN LEIPSIK.

BERLIN, the 30th July, 1836.

DEAR DAVID,—Many thanks for your letter, by which you have afforded me much pleasure. I have been turning the matter over in my mind here, and I think that it was really too much good fortune for us two to have come together, and that one had not to reside here and the other somewhere else, without learning much from each other, as it, no doubt, falls to the lot of many a good fellow to do, in our dear, and somewhat detestable, fatherland; on thinking farther, however, I came to the conclusion that there are not many musicians like you, men who pursue incessantly such a broad, straight path in art, and in whose whole proceedings I could take such profound delight as in yours. Such things are never said verbally, therefore, let me write to-day and tell you how your rapid development, during the last few years, has surprised and delighted me; one feels, at times, inclined to be disheartened on seeing so many men of no talent, aspiring to a high aim; and so many men with talent, aspiring after a mean one; consequently, really high talent, united to the proper intentions, is doubly refreshing. With the first-class the place here seems to be swarming; I have been obliged to include in it nearly all the young musicians, a few only excepted, who have visited me; they like and praise Gluck and Handel, and everything that is good, and always speak of it, and yet what they write is thoroughly worthless and wearisome; of the second-class, the examples are everywhere. As I have said, in the midst of all this, the mere thought of you is cheering, and may heaven allow us to succeed in giving utterance more and more to our wishes and our inmost thoughts, and in maintaining and not suffering to perish whatever is dear and holy to us in Art. You have, beyond a doubt, a great many novelties which you are preparing for the winter; I shall be heartily pleased to hear them. I have completed my third quartet in D major, and like it very much—I only hope it may please you as well! I almost really believe it will, for it is more spirited, and, for the executants also, more thankful than the others, I fancy. I think I shall begin, in a day or two, to write down my symphony, and, in a short time, to finish it, probably here. I should like, also, to compose you a violin concerto for the winter; one in E minor sticks in my head, and the commencement of it leaves me no peace. My symphony shall certainly be as good as I can make it; but whether popular, whether adapted for street-organs, that is something I do not know; I feel that, with every fresh piece, I am getting more and more into the way of learning how to write exactly as my heart feels; and that, after all, is the only standard with which I am acquainted. If I am not made for popularity, I will not gain it by study or effort; or, if you think that wrong, I will say rather I CAN NOT gain it by study. Really, I cannot, and should not like to be able to do so. Whatever proceeds from within, gratifies me, even in its outward effect; and, therefore, I should prize very highly an opportunity of pleasing you and my friends by fulfilling the wish you express—but I can really do nothing of the kind. In my way through life much has fallen to my lot, without my thinking of it, and without my deviating from my course, and the same may, perhaps, be the case now—if not, I will not grumble, but console myself with having done, to the best of my power and judgment, what I could. You take an interest in, and derive some delight from my things, and so do some kind friends: a man should hardly wish for more. Receive a thousand thanks for your good kind words, and for all the friendly things you say unto me!—Yours,

FELIX M. B.

Twilight Fantasies.

A GREAT-ORGAN PRELUDE.

I sat in the Music Hall as evening was coming on. The gray semicircles above grew opaque like porcelain. The light shimmered faintly along the gilded edges of panel and pilaster. Shadows crouched under the light balconies, and then, growing bolder, stole out to meet each other. The sombre magnificence of the organ was not wholly shrouded, although glooms hung over its towers and angel-peopled pinnacles, and its sculptured figures would have been only vague forms, had not my eyes so often followed their exquisite outlines that vision was unnecessary to recall them. I had frequently seen this stupendous work by daylight, had scrutinized in detail the caryatides, lions, griffins, seraphs, singers, the urns, wreaths, busts, viols, masks, and all the ornaments that encrust the front; and now, as from a seat at the foot of the Apollo I could view the whole pile in a single glance, the grand design absorbed every separate feature, subordinated all its various lines, and grouped all its beauties into one splendid constellation. One might almost imagine that the "fabric huge

Rose like an exhalation, with the sound
Of dulcet symphonies and voices sweet."

No sound from the outer world broke upon the perfect stillness within. As I gazed, the divine sense of symmetry, the sense on which Euclid, Copernicus, Newton, Bach, rested, filled me with measureless content. Fainter grew the light; the semicircles above were almost indistinguishable. The organ wore now a dusky, awful front, with only the vague surmise of a line of light along the polished surface of each enormous metal tube. No organist had yet touched the keys. The pomp of Handel's immortal choruses, the oceanic ebb and flow of Bach's themes, the spiritual beauty of Mendelssohn's sonatas, and the all-comprehending majesty of Beethoven, were yet to come. If it were possible now to evoke the spirits of the mighty dead!—to command the Hallelujah Chorus played by its inspired author and sung by choirs of angels!—to bring up all that man has imagined in his most exalted moods, and display the celestial beauty of music free from the imperfections of mortality! I listened, almost expecting a breath from the distant forest of pipes. The silence tingled, throbbed, palpitated. Was it a voice that floated over the dark space to where I sat? Were there sounds from

"airy tongues that syllable men's names"?

These were, indeed, as it seemed to me, audible voices, confused and multitudinous, and mingled now and then with notes of instruments, like the hurly-burly of an orchestral ante-room. No separate word could be recognized, nor any strain of music; but the sound swelled and sank like the far off surges of the sea. When it came nearer strong and manly tones could be distinguished, blended with the softer notes of woman, the sweet prattle of childhood and distant "horns from elfland blowing." For some time I listened to the delightful medley; how long I know not, but can only remember that at length the vague murmurs subsided, as though repressed by a powerful voice that seemed to say:

"Silence, up aloft there! Silence you chattering! One at a time, or I will straighten myself up and topple you all over together!"

It was a voice that might have startled the Erymanthean boar.

A merry sound of laughter ran tinkling down from above, a cascade of melody, and after it, the sweetest of voices asked with provoking archness,

"And which of our two burly Dromios is so impatient? Would he be so naughty, and play Samson? O Hercules, can it be you! You shall go back to Omphale!"

"Yes, my Roman damsel, my pretty Cecilia, it is I," returned the thunderous voice. "My brother, hard-by, is only a dummy, but he has a brawny-shoulder, aye, and an arm! I am—tired—of—this," and there came a yawn as from a drowsy lion—"and I would like even to spin once more at Queen Omphale's feet. 'Lap me in soft Lydian airs' as one of those Britons has it, rather than crush me under this tower."

Here broke in another clear, resonant voice: "But if they would only finish their tortures and give us some music! How can I stand here patiently leaning on my lyre and hear the never-ending drawl of pipes, as Walcker turns the feather edges of sound backwards and forwards razor-wise!"

"What a philosopher our chorister is, to be sure," exclaimed a new and grave voice. "To think of reaching the end by overleaping the means! Life itself is mostly spent in preparation. The play which amuses for an hour cost the actors weeks of study, and taxed the brains of the author for months. The sweetness of Cecilia's song was born out of an agonizing struggle with fierce semitones and rebellious trills. The battle which in an hour settles the destiny of nations is a crisis for which all the elements of nature and all the powers of man were concentrated for a generation. But this dainty chorister of ours, who would reap where he has not sown, would gather where he has not strewed, cannot bear the 'feather edges of tone', and so, forsooth, we must have our registers unharmonized, our punch without sugar, our grapes unripened, our saws!"

"Bach!" screamed the female voice, "don't go on with those odious comparisons! My teeth stand on edge. You know how nervous I am. Even Constantia, our steadfast nun over there, drew in a sharp, thin breath."

"I spare your tender sensibilities, Cecilia, but what are the tortures of tuning and voicing pipes compared with what I shall suffer when once the work is done and the organ is given over to profane hands to be played upon!"

"Profane hands!" exclaimed several voices at once; and that which seemed to be the chorister's continued, "What do you mean by profane hands, Herr Bach? Do you consider it the chief end of man to play your fugues? Did Chaos precede you, and will the end of all things follow you?"

"Don't be unkind to Bach," said the sweet female voice, for although I love music like a girl singing true-love ballads by a brook and he like an astronomer contemplating the spherul harmonies, still I have a great regard for him, indeed I have. He is a glorious old fellow."

"Thank you, Cecilia," replied the grave voice.

"But," she added, "understand me: your organ music is very grand—sometimes a little tiresome, I think, though that, perhaps, is owing to my weak nature that cannot bear the strain of following an idea through a hundred changes and combinations, as in the terrible theorems of those mathematical Greeks. But you treat us singers abominably. You move us like chessmen, and pawns at that; we are bits of shining stone in your mosaic; we are just a flute or oboe added to your orchestra, just another pipe to your organ. And you write for the voice as though it had not a human soul behind it. Your airs are difficult enough, and require intellect to sing them properly, but there is no room for emotion, and the most gifted singer cannot breathe into them one particle of fervor. Melody and harmony revolve about a common centre, like a double star, till they are undistinguishable."

"Brava!" shouted the chorister.

"And I say 'Brava'!" said Bach. "I accept the illustration. Melody and harmony—complementary colors—revolving in eternal beauty together. If I combine forces and think lightly of individuals, does not every leader of orchestras and of armies? Even the great Creator, as he evolves harmony out of discord, does he not strictly subordinate the career of every human actor to His mighty plan?"

"Very well put," said the chorister, "if the human larynx were not a finer instrument than a wooden pipe. If you twist all your strands into one even chain of harmony, why make any difference in them?—why be at the trouble to give one part to a golden tenor, a luscious soprano, a rich basso, when an insensate tube will take up the treadmill theme and play 'tag' with the other parts just as well? Remember that the human voice is the human soul made audible, and it is little less than profanation to treat it as you have done."

"One other thing," said Cecilia, "I wish to suggest; perhaps 'tis a woman's reason, but I believe it moves men just as strongly. You say, my old friend, that the Creator subordinates all actors to His plan. Very true, but then the Creator doesn't let each wayward and wilful creature know it. Each of us felt while in the world a personal freedom of thought and action that was almost godlike. That the Almighty moved us like troops in the dreadful game of war was true, but we thought we were free, nevertheless. But you, Bach, lose no opportunity of showing us singers your mastership. We feel the coils of your serpentine harmonies encircling and crushing us. Your accompaniments surround us, but only touch us in points, like the Punic nails that excoriated the too-honorable Regulus. I like to sing when the glorious fulness of harmony lifts me up, sustains me; then I have the sense of exultation in song, as of a rider borne by a noble horse, as of a boatman rising on the green hills of ocean,—sometimes an awful joy as of a warrior moving on to the fierce clangor of battle. Look and see how your friend Haydn sustains a singer, (though your brain doubles his), how the harmony swells and sparkles but never submerges, how the voice is raised up to an ecstasy! Ah, when I hum over his airs, after having been tangled up with your vermicular perplexities, I feel like an emancipated slave on a morning in spring. The sense of freedom, the joyousness of motion, the glory of brightness, the perfume of flowers, the myriad notes of birds, all possess me with an inexpressible delight."

"I don't wonder the Romans made you a martyr," interposed the chorister; you are so charmingly naive, so rustically enthusiastic, and therefore so fascinating, that, if the polite heathens had spared you, sooner or later you would have turned the augurs into preceptors, the temples into art-galleries, and made the Pontifex Maximus acknowledge you as a saint, on his bended knees."

A clear, silvery voice not heard hitherto, now spoke with a measured accent:

"The music of which the holy Cecilia speaks in such glowing words cannot surely be the music of the higher spheres; she must rather speak from the recollection of her emotions while still in the flesh. The souls that are purified from earthly passion feel none of the unquiet strivings that seem to tremble in the music of mortals. Bach, therefore, serene and self-possessed, reverent and grave, mindful always of the mighty Being to whom all homage is addressed, most fitly represents the composer of the Church, and was born, as I think, to bear the praises of a world up to the Eternal Throne."

"My placid Constantia," replied Cecilia, "you may be right, but it seems to me that others have more purely and more touchingly expressed the sentiment of prayer and adoration, whether of the solitary worshipper or of the multitude in a cathedral. To name no other work, think of the 'Elijah'! Is there not melody, harmony, beauty, devotion? Besides, Bach, as well as Handel, has interspersed long and meaningless roudades in his compositions, which on the score of fitness no one can defend. They are instrumental passages, tiresome to singers, inexpressive, suggested by a prevalent false taste, and will not only die themselves, but will carry into oblivion every work of which they make any large part. But I was thinking of music as living men and women hear and enjoy it, not as it is heard in the realms of the blessed. Here in this Hall we shall see crowds, not only of the common herd, but of the most educated and refined. All of them have bodies as well as souls, have blood instead of colorless ichor, have passions, hopes, fears, desires, aspirations. Their nerves thrill, their temples throb, their bosoms heave, their hearts beat. Here and there is a solitary philosopher, a calm admirer of Beauty and Order and the Fitness of Things; but for every one an hundred thousand emotional creatures who are blind to the Celestial Mechanics and deaf to the Harmonies of the Spheres."

"Let me add a word," said the chorister. The test of vitality in vocal music is that the undulatory sequence of tones contains a melodic idea apart from its accompaniment. "I know that my Redeemer liveth," "Il mio tesoro," "If with all your hearts," "In diesen heil'gen Hallen," and every great, immortal melody for the voice, sings itself, and is not dependent upon its harmonies."

"You speak of my vocal compositions," said Bach, addressing himself to Cecilia, "according to the warmth of your Southern nature. But each nation as well as each individual has a characteristic mode of expressing feeling. In Germany I have often known tears of rapture to fall, as my organ led the devotions of the people; while they would have been only annoyed at the Misereres of your chapels. But, setting that aside, what have you to say about my organ pieces?"

"Let us ask the others," said Cecilia. "We have rather monopolized the conversation thus far. What say you, Hercules?"

"'Tis scarcely worth while to ask me," he answered like a basso profundissimo. "You know I'm an old-fashioned pagan. I have never given in to the new dynasty, and it is the first time I ever upheld anything like worship. But our solemn friend up there has plenty of strength, and is more of a giant in his way than I ever was. I shall feel every fibre in me shake when his youngest scholar begins to trip over the pedals. The other men you have been talking about are mostly thin fellows, I am told, not at all in my way. You should have heard our handsome friend Apollo, over there; he was great on the lyre before he took to killing snakes or had daubed his fingers with medicine. And such a way he had! Jupiter, how the girls followed him!"

"Well, and what say you, sister Constantia?"

"I think Bach's organ music is endless variety in unity, and in his fugues one may hear the always beginning, never ending song of the glorified, the 'forever and ever, Alleluia!'"

And you, my vivacious chorister?—though I warn you against a certain flippancy of speech. You know!"

"I will try to be respectful. If fugues are the alpha and omega of organ playing, then Bach has exhausted the subject, and there is nothing more for any one to do. But I hate fugues, as such. I have heard passages in which the parts come grandly rolling in after each other like waves on the beach; and such passages may be properly introduced to vary and ennoble an organ composition. But a fugue composed with malice prepense,—one part starting off at a sober pace, followed at fixed intervals by another and another around the same circle—a wheel of fugacious porpoises, the awkward snout of one just touching the whisking tail of the other—can any thing be more monotonous!—after a time, I mean. One can bear it a while, even more, can be interested in its complexities, and wonder how the parts ever came together; but when this becomes fatiguing, when the noise redoubles,—deep calling unto deep—and the mixtures scream for mercy, while the unhappy melody is strangled like Laocoon,—what then? Who but clockmakers, or torture-loving inquisitors, or the pachydermata could abide it?"

"How patient you are, Bach," said Cecilia, "to hear these cruel comparisons unmoved!"

"It does not matter," he answered. "I can afford to be as unmoved as our grim neighbors, the Fates. Men are born what they are, and I suppose it is no more than truth to say that there are Bach-ists from the cradle. The chorister is not to blame for not understanding me."

"Precisely, my venerable friend," retorted the chorister, in a lively tone. "You have just hit it. Your music is for the mathematical, the reflective, the self-poised people,—those whose blood never rushes in turbulent streams to play pranks with their evenly-ticking brains; those who can construct cylinders, bristling with myriads of pins, every one of which will hit its predestined tinkler infallibly; those who can solve enigmas and decipher mysteries. These are the people that understand you, and the only ones that like you,—I mean, like you as a composer, for every one respects and admires a man of your prodigious power. You are, to some extent, the fashion, but you are not vain enough to suppose that all who affect to admire you are really able to grapple with any one of your learned, laborious, tormenting fugues. Now why cannot your sincere followers, the real esoteric circle, keep your worship for themselves, and not attempt to impose it upon the vast outside multitude of earnest music-lovers, who for various reasons do not and cannot care any thing about you?"

"And do you agree with this judgment, Cecilia?" asked Bach, gravely.

"Not wholly, although it has most of the elements of truth. I think, my friend Bach, that the interest which centres chiefly in ingenious construction or in learning is not likely to be lasting. A beautiful melody, like a beautiful statue, is for all time; but tastes in regard to harmonic modes and modulations change from age to age. And there can be no question but that in the main the change is for the better. It is so in Art, it is so in Literature, it is so in Social and Political Science. The world moves, my friend, and we must move with it. Besides, remember how the scope of the organ has altered since you touched a key! Think of its vast increase of power, of the new stops, the exquisite imitations of instruments, the quality of tone! Then consider the new mechanical appliances, the swell and diminuendo, and chiefly the pneumatic touch that gives to Psyche's dainty finger the same power with that of Hercules's iron hand.

What a new field is open to the composer as well as to the player! What could you do when you played? Only just what you did. You did not attempt a more brilliant style of music, for you had not the requisite stops, and no human muscles could long control the forces you did have, unassisted by the new invention."

"But you forget that the essential quality of the organ tone is still unchanged," said Bach. "You cannot produce concussion or crispness, nor any other quality on which the pianist prides himself. The legitimate style for the organ is unalterable; nothing else is possible, least of all the frivolity of dancing overtures. And when one of the 'moderns' shall sit down to make my giant caper,—like an elephant in a minuet,—I shall feel like toppling over upon his stupid head."

"You are right again, my venerable friend," said Cecilia. "Leave to the piano-forte all the lightsome gayeties and prettinesses, and let the majestic organ sound only what is worthy of itself."

"But," asked the chorister, "will not these new elements of power and beauty call forth a new genius to employ them? It may be long before a composer comes with an intellect so profound as that of the excellent man whom I like to abuse; but will not the happy hour come, when some inspired writer will give to the world organ music as new, as various, as beautiful, as immortal as Beethoven's symphonies? Mozart had written for orchestra before this stately bronze fellow. Mozart was master of construction, and his head was as full of melody as a hive of bees. But did Mozart exhaust the symphony and establish his own works for all time? On the contrary, the world is forgetting all but one or two of them as fast as it can, and Beethoven reigns supreme. Will there come a Beethoven for the organ?"

"Will there come—Will there—Who calls upon the oracle?" asked Hercules, sadly sleepy. "I never did much in that way (muttering), only a day or so at Dodona or Delphos when the majores had an adventure in hand. Ask the Fates; they know. What say you, grim sisters! Is there to be any Beethoven for the organ? I hope so, for my part, and then they'll take away this hulking fellow who will stand in my light. What business has he in our way, I should like to know?"

"The oracles are dumb," said Cecilia. "Let us hope the Fates are kindly, although they have lost the power of prophecy."

"Sister Cecilia," said the gentle voice of the nun, "how you mix up truth and fable! I am afraid you were not purged from all heathenish dross."

"I love the Beautiful and the Good, sister Constantia, and I care not where I find them. But let us keep clear of this field of brambles, and call upon Beethoven for his opinion."

"Agreed!" "Excellent!" "Capital!" said several voices.

"Beethoven, most illustrious!" said the chorister.

"Answer, great priest of music!" thundered Hercules.

"My great countryman, Beethoven!" said Bach.

"Beethoven, the all-revered, all beloved!" said Cecilia, persuasively.

"Beethoven!" called the boy-cherubs from the tower tops, and then sounded their horns.

"Beethoven! Beethoven!" all shouted in chorus.

"Call him louder. You all forget your idol is deaf," said the chorister.

Silvery peals of laughter rang. Voices arose in murmurs, gently and then louder. Words grew inarticulate and echoed confused through the space. Organ pipes sounded. Turmoil grew momentarily. There was a shock, a pause, a stillness, an illumination. I rubbed my eyes. Prudent Mr. Walcker was doing a little night work to be ready for the great "opening." It was nine o'clock, and I had slept two hours.

Music Abroad.

Paris.

The correspondent of the London Musical World, writes, Sept. 24:

Meyerbeer, I understand, is at length inclined to forego his repugnance, and to allow the long-talked-of Africaine to be produced at the Grand Opera. Some people think that Mdlle. Tietjens has been the cause of this sudden change in his resolution; and, in fact, it is well known that the gratification which the great composer felt when he heard and saw her in the Huguenots surpassed all he expected. I myself think there is much truth in this rumor, although nothing is certain. The principal character in the Africaine, as you are aware, was written, or at all events, adapted, for Mdlle. Sophie Cruvelli (Madame La Baronne Vigier), and when she retired from the stage, Meyerbeer was obliged to lay aside his opera for want of a heroine. For years he has waited patiently but anxiously, and no prima donna has been found in the most remote degree capable of sustaining the principal personage of his new work, until now, when Mdlle. Tietjens seems to have stepped on the boards of the Opera, as though on purpose that the long-deferred masterpiece of the greatest living dramatic composer should be given to the world. Mdlle. Tietjens is not re-engaged at the Grand Opera, but I feel certain will be if the lady be willing.

Of actual news I can find you little. The Opera goes on in its old-fashioned way, ringing the changes on the Trouvère, the Huguenots, La Juive and other well-used works in the operatic department, and Diabolina (for the farewell performances of Mdlle. Mourawief), Le Marché des Innocents and Le Diable à Quatre in the ballet. Madame Penco, whose debuts at the Opera seem to have been most successful, is rehearsing the Favorita, and will subsequently appear in the Trouvère and Huguenots. Her performance of Valentine in Meyerbeer's opera will, I greatly fear, succeed too closely to that of Mdlle. Tietjens to be pleasant. A new ballet is in rehearsal for the debuts of Mdlle. Boschetti, and the Moïse of Rossini is in active preparation. The Italian Theatre will open with Lucia or Rigoletto, when the celebrated "malediction" tenor, Signor Fraschini, will make his first appearance at Paris. M. Bagier has engaged Mdlle. Lumley, a mezzo-contralto and contralto, for the Operas at Paris and Madrid. At the Theatre-Lyrique they are hussing themselves with the rehearsal of Hector Berlioz's Troïens, to which the arrival of Madame Charton-Demeur from Baden, crowned with the laurels she had recently won there, has given additional impetus. The utmost curiosity and interest are felt in all circles for Berlioz's opera—for Berlioz is popular with all grades of the community. It would be odd indeed if Hector did not succeed with the "Trojans," and before Paris too. There is something strangely coincidental in this combination of names. The greatest possible pains is being taken with the rehearsals. M. Gounod's new opera, too, is being rehearsed, so that the artists have their hands full, and all is bustle and eagerness behind the scenes.

England.

NORWICH FESTIVAL. The 14th "triennial meeting," (in aid, like all the English musical festivals, of certain respectable and well established charities) began on the 14th of September, and lasted five days, in St. Andrew's Hall, a church-like place in appearance, although not set apart for sacred uses.

Monday evening was devoted to Handel's Judas Maccabæus, with Mlle. Tietjens, Mme. Lemmens-Sherrington, Miss Palmer, Mr. Sims Reeves and Mr. Santley in the principal solos. There was an orchestra of ninety-three instruments, including sixty strings, and a chorus, mainly local, eked out by voices from the London and Cathedral choirs, of seventy-six trebles, sixty altos, sixty-four tenors and seventy-five basses. Mr. Benedict conducted.

Tuesday evening. The second performance was a miscellaneous concert with a vengeance—thirty pieces besides Beethoven's "Pastoral Symphony."

Wednesday morning. Of the third programme the London Musical World's correspondent says:

In point of length, this morning's programme bears a strong family likeness to that of last night, comprising the new oratorio, Joash, a scene from Henry Leslie's Immanuel, a hash of Stabat, Haydn, Pergolesi and Rossini, as a contemporary wittily observes, "on the grocers' principle—"Try our mixed,"—something by "Thouless," whoever Thouless may be, and several other somethings of which more anon. Norwich has always been foremost among the festivals to produce novelties: Spohr's Last Judgment, Cavalry, and Fall of Babylon, to say nothing of Molière's Abraham, and Benedict's Cantata, having been at various times brought forward. Although the subject of Mr. Silas's oratorio—or rather sacred drama (to speak by the card)—is not quite new to your London readers, being the same as that of Mendelssohn's Athalie, I append the argument.

A.C. 878.—THE ARGUMENT.

"Ahasiah, King of Judah, having been killed, his mother, Athaliah, seized upon the crown, and ordered every descendant of King David and her own grandchildren to be destroyed; but Joash, the infant son of the late king, was wonderfully preserved by Jehoshabea, the daughter of King Joram, the sister of Athaliah, and wife of the High Priest, Jehoiada, who stole him from among the king's sons that were slain, and secretly hid him in the temple for six years, where he was brought up and educated by Jehoids, unknown even to his mother Zebiah, who believed that her child had been murdered with the rest." 2 Kings xi, ver. 2 and 3.

"When Joash was seven years old, the High Priest, Jehoiada, informed the Levites that one of the royal house of David still lived, produced the child, and anointed him King, and the people 'clapped their hands, and said, God save the King.' ver. 12.

"When Athaliah heard the noise of the guard and of the people, she was informed that her Jewish subjects were in a state of revolt, and went to the Temple to quell the tumult by her presence. ver. 13.

"And when she looked, behold the king stood by a pillar, as the manner was, and the princes and the trumpeters by the king, and all the people of the land rejoiced and blew with trumpets, and Athaliah rent her clothes, and cried, Treason, treason." ver. 14.

"But Jehoiada the Priest commanded the captains of the hundreds, the officers of the hosts, and said unto them, Have her forth without the ranges: and him that followeth her kill with the sword. For the priest had said, Let her not be slain in the house of the Lord." ver. 15.

"And they laid hands on her; and she went by the way which the horses came into the king's house; and there was she slain. ver. 16.

"And all the people of the land went into the house of Baal, and brake it down; his altars and his images brake they in pieces thoroughly, and slew Mattan the priest of Baal before the altar." ver. 18.

"And Jehoiada made a covenant between him, and between all the people, and between the King, that they should be the Lord's people." 2 Chron. xxiii, ver. 16."

The Sacred Drama of Joash, to be performed for the first time at this Festival, is not modelled after the conventional or conventicle fashion of Oratorio, nor has it been the intention of the Librettist or Composer to make sacred characters of Athaliah, or the Priests of Baal, whereby a greater contrast has been produced with the music allotted to the graver personages in the work.

THE CHARACTERS INTRODUCED ARE:

JEOIADA—High Priest of the Jews. (Bass).
MATTAN—Priest of Baal. (Baritone).
ISHMAEL—Confidant of Jehoiada and Captain of the Levites. (Tenor).
JOASH—The Boy-King, last survivor of the root of Jesse. (Alto).
ZEBIAH—Mother of Joash. (Soprano).
ATHALIAH—Usurper of the throne of Judah. (Soprano).

Chorus of Levites, Priests of Baal, Soldiers, Pagan Maidens, and Jewish attendants.

As I have sat out nearly the whole performance (beginning before twelve and not terminating till after four), I must defer going into any particulars of Mr. Silas's work, and the absurd regulation forbidding any expression of feeling on the part of the audience, prevents my recording what effect Joash had upon its hearers. It must, therefore, be sufficient for present purposes to mention, that the principals, Mdlle. Tietjens, Madame Lemmens Sherrington, Miss Palmer (for whose painfully apparent hoarseness a printed apology was circulated), Mr. Montem Smith, and Mr. Weiss, one and all did their best for the sacred drama; and, should it not succeed in maintaining a place in public estimation, it will not be the fault of its original interpreters. Some of the choruses—(exceedingly ambitious, and by no means easy of execution)—would have been all the better for extra rehearsal, and, should it be my fate to hear Joash again, I hope that a more efficient representative of "Mattan" may be entrusted with the part. The jumble of "Stabat" was a mistake, and to begin with Rossini and finish with Haydn was at once an offence against chronology and good taste. Mdlle. Trebelli sang Miss Palmer's part with the exception of one quartet ("Virgo Virginum").

With Joash as a whole I regret to say that I am disappointed, as I had expected something better from a musician of Mr. Silas's experience. Ambitious in design, and in many points replete with difficulties, the music is generally labored, and, although every resource of the orchestra is employed, the result is ineffective. The instruments of percussion and heavy brass are made use of liberally, while the voices and executive powers of soloists and chorus are taxed to the utmost, and with a result not always grateful to hearers or singers.

Wednesday evening another miscellaneous concert, with over thirty numbers, including Spohr's Symphony in D, numerous selections from Mozart's operas, and from young Arthur Sullivan's "Tempest" music, &c., &c.

Thursday morning was devoted to Mendelssohn's Elijah, and Thursday evening to another miscellaneous concert, in which the principal feature was a new Cantata, Richard Cœur de Lion, by Benedict. In order to introduce a female character, the old legend of Richard was altered by the author of the words of the Cantata, as follows:

"On his return from the third Crusade, Richard Cœur de Lion was cast away near Aquila, on the Italian coast. This obliged him to travel through the dominions of Leopold of Austria, who was his bitter personal enemy, in consequence of a dispute which had taken place at the siege of Ptolemais, of Acre. His pilgrim's disguise was not sufficient to prevent his recognition and seizure in the neighborhood of Vienna. He was carried as a prisoner to the Castle of Durrenstein, on the Danube. The Emperor Henry VI., who was also a personal enemy of Richard, when he heard of this, demanded that he should be transferred to his custody, on the ground that he only had a right to keep a King-captive in his dominions. Thus he was brought to Trifels, tried at Hagenau before an assembly of German princes, and his ransom fixed at 150,000 marks of silver, about £300,000 of our present money, on payment of which he was liberated. In an age of romance, however, such a denouement was deemed unsatisfactory, and a legend was invented more consistent with the chivalrous character of the English King. He was found by his faithful minstrel Blondel, who had long sought him in vain by going the rounds of the castles of Germany. One day, Blondel found himself in the wild valley of Armweiler, under Trifels, and expected from the extent of the works, that it must be an important place.

"So he went into the woods to reconnoitre, and in order to attract the country people about him, that he might question them, sang a song to his lute. He told the company of herdsmen that collected to hear him many a strange tale of foreign lands, and as he was talking, he saw that a maiden present hung on his words with marked attention whilst a shade of sadness passed by fits over her usually smiling face. He asked whether the castle was inhabited, and whether his music might not earn him a handsome welcome there.

"He was told that no one was suffered to approach the castle, since some distinguished prisoner was brought there one night; that it was strongly watched, and commanded by a seneschal reported incorruptible. Then he examined the fair maiden apart as to the cause of her sadness. She confessed she had heard a song similar to one of Blondel's at a window of the castle, and seen the outline of a noble form in the darkness; that, led by curiosity, she had gone to the place again, and had been seen by the prisoner, who spoke to her in friendly tones, and begged her to come again and gladden his loneliness with the sound of her sweet voice. Blondel then suspects that it is Richard, and the next evening is guided to the window by the shepherd-maid Matilda; sings part of a stave, to which Richard replies; gives notice to his men at arms, who are in ambush in the woods below the castle, who tie their horses to trees, bridge over the moat with timbers taken from the wood, beat down the gate, overpower the guard, and free Richard, who, when he has once a sword in his hand, easily effects the rest for himself.

"The place of his confinement was unknown to the other princes of Europe, but according to a legend long accepted as true, it was ultimately discovered by the King's minstrel, Blondel de Neale, who wandered through many lands, playing one of Richard's favorite songs at every castle in his way, till at last he heard the welcome response of the royal captive. The story thus told affords no opportunity for the employment of the female voice, so the author of the words of the Cantata has ventured to represent that the Castellan had a daughter, who became violently enamored of the imprisoned King, but was ignorant of his rank. He has also assumed that the common German belief in supernatural "white ladies" extended to the castle, which is the scene of action in the story. Matilda, the Castellan's daughter, hearing the project of Blondel, promises to assist him in the liberation of Richard, and accordingly leads the way into the castle attired as the White Lady, who is the terror of the neighborhood. The guards fly in alarm, and the prisoner escapes, but there is no happiness for Matilda. She has discovered at the interview between Blondel and his master, that the latter is the King of England, already blessed with a Queen, and she determines to pass the rest of her days in religious seclusion."

Of the performers and of the effect of the new work, the correspondent above quoted says:

The principal personages were thus represented: Richard Cœur de Lion, Mr. Santley; Blondel de Neale, Mr. Sims Reeves; Urbain, a Page, Miss Palmer; Matilda, daughter of the Castellan, Mdlle. Tietjens. As I feared, Miss Palmer's singing in the morning had by no means improved her voice, and the hoarseness which had been already sufficiently evident, was more than ever painfully apparent, hence the music of the Page suffered proportionately. Mdlle. Tietjens, too, appeared somewhat husky, which is hardly to be wondered at, considering the enormous amount of fatigue she has undergone throughout a long and trying season, to say nothing of her recent performances at Paris (not to mention Worcester), and thus the by no means easy scene which introduces Matilda, although delivered with marvellous energy, did not procure all the effect of which it is capable. "En revanche," Messrs. Sims Reeves and Santley sang nobly, the elegant and beautiful song of the former, "I wander in search of a treasure," and the no less charming air, "May is into prison cast," both creating an immense impression.

In the first scene of Richard, "My sight can pierce through prison walls" (where the usual arrangement is inverted, the slow movement following instead of preceding the allegro), Mr. Santley's superb voice and impassioned delivery evoked a furor of applause, and most deservedly so, for more magnificent singing was certainly never heard. Of the Cantata as a whole I can speak in terms of unqualified praise; indeed, it was only to be expected that Weber's most accomplished pupil would produce a work in every way worthy the composer of the Gipsy's Warning, The Brides of Venice, The Crusaders, and The Lily of Killarney, by no means forgetting Undine, and if I do not like Richard quite as well as the last named, it is the fault of the subject rather than the treatment, inasmuch as the real is incapable of affording as much scope to the imagination as the ideal. The reception of the Cantata was enthusiastic.

The Festival ended on Friday with the "Messiah."

BOSTON, OCT. 17, 1863.

The Great Organ in the Boston Music Hall.

The long expected opening is announced. Six solid months of labor,—carpenters, riggers, painters, carvers, gas-men, busily and pleasantly coöperating with Herr organ-builder Walcker Junior and his four men from Würtemberg,—have slowly, thoroughly and surely, under the patient inspiration of a perfect plan, such as admits of nothing slighted, nothing less but rather all more than it seems, thus lifting the details of handicraft up to a dignity of ideal Art, at length put together, in all the wonderful complexity of the internal mechanizing and speaking parts, this latest masterpiece of organ-building skill, and housed them in with unique and becoming architectural grandeur. There stands the work, a structure so imposing, so full of matter to be studied out, of various meaning to be felt in various moods, and much only in the deepest mood, that it already looks as if it belonged to the ages, as if it had grown up with the whole history of Music and of Man.

And six months, after all, was not so very long a time for putting permanently in its place (besides almost preparing the place for it) a work which had already cost full seven years, a good Sabbatical period, in the conception and construction of its innumerable parts. Whoever saw the vast, bewildering chaos in that Hall, after this strange freight of the Dutch bark Presto was unpacked there, filling floor and corridors, while scaffolding and staging ran like spider webs all over walls and ceiling;—and afterwards, when the organ proper, the internal works, had grown together so far as to require the body to be builded round all that it was and was to be, the farther and still stranger chaos of massive columns, arches, capitals, gigantic figures, human and semi-human, cherubs, muses, ornamental carvings of all kinds, that seemed to multiply as they were brought to light, like the loaves and fishes, and as if there were many times too many of them to find room in any possible structure that should fill the whole end of the Hall,—whoever had seen this could not but feel oppressed with a certain nervous fear that order and completeness never could come safely out of it. But “now Chaos ends, and Order fair prevails.” “Now”—presently, first Monday of next month—“the first of days appears.”

But there is still much to be done before the night of the Inauguration. Only by strong will and great exertions, can the mighty instrument be got ready to speak to us with all its voices at the early date which the heroic faith of builders and Directors has appointed. The delicate and patient work of tuning goes on, and must for weeks go on, all day long and far into the nights; from five to six thousand pipes are not to be taught their true pitch in a hurry. It can and will be done, however, if no accident occurs, and now all things appear to work together to that speedy consummation. The persevering, earnest work, the continual looking of difficulties in the face and grappling with them till they yielded, has brought the thing to that rewarding point where providential solutions of problem after problem are continually appearing in happy and unlooked for ways, where little mountains lift themselves aside, and hopeless blanks are filled by inspirations; when the right thought, the right word, the right man, the muse herself, comes at the right time, though not perhaps a moment sooner; and so there is a safe, a right artistic sort of feeling that all will go through, better even than we know how to desire. The night accordingly is fixed; the seats arranged and numbered; the invitation has gone out; thousands will respond to it, and eagerly pay the unusual, although really small price for the unique occasion, thereby adding their mite each to the Organ Fund, which, liberal as it was, must long ere this have shrunk within the measure of the requirements of so costly and so grand a work of Art, a work to stand for culture and for inspiration to this people. The programme, too, has shaped itself out of the elements and after the idea, essentially, which we have in a former article suggested; that is, the music, wholly of the Organ, will be significant of the occasion, representative of the great organ composers, with Bach at their head, and suggestive of future uses of the instrument; but of the details we may not yet speak. And providentially again, even the Ode, a task from which more than one poet, with too little faith, had turned away reluctantly, has come of itself, mysteriously, anonymously, a most happy inspiration (they say, who have read it), due only, until we know more, to the Organ; and Miss Charlotte Cushman cheerfully consents to come here and recite it. Thus nothing will be wanting.

All this is suddenly so near at hand, that we must now commence the task, however impossible it seems, of giving our readers some detailed description of the Organ, both of its outside and its contents, both as it looks and as it works and sounds. The difficulty of all description has not grown less, but has kept fatally increasing as we have become more and more nearly acquainted with the instrument. Studying it part by part and watching the putting of the parts together, step by step, as the great thing grew and became a wondrous whole, was very interesting, to be sure,—almost as good as going to the mountains—and fraught with much instruction to oneself; but one may be so full of a thing, that telling of it becomes too formidable a task; and this is just now our case. Given the problem to describe a world, how would you set about it? And even if we limit a question to the world as it is to you, your world, you will not find it easier. But, hit or miss, we will begin and get through the best way we can, without much choosing of the way, for there is no knowing by what labyrinthine windings, doublings, crossings and digressions such a theme may lead us.

It is perhaps best, however, to begin where all begin who stand for the first time before the completed Organ; try to describe it as it looks, and go behind the curtain afterwards. We take our stand, we will suppose, in the upper balcony near the Apollo, and confront the Organ. We see what we have been accustomed to hear called, in our familiarity with smaller instruments, the “case” of the organ. But this is not one of those cases. An instrument, which in itself combines some 80 or 90 instruments (stops, registers), through all their compass, with nearly 6000 pipes or voices, with all the mechanism for reaching, breathing through and sounding each or all of these at will, for blending them in chords, combining them in larger groups and choirs, contrasting them in pitch, in characteristic quality or tone-color, and in power, for bidding each stop sing with individual expression, for weaving many parts in fugue-like webs of harmony; with its innumerable nicely adjusted little valves, those exact and noiseless little ushers at the door of each pipe to admit the wind, such only as has right of entrance; with its miles of nerves or cords of motion (“trackers”), which, branching off in groups in all directions, crossing each other like net work, turning many corners, to all parts of the instrument, impart the action from the finger on the keyboard to the little usher at the foot of every pipe; with its apparatus for collecting and condensing the wind in a vast reservoir, the airy basis of the whole tuneful fabric, and pouring it through trunks and channels toward all the wind-chests, through whose delicate and curious little chambers it is distributed, not in equal, but in just, in carefully proportioned rations, to the throat of every tiniest or most monstrous singer; with all its curious contrivances for lightening the touch, swelling and diminishing the sound, rolling up a mountainous Crescendo of stop upon stop from a single, softest one to the full force of them all, &c., &c.,—such an instrument is not to be put into a case, but, being built up in the grand proportions of a temple, it has its house built around it. The Germans call it Orgel-gehäuse, organ house, or housing. In a noble instance, like the present, where an artistic inspiration, a unity of idea, a sense of vital correspondence of the inward with the outward presides over and pervades all, the house or outward temple seems rather to have grown up with that which it both hides and reveals, to have risen in its symmetry and grandeur to the music, heard by a fine inner sense, of the organ soul. Nor does the term house do sufficient justice to the beautiful design before us; it is in some sense the body of the Organ, the outward visible embodiment of its interiors;—not to be sure, like the animal or human body, itself composed of organs, but the body of the idea of the Organ, the shadowing forth, by correspondence, of its co-working inner parts and uses, the typifying of all its history and prophecy, as Music itself typifies the whole course and prophecy of Life.—But we have wandered away, we have got lost in the Organ. We come back to our friend in the balcony, and once more begin.

It is our first look: what do we see? Or what do we feel? For a few moments, it is hard to distinguish what we see from what we feel, the cause from the emotion (or in philosopher lingo, object from subject), just as to the new-born babe, or to couched eyes, all objects press upon the retina. What every one has felt on entering the Hall, undoubtedly we feel; a strange shock of surprise and wonder, mingled with a certain awe, at the massive grandeur, the great width and height, the boldness, the sombre shadowiness and glimmering brightness, mingled with an instantaneous sense of the symmetry, and a vague comprehension of the richness in detail, of something nearly filling the whole stage end of the Hall and completely filling us. We are at mid-height of it—of the mainmass, though parts soar higher. All of it above us shines with a pure, liquid silvery sheen, while all below frowns dark and massive, yet with shapes of beauty, faces gracious, stern or grotesque, glimpsing through the shades; a contrast and a complement like rugged shore and shining water, or like the world still in the arms of Night as day dawns, and Day triumphant shining onward from above. It tempts out all our faculties to search the whole front over, to read the parts and phases of a whole so quickening and commanding, to analyze it and then recombine it mentally, until we see all the details virtually in the whole, as clearly as when each arrested the eye singly. But first we note the materials of the great contrast; the lower half, in shadow, is in carved black walnut, massive, sombre, bold, exaggerated (in strict truth to nature) in some features, fixed, strong, Atlas-like and bent in slavery; the silvery sheen above is that of organ pipes, great, splendid ones, of burnished pure tin, grouped in towers, or ranged in gleaming fields, upheld at the sides at intervals by springing shafts and pilasters, clipped round above by a floating ribband outline (all of black walnut), that undulates across the whole upper front, while domes and figures, shooting upward almost to the ceiling, crown the towers: all graceful, airy, light, free, winged, heavenward.

Now, if we ask the size of the great structure, it is about 50 feet in width. In depth the two projecting central towers come forward 18 feet upon the stage, the wings falling back towards two smaller end towers, making an average depth of 12 feet; but furthermore, the recess behind the stage, which held the old organ and had room to spare, is also filled by the great wind works and the Swell department of the Organ, an area full 10 feet square. In height, from platform to the summits of the towers, it measures 60 feet, while the wind works and their machinery behind go far below the platform. (The full height of the Hall, from floor to ceiling, is 65 feet, its full width 78, and its length 180). The weight of the Organ is from 60 to 70 tons.

Now to understand the symmetry, the bold beauty, the fascination of the front, we begin to note its general form and outline, the distribution of the parts, the balance and relation of the masses. We know no architectural technicalities, and know no art, no best way or order to present in words an image of what must be seen all at once, at least in picture, to be comprehended; but we may suggest things which will lead some to go and see for themselves. What stands out boldest, what strikes first, are two great towers each side of the centre, guarding the arched recess, within which gleam the white rows of the key-boards, and the bright knobs of the draw-stops, and where sits the organist—grandly sheltered and encompassed, grandly overlooked, as we shall see—will he not approach his task with noble pride and reverence! In the fore-front of the base of each tower, a colossal caryatid, a very Hercules in figure, with immense arms and swelling muscles, monstrous, Michel-Angelesque, exaggerated and yet true, uplifted, with the huge full-veined hands crossed over his old head, bent, with earnest, groaning face, beneath the weight of the heavy cornice, on which rest, with tapering feet, the smooth, shining columns of three giant pipes, belonging to the 32 feet sub-bass, and measuring from 16 to 18 inches in diameter. The two old giants differ only in the particular, that one has both hands under the folds of drapery that fall back from his head, while the other has one hand out. The horizontal line of their enormous elbows, boldly projecting, seems to put great, heavy, one might say Websterian eyebrows upon the Olympian front of the whole work, making it with might and grandeur. This personal giant, Hercules, or Atlas, (he reminds one of Schubert's song to Heine's words: "Ich unglückseliger Atlas!" Ah me, unfortunate Atlas! groaning under the weight of the whole world), is flanked on either corner by a caryatid with a lion's head, emblem also of strength, whose protruded breasts and dwindling herma figure downwards give to the whole base the outline of an immense lyre. From these giant bases of the two towers the dark lower front falls back with graceful curve, on each side, to a straight line and completes its width with two female caryatides, of the old classic or Egyptian style, which, flanked each pair by another looking off in profile from the end, form the support of a lighter end tower, of charming Campanile form, square and slender, formed by graceful, richly carved pilasters with Corinthian capitals, each sustaining two great shining pipes, one in front and one on the side or end. The faces of these six caryatid women are grandly Sybilline and bold, somewhat exaggerated (purposely) like all the emblems of the shadowy lower part. If you look closely, you will find that the "sisters three" at one end (to your left), are bitter cold and stern, "stony-eyed Fates," as our friend well has called them; while the other three have smiling, gracious, almost playful, witty faces. This may have been merely meant for quaintness and for contrast. But we may think of them as relentless Fates, and as appeased Eumenides, according to the old poetic mythology. When you go inside of the work you will discern a correspondence; the pipes of the "Great" organ, the more earnest part, are planted at the end where the stern ones keep watch, while at the other end the "Solo" organ, with its seductive fancy stops, resides.

The intervals between the towers are marked off into rich panels, filled with bas-reliefs of most elaborate carving, each of exquisite design and execution. They are mostly groups of musical instruments, masks, laurel wreaths, &c., depending from a lion's mouth overhead to almost your feet, as you stand before them, no two groups alike, and every instrument studied out and reproduced in all its individuality. At middle height in each group is enframed a tablet of black marble, bearing in gold letters the name of some great composer. Eight of these representative great names appear upon the front; in the central recess, each side of the organist, the names of Palestrina and Orlando Lasso; outside of the great towers those of Handel, Haydn, Gluck, Mozart, Mendelssohn and Cherubini. BACH and BEETHOVEN speak for themselves bodily. The former, in a noble portrait bust, larger than life-size, looks out from the central window of his "huge house of the sounds," just at the foot of the pipes, surmounting the arch and triangular pediment above the key-boards (or Claviatur, as they are collectively called by the Germans.) There he presides, the Master, an inspiration, an example, or a warning to any organist who takes his seat there. Just in front of the centre, helping to seclude the player in desirable and fit impersonality, raised on a pedestal before the arch, on the front line of the giant tower bases, stands Crawford's statue of Beethoven, just in the fore-front and focus of all this grandeur and this beauty, and forming a still more complete, significant poetic whole with it, the rich golden bronze relieved, as it never has been before, against the sombre background, and the intense concentration of brain and intellect in the noble head and face, the regal earnestness and repose in the whole form and action of the figure, more than overcoming the disadvantage of mere mass, as seen between two giants. A king may walk between two huge gens d'armes, or elephants, and look none the less a king.

We would it were possible for us to describe the beauty of that central recess about the key-boards. You must step up to it, to feel the perfect beauty of its form and detail. Rich groups of flowers and instruments on each side, as before observed; decking the pilasters, which include the Claviatur—itself most curiously beautiful—a round-surfaced arch, which appears twined together out of exquisitely carved acanthus leaves, crossed at intervals by broad bands of flat surface, well relieved against the foliage; looking out from the summit of the flowery arch, in bas-relief, a female head, with mouth wide open, singing. It has hardly so ideal, so reposeful and divine an expression as we would see there; but it has quaintness; it belongs still to the lower shadowy region, you observe, and has exaggeration; has a startled, wild Cassandra look. For heavenly peace, for Muses, for divinity and joy and freedom, for the realized aspirations, harmonies and final ends of history, we must look up to the realm of Light.

We have left ourselves no room to do it, but must break off here. We have one more opportunity before the Inauguration, when we hope not only to complete this poor description of the Organ house, but also to take the reader inside, and give some view of its musical resources, of its mechanism, with a catalogue raisonné of all its Stops, their powers and qualities.

Organ Opening in Bedford St.

Our columns have already contained a description of the Organ. Enough now, in our want of room, to place here the more precise statement which was printed on the invitations.

This large Organ, just completed by E. and G. G. Hook, of this city, for the First Church, Boston (Bedford Street), ranks in size among the best in the city.

It is arranged in two parts, showing a beautiful stained-glass window in the centre.

The case is of Black Walnut, of Gothic design, harmonizing with the architecture of the Church, each division showing two gabled fronts, with pipes of burnished metal.

Great Manual.—Double Open Diapason, 16 feet, 58 pipes. Open Diapason, 8 feet, 58 pipes. Std.

Diapason Bass and Melodia, 8 feet, 58 pipes. Viola di Gamba, 8 feet, 58 pipes. Principal, 4 feet, 58 pipes. Twelfth, 2-3 feet, 58 pipes. Fifteenth, 2 feet, 58 pipes. Mixture, 4 ranks, 232 pipes. Trumpet, 8 feet, 58 pipes.

Swell Manual.—Bourdon Bass and Bourdon Treble, 16 feet, 58 pipes. Open Diapason, 8 feet, 46 pipes. Std. Diapason, 8 feet, 58 pipes. Dulciana, 8 feet, 46 pipes. Principal, 4 feet, 58 pipes. Violin, 4 feet, 58 pipes. Mixture, 2 ranks, 116 pipes. Hautboy, 8 feet, 58 pipes. Trumpet, 8 feet, 58 pipes.

Choir Manual.—Open Diapason, 58 pipes. Std. Diapason Bass and Std. Diapason Treble, 8 feet, 58 pipes. Dulciana, 8 feet, 58 pipes. Harmonic Flute, 4 feet, 58 pipes. Clarinet, 8 feet, 58 pipes.

Pedale.—Double Open Diapason, 16 feet, 27 pipes. Double Dulciana, 16 feet, 27 pipes.

The opening (on Tuesday evening) attracted a large crowd and was quite edifying. Messrs. LONG, WILLCOX and BANCROFT handled the organ with much skill and taste, and the singing by Miss HOUSTON and the Choir gave real pleasure. So did the Organ itself. It has great power for its size. All its stops are good; and some, the flute, the clarinet, the hautboy, are exquisitely voiced, and the two latter remarkably well discriminated. A tremulant in the Swell, (which affected a reed stop in Mr. Willcox's French piece) was singularly beautiful and not too much of it. The programme was:

1.—Dedictory Choral, "Ein Feste Burg," (Luther. B. J. Lang.—2.—a. Offertrium. In B. b. Improvisations. Edward Batiste.) J. H. Willcox.—2.—Larghetto, (Spohr.) Old South Church Choir.—4.—Prelude and Fugue. In C. (Bach.) B. J. Lang.—6.—"I know that my Redeemer liveth," (Handel) Miss Houston.—6.—a. Cantabile from Mendelssohn, b. Fugue. (Novello.) S. A. Bancroft.—7.—a. Andante from Organ Sonata No. 6. (Mendelssohn.) b. Fugue "Et Vitam," from Mass in D. (Righini.) J. H. Willcox.—8. Benedictus and Gloria, from Second Mass. (Mozart.) Old South Church Choir.—9.—Flute Concerto, Allegro, (Rink.) B. J. Lang.—10.—"America," "Our Country 'tis of thee."

BROOKLYN, N. Y., Oct. 2.—The musical season is fairly begun again, and if you wish, we shall be happy to drop you a line once in a while, as the man said to the fishes. The programme opened last week with a night of German Opera at the Academy of Music. Mr. Anschütz has a number of new artistes in his troupe, and brought out Der Freischütz with much éclat, and to the delight of a very large audience. The Orchestra and chorus were particularly good.

Our "Philharmonic" began its Seventh Season with the first rehearsal last Wednesday afternoon. The "Academy" was brilliant with the beauty and fashion of our quiet and charming city; all more than pleased to have the delightful rehearsals resumed. (It is a fact that much flirting is done to the fascinating rhythm of the beautiful music, which so inspires the bright eyes of the fair listeners, that the result can't be helped. "Please do not converse during the music," is to be printed on the rehearsal programmes, and then we shall see—what we shall see.)

The orchestra as usual numbers fifty, and comprises the best available talent, under the energetic leadership of Mr. NOLL, with Mr. THEODORE EISEL as Conductor of the Season. The following pieces were rehearsed:

Symphony in A minor, "Recollections of Scotland." Mendelssohn.
Overture, "Ruins of Athens," (first time)..... Beethoven.
Overture, "Jubel."..... Weber.

The Symphony is a great favorite here, and was performed during the season of 1861 with much acceptance. You, who know it so well, will agree with the good taste of the subscribers who wish to hear it again.

The first concert will take place the last Saturday evening of this month (the 31st.) with Miss CLARA LOUISE KELLOGG, vocalist; Mr. HENRY APPEY, violinist; and Mr. EBEN, flutist, as soloists. The subscription list is already larger than last year, and a brilliant season is anticipated. The directors have not raised the price of subscription (although the N. Y. society is up to $6), and also continue to issue season tickets to the profession at $3, which places this important privilege within the means of every student and lover of the divine art in our midst. Brooklyn is of itself a charming city, as aforesaid, but its possession of a permanent Philharmonic Society enhances it wonderfully as a place of residence to people of good taste.

We are to have Maretzek's Italian Opera every Thursday evening, beginning on the 14th with Rigoletto, Kellogg, Sulzer, Mazzolini, Barilli and Colletti taking the parts. If it is as well done as at the N.Y. house, it will be sustained, not otherwise, as the failures of last season proved.

The "Park Theatre" is something new and pretty here. It has been open only a month. This week's attraction is the comic opera of "John of Paris." It has to go on two legs, however, as a soprano and tenors do all the singing. The "Park" orchestra is small, but is gallantly and understandingly led by Mr. I. M. Lorets, a young composer, organist and pianist, possessing much talent, and long a resident of Brooklyn.

Gottschalk is in New York, and has been quite ill of a fever, caused by loss of sleep, and anxiety attendant on the last illness of his brother. His concerts are therefore postponed.

A grand testimonial concert is in progress, to be given in New York, for the benefit of the family of the lamented Wollenhaupt. Poor Wollenhaupt, we saw the title of the very last effort of his musical pen to day at Pond's, and it is called the "Last Smile."

Many other little local items are in mind, but will keep for a while. We have written many indifferent gossiping musical letters in our day, and were last known in your paper as Jem Baggs. We like our first name better, and with your permission will hereafter be again a SEVEN OCTAVE.

PHILADELPHIA, OCT. 10.—I am moved to send you a few lines about Piano Teachers and their Pupils by the appearance of a new book: "The Art Principle and its Application to the Teaching of Music." By ANNA JACKSON. Philadelphia: Frederick Leybold, 1863."

If there were no other reason to be thankful for the advent of October, the mere fact that its cool nights preclude open parlor windows would make it the most glorious of months. To be interrupted in some pleasing fancy, or awakened from delightful reverie, by music, is grateful when the music is good. If you like it, you can stop and listen. If not, you can go further.

This would answer in the winter. But how, during the warm evenings, when from every second window there gushes a melodic stream of what by itself were bad enough, but which, when heard at the same time with the strains issuing from neighboring houses, is ten thousand times worse? If you escape the young lady who sings "No one to love," in such style, that you at once conclude you have found some one to hate, you do not know what next awaits you. You can but flee from bad to worse.

It is long since I have found it worth my while to stop to listen to music. I could easily name the half dozen houses in our city whose musicians (amateurs, of course) deserve the honor. Walking home late at night, I have found, in front of such, a group of attentive listeners, who would get as near to closed shutters as they could, and stand, for an hour or two, trying to catch the sounds as they forced their way through. And, though the night was bitter cold, and the season midwinter, I have stood there too, uncharitable enough, at such times, to wish that the outside audiences might change places with certain of the in-door auditors, who, I am sure, would not have gone so far for the sake of hearing good music as we.

Now, if good players were plenty, if there were but one tolerable performer to every hundred pianos in this city of brotherly love, there would be about ninety-nine times as many good pianists as we now have.

And why are there so few who learn while there are so many who profess to teach? One reason is, that music is cultivated as an accomplishment, (using the word in its modern, society sense) as part of the outward gilding or lacquer necessary to shine in the world of fashion. For the same reason that they are taught to dance, many learn to play. It is for this that teachers have pupils entrusted to them; not because of talent or love of music. That such should either learn nothing or, at best, acquire mere manual dexterity, is not surprising. They start without the first requisites of the musician. They give themselves no trouble to acquire what a teacher, anxious to earn his reward, would willingly impart to them. If other reasons are sought, they can be found in the musical ignorance of most parents, and the false requirements of those who prescribe the fashionable music-treatment. And then, there is a great dearth of thorough teachers. Nine-tenths of the profession fall in with existing evils, and, instead of opposing, seek to find their reckoning in them.

While such a state of affairs obtains, art-development must, of necessity, be slow, since the music teacher is the only agent whose exertions can bring about the much desired improvement in the musical status of our people. To quote: "We urge then that the difficulties can be met only by the work of the teacher upon himself, and then, through him, upon his pupils and those influenced by them."

The music-teacher's life is certainly no pleasanter than it need be. Ask him or her, if an artist, and learn that it has more crosses and fewer pleasures than any other. Here the reader will say, "The old story. Every one thinks his fate worse than his neighbors." Perhaps the reader is right. For, if poets and musicians have sufferings unknown to the world, they also have joys of which the world is ignorant. But, then, they have nerves so delicate and sensitive, that one might think they lay bared, and watch lest, in their ignorance, every-day folks should inflict unheard of tortures.

There are rare individuals who, with poetic appreciation, innate love of art and that quickness of perception common to all artistic natures, unite the energy and the unflagging industry that alone achieve results. To have such for pupils, rewards the teacher for much drudgery. The hour with such is gladly extended. Its pleasures more than compensate for the disgust provoked by the musical cipher of the next hour, or the sadness caused by the indolent pupil, who, though gifted with a musical organization, lacks application, and would fain reach the pinnacle without climbing the rocks.

To Miss Anna Jackson, authoress of the little book before me, are due the thanks of the earnest of the profession, for a well-timed word on an all-important subject. Her suggestions are sensible; her hopes, such as all lovers of art would gladly see realized. Her work should be in the hands of every music teacher and every art student, until its truths become as part of his faith. Then, let him inculcate them by precept, and confirm them by his actions, as he loves truth and his art.

MILWAUKEE, OCT. 5.—Musical matters are very "quiet" at present, if we except the inevitable "Gift concerts" incident to the season. The first strictly musical entertainment of the Fall season, came off last week. The 122d Monthly Concert for members of the Musical Society, had an unusually large attendance, notwithstanding the disagreeable nature of the weather, (thermometer 90°), and was made the occasion of introducing upon the stage one or two new acquisitions of the society, who acquitted themselves with much credit. The concert opened with the overture to "Midsummer Night's Dream," by Mendelssohn. With a few exceptions, the entire orchestral force did their whole duty, in this as well as subsequent pieces, prominent among which was the Andante and Scherzo from Beethoven's Second Symphony.

Mr. E. NETMANN, in former years an active member of the Society, having recently again taken up his abode among us, delighted the audience by singing Schubert's "Wanderer." I but express the apparently unanimous sentiment of the audience in hoping that the singer will again favor us with a song at the next concert of the Society.

A quartet by Mendelssohn, sung by Messrs. ABEL and NIEDERKORN, and Misses CAVANAGH and BARCOCK, was one of the most pleasant affairs of the evening, notwithstanding the timidity displayed by the ladies, who made their debut, and received an enthusiastic encore. An aria and chorus from "St. Paul" were finely executed, but did not receive much attention, although the words were sung in the English language. The male chorus "On the Rhine," by Kücken, deserves especial mention. The various nice shades of the composition were well rendered, and pleased the audience very much. On the whole, the concert furnished another proof of the ability of Prof. ABEL, the Society's Director, in his unceasing labors for the success of classic music in this busy city.

Duett. On the banks of fair Ilisso. (Dell' Ilisso sul le sponde).
Romance. Ione, now a sad farewell. (O Ione, di quest anima). 25

The opera Ione has been one of the recent "sensations" in Europe, and will, probably, be extensively given, during the coming season, in America. The scene is laid in Pompeii, the time commencing a few days before the destruction of that place. The Brindisi, or drinking song, sung by Glaucus in the tavern of Burbo, and the last romance, "Ione, now a sad farewell," also sung by Glaucus, are fine tenor or baritone songs. The second piece, sung by the rescued slave Nidia, the Cavatine by Ione, indeed all, are of a high order, and amateurs would do well to get the pieces, in anticipation of hearing them in public performance.

Instrumental Music.

- Gen. Gilmore's grand march. A. Baumback. 35
A very brilliant composition, and not difficult.
Cottage Waltz. For Guitar. F. A. Wurm. 25
Cousin et Cousine (Two Cousins). Schottische Elegante. J. Egghard. 40

This piece with a neat name, will be found to be elegant and pleasing.

- Vier Clavierstücke. (Four piano pieces). Otto Dresel. 75

Mr. D's scrupulous delicacy of taste will not allow a composition, even his own, to be performed or published, unless it is of a high order.

- The "Slumber Song," (Schlummerlied), is most exquisite.

- FIVE THOUSAND MUSICAL TERMS.—A complete dictionary of Latin, Greek, Hebrew, Italian, French, German, Spanish, English, and other Words, Phrases and Signs used in music. By John S. Adams. 50

As the teaching and playing season has again commenced, those who have not purchased the above very useful work, will now have an opportunity. That person must be an accomplished linguist indeed, who can understand all the terms in use in music books. Open this dictionary almost anywhere, and you will see about half a dozen terms which you never saw before, but any one of which you may meet in the next book on music you read, or the next foreign piece you play.

ADALBERT GYROWETZ.

(Concluded.)

CHAPTER XII.

His Kapellmeistership in Vienna.—His Operas.—Rapidly and number of his compositions.—Ancient old age.—His notes and diaries.—Last tribute to his memory.

Gyrowetz was Kapellmeister from 1804 to 1827—twenty-three years. During this time he produced 26 operas and operettas, and composed or arranged the music for over 40 ballets. In the large quarto indexes to the Leipziger Mus. Zeitung, more than two columns are devoted to Gyrowetz and his works, and his history as Kapellmeister can be very well followed in the pages of that finest of musical periodicals ever published.

The first trial of his powers as an operatic composer in Vienna was in the 3 act opera "Seliko," brought out Oct. 30, 1804. During the rehearsals his patience was severely tried, many of the singers forming a party in favor of Weigl, and Gyrowetz was forced to apply to Baron Braun to bring them to order. The composer was strict and determined to rule as he had the right to do. Some of the singers he learned had remarked: "We will tame him, he shall become as mild and patient as a lamb," and their efforts to effect this brought him several times to the point of resigning. But Braun supported him, and by degrees he gained the general good will—or at least the appearance of it. As to "Seliko," the text was poor and the success of the composer was not brilliant. A part of the audience called him out, another part expressed dislike. At the third performance few were present.

The correspondent of the journal above named says: "It would be wrong not to allow Gyrowetz's music many good qualities. Much originality or great strength is not to be found; but on the other hand a careful and studied work is there, successful characteristic passages occur and a rich instrumentation, of which the really fine overture is an example. The faults which may justly be charged upon him are the two frequent use of the wind instruments, often covering the voices; too little regard for brilliancy in the vocal parts, especially in concerted pieces; and, finally, in the choruses, a want of force and fire. The greatest mistake is in composing so many concerted numbers in succession."

Next came "Mirina," a long melodrama, which is pretty severely criticized by the same correspondent, but which ran a long time, and its composer was always called out. The music must have pleased the public, though not the "appreciative few." It was revived in 1826 but with no great success.

"Agnes Sorel," which followed in December (?) 1808, ran the rounds of the German opera houses, and twenty-five years afterwards was revived in Berlin. Three years afterwards the "Augenarzt" (Oculist) followed, and was sung everywhere.

"Robert, or the Prüfung" (1813), delighted Beethoven to such a degree, that he attended all its representations.

"Herr Gyrowetz's delightfully pleasing, sometimes very touching music, and the splendid working together of the performers, alone sustained the weak production of the poet. Although there are frequent reminiscences from the composer's former works, and from the compositions of other masters [Handel did the same thing repeatedly]—which in the necessary but unlucky haste of composition could not well be avoided—the writer has heard that this, as was the Augenarzt, was written in five weeks—there are far too many beautiful passages to allow, in justice, that which was already familiar to prevent the deserved acknowledgement of the new and beautiful." (L. M. Z., Vol. XV. P. 560).

"Frederica ed Adolfo," an Italian opera (1812) was very successful; so was "Felix and Adele," one of his last works for the stage, (in the chole- ra times, 1831.)—so much so, that he was called out some ten times during the performance, and four times at its close.

In 1818 he was called to Naples, to compose the opera "Il finto Stanislao," for a very bad troop, but which was performed some thirty times.

There was nothing great in Gyrowetz as a composer, except the extraordinary rapidity with which he could throw off his light, pleasing melodies, and clothe them in pleasing, often (then) new harmonies and accompaniments. He was sure of a market; for those—and they are the vast majority—who find in music only an amusement, bought gladly and paid well for such works as his, and the number of these works was very great. Gerber's catalogue of published works, extending down only to the year 1800, gives some sixty songs, canzonets, and the like; twenty-seven symphonies and an overture, two piano Concertos; more than a hundred pieces in the forms of quintets, quartets, serenades, trios, &c., &c.; some seventy piano-forte pieces, sonatas, nocturnes, &c., &c.; four serenades for wind instruments; forty-eight dances and four marches.

Lannoy, in 1835, gives the number of works at that time, some of these works consisting of several compositions, as 213, from his twelfth year—it should be eighteenth at least—down to that time, viz: about fifty symphonies, twenty-four trios for two violins and 'cello, forty-four string quartets, three quintets, twelve serenades for full orchestra, thirty-five sonatas for piano-forte, twelve nocturnes, four symphonies concertantes, entr' actes to three dramas, and thirty-six Italian and German canzonets. Add to all this the twenty six operas and operettas, the more than forty ballets, and a variety of compositions after 1835, and we have proofs of remarkable industry, even though his facility of composition was very uncommon.

"In his advanced age," says he, "he employed himself still in composition. In his 84th year he composed his nineteenth mass (in D), which was performed with marked success in several churches; besides this, he composes, as his daily morning occupation and pastime, divers songs for the particular use of youth, with no idea of producing them in public. As to the rest, he lives in quiet retirement, and the pleasant consciousness that he has not in all his life willfully injured any person, and is awaiting in peace and quietness the end of his life of care, having reached in 1847 an age of 85 years.

In the "Sontagsblätter," Vienna, Feb. 6, 1848, Ludwig August Frankl, the editor, introduces some extracts from the recently published "Biographie des Adalbert Gyrowetz" thus:—

There can hardly be any one in Vienna, who does not know the venerable figure, the expressive features, and the snow-white hair of the aged man who was a contemporary of Mozart, who still moves among us with fresh intellect, who led a beautiful, artistic life in Germany, Italy, France and England, and finally brought back his laurels to the land of his birth. On the 17th of February this year, he will celebrate his 85th birthday. We—a number of literary men—sat with him in a garden in Döbling some two years ago, where he, warmed up by our attentions, related various events of his life, so rich in adventures and changes of fortune. We all agreed that he ought to give the world these reminiscences; they belonged to the public, nor had we the right to enjoy them alone. Our advice found a willing follower, and its fruit now lies before us."

Herr Ferdinand Luib, a well-known contributor to the periodical literature of Vienna for many years past, tells me (A. W. T.) that he performed the labor of preparing the old man's notes and diaries for the press, of correcting the proofs; but his account of the work is such as to show that it may and should be considered—as I have done—in fact an autobiography. Mr. Luib is not responsible for any mistake of the old gentleman's memory, nor for the somewhat helpless style in which much of it is written, and which is easily to be seen, I imagine, in the passages which are literally translated; at all events I have taken no pains to improve it to any great extent. Mr. Luib and my friend Nottelohm—one of the first theoretic musicians whom I know—describe Gyrowetz in his old age, 1845 and onward, as a very tall, very handsome old man, of strong, healthy constitution, just beginning to bend under the weight of over eighty years, full of life and spirits, fond of conversation and of telling his reminiscences, and evidently in poor pecuniary circumstances. Mr. Nottelohm saw him several times in an eating house near the Schotten Thor (Scottish gate), where he (Gyrowetz) used to come and sit and chat over a large tumbler of light wine mixed with water.

The old composer died March 19, 1850.

The obituary notice in the Ost Deutsche Post of April 12th following, with the signature "L. A.," I add to the already long history.

"It was in the Spring of the year 1846, that I met the aged Gyrowetz, in a garden near Vienna. His already great age—then 81—did not hinder him from going out on foot to visit friends, who lived in the villages near Vienna, for he loved society, and to play and joke with pleasant women. An anacreontic lustre played upon his snow-white hair, in his heart it sang and clang, and almost to the day of his death he composed his daily elegiac, dithyrambic, or for the most part, sacred song.

"After a short, friendly greeting, he began, as he often did, that he was in want of money—a not uncommon complaint with German artists—which, when he did have it, he regularly carried to the small lottery offices and gambled away in great part, dividing the rest, however, with his old maid servant, who had held out with her venerable master, 48 years long, in many a sorrow, but seldom in joy.

"However, his complaint was soon made, and he began to impart most interesting reminiscences from his varied life, and to any question, whether he had written all this down? he replied, 'Who takes any interest in the past of such an old man? There was a time when I had my triumphs in Paris, Naples, London and Vienna; some of my quartets, which I brought out in London, were afterwards published by a speculating music-seller under Haydn's name; my operas were sung a hundred times in all our theatres; the airs in my Augenarzt, went like Donizetti's all through the world—and now, who knows me? I live poor and forgotten, and that is natural enough,' he added humbly. 'I was only a man of talent, one of those who must call it good fortune, when they triumph in their own time—it is genius alone that lives beyond the grave. It is indeed a singular feeling for one to live and to know that he is mentally dead!'

"The utterance of this thought was, however, the result of an inward conflict, long continued but now past. He seemed to utter it without pain, and as he went on to relate his experiences, I encouraged him to write it all out, and besides his own biography, to give a gallery of his contemporaries, and a sort of history of music during his times. Some weeks later he brought me his biography, "as a proof that he was an obedient child," written out upon a large number of foolscap sheets. This manuscript is now in my hands, and from it I draw the following passages."

Then follow extracts, which correspond to the printed biography edited by Mr. Luib. The article closes in the next number of the O. D. Post, thus:—

"I saw the fine old man after the storms of 1848, and when I congratulated him upon his looking so fresh, he said with a meaning smile: 'Fresh looks, fresh earth upon them—you, honored friend, will live to see it!' and then, as if sorry to have given utterance to a sad thought, he parted from me with the words, 'I am an old scamp—weeds don't die out.'

"I saw him only once again, in March of this year (1850), in his coffin. In a house upon the Minoriten Platz, up two flights, in a smoky chamber, filled with furniture of all the decennia of this century, there he lay, clad in a simple black robe. Seven timepieces of various styles ticked upon the wall or on the table, the piano-forte stood closed, the looking glasses of the poor room were, as usual in the presence of the dead, veiled. Alas! they would have reflected no splendid illumination. Two candles only burned feebly at the head of the corpse, lonely as it was. The old maid servant passed back and forth, snuffing the candles, and finding a hundred things to do. She told me that for some months he had been unable to leave his bed. His only comfort was to compose, and when, a few days only before his death, the power to do this left him, life first became to the joyous, contented old man a burden. He demanded to be put upon the floor, or, as the German expression is, on the earth, 'I belong to it already,' said he, and thought the end would come sooner there. But as the longed for relief still delayed its coming, he sent to an old friend, Baron von D. [Dietrichstein?] and requested the loan of a pistol, as he desired to live no longer. The friend, shocked at the request, hastened to and spoke long with him. It was Gyrowetz's last conversation; a few hours later his last wish was fulfilled—he was dead.

"Now came some servants in livery, then four men in black cloaks, and shut the coffin and bore it away with no tolling of bells, no prayer. I followed. What a life this had been! What times were included between his birth and death! He saw the 6th of October, 1789, in Paris, where he was the rescuing knight of two beautiful young ladies; he saw the sixth of October, 1848, in Vienna; he heard the tones of the Marseillaise just after its composition amid the storms of the French Revolution, and he was the first composer in Vienna to greet with a song the new era in Austria. March 17th, 1848, the poem 'The press is free' by Gerhard, appeared set to music by him. He saw the free press muzzled after the death of Joseph II., and the siege of Vienna by an Austrian army (under Windischgrätz) in 1848, triumphs and solitary death.

"In the Schotten church, where poets, musicians, painters, and men from all the intelligent circles were assembled, the service for the dead was performed over his remains. A sacred composition, by the master himself, resounded and echoed trembling after the hovering soul.

"In the large churchyard at Währing, where Weigl, composer of the 'Swiss Family,' the church composer Gibel, and not far away Beethoven, Schubert, Seyfried rest, there he was placed Peace to his ashes!"

Mendelssohn's Works.

From the Niederheinische Musik-Zeitung.

We have already mentioned that the second volume of Mendelssohn's Correspondence contains, in the form of an appendix, a catalogue of all his works. This catalogue, a work deserving our best thanks, has been compiled by Herr Julius Rietz, and no one is better qualified for the task. It is not only a supplement to, and explanation of, the Thematic Catalogue, published by Breitkopf and Härtel, of Mendelssohn's productions, but an authentic account of the development of the master's mind. According to the established practice of the musical publishing trade—a practice which does not advantageously distinguish the latter from the general publishing trade, and which consists in not putting upon the first edition of a work the date of its appearance in print—the "Op." numbers, as we all know, do not afford any reliable information as to the order of the various productions, so far as the time when they were composed is concerned. Hence arises the great trouble encountered by the musical historian and by the biographer of the composer, in going through and sifting their materials, and, frequently, the impossibility of arriving at any quite certain result. This comparison, which is strikingly exemplified in Beethoven's works, for instance, exists also in Mendelssohn's compositions, since in them, as in those of Beethoven, the "Op." number is of no authority for the order of their publication or of their creation.* All the thematic catalogues of the works of Beethoven, Schubert, Chopin, Mendelssohn, &c., follow the "Op." number, and but seldom give incidental remarks on the period of composition.

* The difference is most striking; for instance, in the case of the "Walpurgisnacht," composed in 1830 and 1831, but given as Op. 60, 1843, and also in that of the overture to Ruy Blas, composed in 1839, but not printed as Op. 95 till after Mendelssohn's decease.

Herr J. Rietz has now arranged in the chronological order of their composition, and by the author's original manuscripts, the catalogue of Mendelssohn's published works. Mendelssohn was accustomed to note down upon his manuscripts the place where, and the date when, he conceived the idea of each work, and also when he finished it; but even at this early period, despite all the trouble that has been taken, the manuscripts of twelve works and of various detached songs are not to be found. These twelve works have consequently not been included by Herr Rietz in his catalogue, because he wished the latter to be, in the strictest sense, chronologically correct and perfectly authentic; he has, however, mentioned them in his preface, and given generally, but probably correctly, the date of their composition. The most important among them are:—The Sonata, Op. 6, for piano-forte (the only one published); the Book of Songs, Op. 8 and 9; and the Symphony, No. 1, Op. 10—the last belonging, probably, to 1824 (when Mendelssohn was in his fifteenth year), and all dating from the period between 1824—1828. Furthermore, we have the Fantasia, Op. 15, for piano-forte, and the Six Songs, Op. 19—both undoubtedly composed between 1830 and 1834; and, lastly, the Violin Quartet, No. 1, Op. 44, the Trio, No. 2, for piano-forte, &c., Op. 66, and the Variations for piano, Op. 83, all of which belong to the last period, after 1840.

As works without an "Op." number, and not included in the Thematic Catalogue, Herr Rietz mentions, also (without giving the date of their composition): Two Pieces for the piano, Andante, B flat major, and Presto, G minor, published by Senff, Leipzig; Two Songs for four male voices: "Schlummernd an des Vaters Brust," and "Auf, Freunde, laßt das Jahr uns singen," published by Kahnt, Leipzig (Repertory for Male Voices), and a "Te Deum" for four-part chorus and organ, with English words (printed in London). Of the organ parts which Mendelssohn wrote for Handel's Solomon and Israel in Egypt, that for the latter is printed in the edition of the Handel Society, for whom Mendelssohn more especially edited this oratorio. That for the former exists as manuscript in Cologne.

We find, also, included in the catalogue, and in chronological order, the works published from Mendelssohn's papers after his death. It would be, perhaps, desirable to mark them with an asterisk in a second edition. The name of the place, when given, always denotes where the work to which it was affixed was composed or completed.

The series begins in 1822 (when Mendelssohn was in his thirteenth year), with the Quartet for piano-forte, violin, viola and violoncello, in C minor, Op. 1, written in Berlin, and finishes in 1847 with "Alte deutsches Frühlingslied," for one voice, with piano-forte (in Op. 86), Mendelssohn's last composition, written in Leipzig on the 7th October, 1847. On the 4th November, he died.

The following remarks may be made upon the catalogue:—

Under 1824, Die Hochzeit des Camacho (played once at the Theatre Royal, Berlin, on the 29th April, 1827), is marked as Op. 10, while at p. 501, the Symphony No. 1, is also marked Op. 10. An Overture for Reed-band, in C major (Op. 24), written at Doberan for the orchestra there, and subsequently arranged for a full military band, is a piece we never heard, but is probably worthy of being recommended to military bands in place of their insupportable operatic pots-pourris.

1828, The Quartet for two violins, viola and violoncello, in E flat major, Op. 12, is the second written by Mendelssohn, but it is given as the first; the Quartet in A minor, Op. 13, was composed a year previously (1827). The beautiful Ottet (Op. 20) dates from as far back as 1825; the Fugue for violin quartet in E flat major, printed as Op. 81, was written as early as 1827. Of the three quartets, Op. 44, the date of the first cannot be ascertained with certainty (See above), but the date given "After 1840," cannot well be correct for this No. 1, because No. 2, in E minor, and No. 3 in E flat major, belong to 1837 and 1838 respectively.

The Overture, A Midsummer Night's Dream (1826)*, "Meeresstille und glückliche Fahrt" (1828), "Die Hebriden" (1830), in Rome, —Melusine (1833), —Ruy Blas (1837), —Athalie and "Priest's March" (1844), in London.

The first Symphony (as we have said above) dates, probably, from as far back as 1824; the Symphony in A major (which appeared as Op. 90) from 1833, and was often named by Mendelssohn himself his "Italian Symphony; the Symphony-Cantata, Op. 52, from 1840, and that in A minor (designated as the "Scotch" one in his Reisebriefe), Op. 56, from 1842.

His sacred works were composed in the following order:—

1830.—The 115th Psalm (Op. 31), in Rome, Three Compositions ('Kirchenmusiken'), for chorus and vocal solos, with organ" (Op. 23), and "Three Motets" for female voices, with organ (Op. 39), both in Rome, the last being written for the Nuns of the Trinità de' Monti.—1831. "Verleih uns Frieden (without "Op." number) also in Rome.—1833. Vocal Chorus, "Lord have mercy," in A minor (without any "Op." number), in Berlin, printed in Bösenberg's Album at Leipzig.

1834 and 1835.—Oratorio of St. Paul (performed for the first time on the 22nd May, 1836, in Düsseldorf).—1837, The 42nd Psalm (Op. 42), 1838, The 95th Psalm (Op. 46).—1839, The 114th Psalm, "Da Israel aus Aegypten zog," in four parts (Op. 51),—1840, "Lobgesang" (Op. 52, performed for the first time in the Thomaskirche, Leipzig, on the 25th June, 1840, at the fourth centenary anniversary of the invention of printing).—"Festgesang" for male chorus and brass: "Begeht mit heiligem Lobgesang" (performed on the same occasion and printed without "Op." number).

1843.—Choruses for female voices and piano for Athalie, subsequently, in 1845, arranged for a full chorus and band, and printed as Op. 74 (with the overtures written in 1844), performed for the first time on the 1st December, 1845, at the Theatre Royal in Charlottenburg. In the same year (1843), the 191st Psalm (Op. 91), for the festival of New Year's Day, 1844, in the Cathedral, Berlin. The 2nd Psalm, "Warum toben die Heiden," eight-part (Op. 78), and "Herr Gott, du bist unsere Zuversicht," also eight-part (Op. 79). Belonging also to this period is the Hymn for contralto, chorus and orchestra (Op. 96), an arrangement of the "Drei geistliche Lieder für eine Altstimme mit Chor und Orgel," previously published without "Op." number, by Simrock Bonn.

1844.—Hymn for soprano, chorus and organ, Berlin (without "Op." number), Psalms for eight-part chorus (Op. 78).

1846.—"Lauda Sion," for chorus, solo, and orchestra (Op. 73), for the church of St. Martin, Liege. The oratorio of Elijah (Op. 70), performed for the first time on the 25th August, 1846. "Sprüche" for eight-part chorus.

1847.—Three Motets for chorus and vocal solos (Op. 69), and recitatives and choruses from the unfinished oratorio of Christus.† From what precedes the reader will perceive the very great value of Herr J. Rietz's catalogue. But it is the second catalogue, containing "the unprinted works" of Mendelssohn, which completely astounds us. Justly does Rietz remark in the preface: "The large number of works here mentioned is a proof how strictly and conscientiously Mendelssohn behaved towards himself, and how much he laid on one side, which, even if requiring to be retouched, would have afforded pleasure and delight to the world; but it is a proof, also, that after his death, care was taken to pursue the same course, and to publish nothing from his posthumous papers unworthy of his name and his importance in the history of Art. Smaller pieces, composed for particular occasions, &c., and of which there exist a very great many, are not included in the list, the principal reason for this being that it would have been difficult to render it even approximately complete. These unprinted works, all of which are still in existence, are arranged according to the different styles of music, so that the reader is able to perceive at a glance the composer's extraordinary industry in each. The date of their composition is mostly added.

Under the head of Sacred Music, we find 28 numbers, including some ten grand pieces with orchestra. Among these are a "Magnificat," of 1822; a "Kyrie," of 1825; the 100th Psalm, of 1844; and "Herr Gott, Dich loben wir," for double chorus, organ, four trombones and stringed instruments—in celebration of the thousandth anniversary of the existence of Germany—of 1843. Furthermore, there are thirteen pieces belonging to St. Paul, but eventually omitted by Mendelssohn (four choruses, 3 chorales, 4 recitatives, 1 soprano air, and 1 duet for soprano and bass), and more important works a capella (some eight-part ones) of 1826; twenty-eight for the Berlin Sing-Akademie. Perhaps the compositions entitled, "Ad Vesperas," for three-part and four-part male chorus, and "Beati mortui," for male chorus, both written later than 1831, might, in the present scarcity of works of this description, merit another trial with a view to publication. We find, also, included among the "Weltliche Gesänge," seven more pieces for male chorus; a "Festmusik," words by Rellstab, also for male voices, with wind instrument and basses, and seven numbers of solos and choruses, dating from 1827, and written for a festival got up by A. Von Humboldt, in honor of the German natural philosophers at Berlin. There is, too, for full chorus and orchestra, a Cantata for the Dürrer Festival, 12th April, 1828, as well as fourteen solo pieces, grand fugued choruses, &c. Three one-act comic operas, and one three-act opera: Der Onkel aus Boston, oder die beiden Neffen, are deserving of notice. There are, furthermore, about thirty airs and songs for one voice, with accompaniment. Of orchestral works, the manuscripts include two Symphonies (in D major, 1822; and in D minor, for the Festival of the Reformation, in London and Berlin, performed in 1830), and an Overture in C major, 1825, executed at the Düsseldorf Musical Festival, 1833.*

For stringed-instruments, there are from twelve to sixteen pieces, in four, five and six parts respectively, a violin concerto being included among them. Among the eleven more important pieces for the piano, are two Piano-forte Concertos, with full band, a sextet, a quartet, a trio and four Sonatas (with clarinet, viola and violin), most of them dating from 1823 or 1824. But there is also a Sonata, with violin, in E flat major, belonging to 1838, that is to the composer's best period. For the piano-forte alone there are, besides a large number of smaller pieces, some productions of importance, including a Sonata in B flat major, 1827, the publication of which would be desirable, because, with the exception of the six Sonatas for the organ, we possess only one Sonata (Op. 6) in this style.†

* I recollect it very well; it was fresh and animated, and, though possessing no decided character, pleased greatly. In reply to my frequent subsequent inquiries why he did not have it printed, and what had become of it, Mendelssohn always replied evasively; but I could see that he did not consider this Overture equal to the "Meeresstille und glückliche Fahrt," and "Die Hebriden,"—composed subsequently—because it did not express any well defined idea.—L. BISCROFF.

† In the catalogue of the printed works, the Organ Sonata in C minor (Op. 62), No. 2 is placed under 1839 and 1844, and the Sonata in D minor, No. 6 of the same work, under 1844 and 1845, while the date of No. 5 is not given. This is probably owing to some typographical error.

Lobe, in a notice on Mendelssohn, in the Gartenlaube (6th February, 1859), says: "He was, as a rule, very severe with regard to his works, and kept back many of the less important ones. We now see that the number of productions thus kept back was exceedingly great." Lobe goes on to say, however: "Of course the expression, 'less important,' applied to his works, is to be understood only relatively to his best productions, for he never published any thing that deserved the designation of 'less important,' in the ordinary acceptance of the words. His relatively less important works are always worth more than many later productions whose authors fancy they equal or even surpass him." We agree with Herr Lobe, and believe that another and not too timid selection from the rich store of manuscripts Mendelssohn left behind him, would result in the discovery of many a piece of music worthy of being published, and to which Lobe's opinion would well apply.

Beethoven in Saturn's Ring.

THE MEDIUMS.*

The world of music is at the present moment deeply agitated; all the philosophy of Art seems to be overturned. People generally believed, only a few days ago, that the Beautiful in music was, like Ugliness, absolute; that is to say, that a piece that was beautiful, like a piece that was displeasing or mediocre, for persons who call themselves persons of good taste, was also beautiful, displeasing, or mediocre for every one, and consequently, for people without taste or education, the result of this consoling opinion was that a masterpiece capable of causing tears to flow from the eyes of a person residing at No. 58 Rue de la Chaussée d'Antin, Paris, or of boring or disgusting him, must necessarily produce the same effect upon a Cochin-Chinese, a Laplander, a Turk, or a porter of the Rue des Mauvaises Paroles. When I say people believed, I mean by people, savants, doctors, and simple-minded individuals, for in these questions great and little minds are alike, and qui ne se ressemble pas s'assemble. As for myself, who am not a savant, a doctor, or a simpleton, I never quite knew what to think of those grave questions of controversy; I believe, however, that I believed nothing at all; but, at present, I am sure, my opinion is fixed, and I believe much less in the Absolutely Beautiful than in unicorn's horns. This is why I beg you not to believe in the horn of the unicorn. It is now proved, beyond the possibility of a doubt, that unicorns exist in several parts of the Himalayas. We all know the adventure of Mr. Kingsdom—the celebrated English traveller, astonished at meeting with one of these animals, which he believed fabulous (that is what becomes of believing anything), looked at it with a degree of attention offensive to the elegant quadruped. The unicorn, irritated at this, rushed upon Mr. Kingsdom, pinned him to a tree, and left in his breast a long piece of its horn as a proof of its existence. The unfortunate Englishman could never recover from the shock.

At present, I must say why, for some little time, I am sure I believe that I do not believe in the Absolutely-Beautiful in music. A revolution ought naturally to take place, and really has taken place, in philosophy, after the marvellous discovery of table-turning by the aid of the mediums, of the conjuring up of spirits and of spiritual conversations. Music could not remain beyond the reach of so important a fact, and continue isolated from the world of spirits; being, as it is, the science of the Impalpable, the Imponderable and the Indiscernible. A great many musicians, therefore, put themselves in communication with the world of spirits or of mind (as they ought to have done long ago). By means of a deal table, of very moderate price, on which you place your hands, and which, after some minutes' reflection, begins lifting one or two of its legs in a manner, unfortunately, to shock the modesty of English ladies, you succeed not only in calling up the spirit of a great composer, but in entering into a regular conversation with him, and in forcing him to answer all sorts of questions. But more than this, if you set about your task properly, you can compel the spirit of the great master to dictate a new work, which issues entire and hot from his brain. As with the letters of the alphabet, it is agreed that the table, raising its legs and striking upon the floor, shall give so many knocks for a C, so many for a D, so many for an F, so many for a quaver, so many for a semi-quaver, so many for a quaver rest and so many for a semi-quaver rest, &c. I know what the reader will remark: "It is agreed, you say? Agreed with whom? With the spirits evidently. But, before the agreement was made, how did the first medium manage to find out that the spirits did agree?" I cannot tell you; but what is certain, is that the fact is certain; besides, in these grand questions, you must allow yourself to be absolutely guided by your internal senses, and not be too particular.

Well then, already (as the Russians say) the spirit of Beethoven, who inhabits Saturn, was conjured up. That Mozart inhabits Jupiter is known to every one; one would think that the author of Fidelio ought to have selected the same star for his residence; but no one is ignorant that Beethoven is somewhat savage and capricious; perhaps, too, he may feel some unwelcome antipathy against Mozart. But, however this may be, he inhabits Saturn, or, at least, his ring. Well, last Monday, a medium who is very familiar with the great man, and does not dread putting the latter in a bad humor, by causing him to make so long a journey for nothing at all, places his hands upon the table for the purpose of sending to Beethoven in Saturn's ring, the order to come and talk a little with him. The table immediately began to make indecent movements, raising its legs, and showing that the spirit was near. We must confess that the poor spirits are very obedient. During his lifetime, Beethoven would not have put himself out of the way to go only from the Kärnthner Thor Theatre to the Imperial palace, had the Emperor of Austria begged him to come and pay him a visit; but now he leaves Saturn's ring, and interrupts his profound contemplations, to obey the order (mark well the word) of the first person possessing a deal table.

* He did not write the music to be played between the acts, &c., till 1843. On the 14th October in that year, the Midsummer Night's Dream, with all Mendelssohn's music, was performed for the first time in the new palace at Potsdam, and on the 18th October following, at the Theatre Royal, Berlin.

† To the year 1847 belongs, also, the finale to the opera of Lorelei, printed as Op. 98 from his papers. "Besides this, there exists of this opera only an 'Ave Maria,' for soprano solo and female chorus, a grand march with chorus, and the beginning of three other pieces.—J. RIETZ, p. 516.

Such is death, and thus does it change one's disposition! How right Marmontel was to say, in his opera of Azor:

*Les esprits, dont on nous fait peur,
Sont les meilleures gens du monde.*

But so it is. I have already warned you that, in questions of this kind, you must not be too particular.

Beethoven arrives, and says, by means of the legs of the table: "Here I am!" The delighted medium taps the master's stomach. "Come, come," you will observe, "you are giving utterance to absurdities! You don't mean it!" "Yes I do. You have already spoken of brain in allusion to a spirit. Spirits are not bodies." "No, no, they are not. But you are perfectly well aware they are semi-bodies. That has been satisfactorily explained. Do not interrupt me again with such futile observations." I continue my melancholy recital. The medium, who is himself a semi spirit, gives then a semi-knock on Beethoven's semi-stomach, and, without ceremony, begs the semi-god to dictate a new sonata. The other does not wait to be pressed, and the table begins capering about. Some one writes from its dictation. As soon as the sonata is taken down, Beethoven leaves to return to Saturn. The medium, surrounded by a dozen stupefied spectators, approaches the piano, performs the sonata, and the stupefied spectators become dumb-founded listeners, on finding that the sonata is not a semi-platitude, but a complete platitude, a piece of nonsense and stupidity.

How can we now believe on the Absolutely-Beautiful? It is certain that, on going to inhabit a higher sphere, Beethoven could only have become perfect. His genius must have increased and grown more elevated than before, and, when dictating a new sonata, he must have desired to give the inhabitants of the earth an idea of the new style he has adopted in his new abode, an idea of his fourth manner, an idea of the music executed on the Erards in Saturn's ring. Yet this new style is precisely what we petty musicians of a petty and sub-Saturnian world call a flat, stupid and insupportable style, and which, far from transporting us to the fifty-eighth heaven, irritates and disgusts us. It is enough to make one lose one's reason, were that possible.

We must, therefore, believe that, the Beautiful and the Ugly not being absolute and universal, many productions of the human mind which are admired upon earth will be despised in the world of spirits; and I find myself authorized in concluding (by the way I have long believed such to be the case), that operas performed and applauded every night, even at theatres which modesty does not allow me to mention, would be hissed in Saturn, in Jupiter, in Mars, in Venus, in Pallas, in Sirius, in Neptune, in the Great and the Little Bear, and in the constellation of Boötes. In a word, that they are infinite platitudes for the infinite universe.

This conviction is not calculated to encourage those who produce a great deal. Many of them, overwhelmed by the sad discovery, have been taken ill, and many, it is said, pass into the condition of spirits, that is to say, become all mind. Fortunately the process will be a long one.

The Great Organ in the Boston Music Hall.

II.

We must first try to complete our description of the Organ as it looks. So far we have been mainly occupied with the frowning lower front, the massive, shadowy foundation of the structure, with its caryatid giants, lions, Fates and Sybils, with its almost barbaric wealth of ornamental bass-relief, albeit all is chaste, symmetrical and noble. What we have seen are the parts in shadow; we must look upward for the parts in light. Below, we are in ancient Night, the darkness of the Past, the period of the dreamy and the monstrous, of huge, half-developed shapes that groan in bondage, bending Atlas-like beneath the weight of a yet glorious world to come; the vaguely stirring, struggling, brooding instincts of humanity in dark ages, when the soul's birth-right, dimly felt, was still withheld by seeming Fates. Above is fulfilled prophecy, the light of Day, the grace and airiness of Freedom, life lifted above servile toil and fear into the pure, free, genial fields of Art, expressed in fully human and ideal forms, in Muses, cherubs, St. Cecilia, all soaring heavenward. Below, the sole material is black walnut, impressive by its massiveness and richness; above, what catches first the eye is shining rows and groups of silvery tubes or pipes, alive, thrilling with audible breath of music, diffusing liquid light as well as sound, however heavily surmounted.

We must tax the reader's patience while we dwell a little further on this contrast, before proceeding to examine the other element in it. It is not at all necessary to suppose that the artist, in designing this façade, had any conscious thought of embodying such large allegory as we have found in it, to serve as a key note to the unity of the whole. We take it only as a proof that he has produced a true work of Art, as a justification of his plan, that in it we can read these grand, far-reaching correspondences, found more or less in all of Art's creations, in the old Gothic cathedrals (from which this architecture is so different), in Beethoven's symphonies, in music itself, in every thing we call inspired, because it seems to have sprung from an ideal germ and to have grown, instead of being merely manufactured. It answers many objections on the score of style, or of detail, that we find every feature here support this notion of a speaking whole, in correspondence with the instrumental functions which it covers (the organ proper), as well as with the whole human sense and prophecy of music, which it is the hidden organ's task to serve, and should, therefore, be the visible organ's task to symbolize. If the artist, therefore, has been happy in his plan, if he has hit the right solution of the problem of a noble, beautiful and fit exterior for so significant and grand an instrument, the symbolism will be found there when the work is done, whether he had it in his thought or not; perhaps all the more perfectly, if he did not think of it; Art cannot work well if it begins with being its own interpreter, and therefore its own critic, instead of the spontaneous thing it should be, happy in being merely artist, and, as for meanings, "building better than it knew." Perhaps it shall be one of his rewards, when he himself for the first time stands before his completed work, and sees it as a whole, to find in it these higher meanings, which came there rather instinctively than consciously on his part; his reward, to find that, in working in the sincere, earnest, joyous spirit of mere artist, the thing has worked itself out, as it were, divinely.

When we hear some one say, therefore: "These two old giants are grandly imposing, but then they are only half developed, they are monsters, their humanity vanishes just below the middle of the figure, and dwindles away into mere architectural mass; how much finer would be a complete human form, standing freely out! This is a slave, embedded in the ground on which he stands, and bent forever under an intolerable load,—man subordinate to matter. These traditional caryatides were well enough in old times, but Art in the nineteenth century should be human, Christian, filled with lofty aspiration, free,"—we answer: "No, you single out the part, and do not read the whole; the half human caryatid would be false and senseless were it used above, in those parts of the organ front which tell of light and freedom, but here it is in place; these are the autochthones, the earth-born, only half disengaged from their native soil as yet, typifying the beginnings of history, the period of brute strength and slavery. See what these uphold! The freedom, the beauty, the Art, the Christian ideals, the gradual unfoldings of the higher destiny of man! The groaning giant prophecies his own deliverance, and does not Beethoven stand there before him as interpreter? Beethoven, in all whose music the same struggle and prophecy voices itself forth; ever the ground-work of deep yearning gloom and conflict, with the resolution into glorious light and joy? The giants are shadowy and monstrous? Yes, for they uphold the monstrous pipes, the great, deep, shadowy undertones on which the whole pyramid of tones builds itself up, harmoniously, exultantly, into the realm of birds and sunshine. They mark the place, too, in the organ, where all the muttered thunders of the pedal registers, the sub-bass stops, are kept; for these are planted upon wind-chests just there in the middle of the instrument, even as the stern "sisters three," whether Fates or Sybils, on the right wing stand before the forest of large-voiced, earnest pipes, composing the "Great" organ, with which Fugues and earnest things are played, while on the other wing the merrier sisters mark the quarter of the "fancy stops."

Or if, in general, we hear the whole lower front objected to, because it frowns too heavily and darkly, because its masses are so rugged and so overpowering, because its figures border on the monstrous, its giants are chained Samsons, its aspect sternly imposing, its style rococo or Renaissance, weighed down with ornament, instead of lightened,—we still say: think of what it covers, what it corresponds to on the inside. In this lower half of the organ is contained the drudging mechanism, that which ushers in and waits upon the air that vibrates free and musical in the more living organism, the harmonious series of pipes above. Behind and below all, in the recess, is the heavy machinery which plies the panting rows of bellows, filling the huge reservoir, and driving the wind out through trunks and channels to all parts—these toiling Samsons of the wind-mill, to which the Samsons on the outside correspond again; and then all the levers, arms, and tendons, which convey the action from the fingers on the keyboards to the valves by which air rushes into every pipe. All this great complicated mass and wilderness of mechanism, hundred-handed slaves to the free, vibrating, tuneful life above, is kept behind this massive lower portion of the house.

We will now survey more closely, although briefly, the upper portion of this beautiful façade—the parts in light. Lack of technical architectural knowledge of course compels us to pass over many essential features without mention.

Beginning at the centre, where, surmounting the triangular pediment, which in simple, earnest style completes the framework of the niche containing the keyboards, the bust of Bach pledges the instrument to noble uses, we follow up the central division, presenting a plain field, filled (or to be filled) by five large pure tin pipes, some eighteen feet upward, to a semi-circular pediment, finely contrasted with the pointed one below, and crowned by the presiding genius of the whole, a beautiful female figure,—St. Cecilia, Muse, or whatever worthy character one's fancy may ascribe to her,—seated, playing on her lyre. The face is noble, lovely, full of inspiration; design and execution alike exquisite. A little griffin sits and looks off from each side of her, as if keeping watch. Is there any legendary connection between St. Cecilia and griffins? Under her, from the base of the pediment, leans forth the splendid head of the Apollo. Curving outwardly from this plain central field to the great round towers on either side, are two more fields of silvery pipes (of the 16-foot series), terminating in a broad, undulating, harp-shaped border of the dark wood above. The airy grace of form, the chaste delicacy of ornament in all the walnut frame-work here, both slender shaft and waving border, cannot be described. The floating rib-band line runs up the sides and over the upper fronts of the huge round towers, gliding down and away again on the other side, thus shaping itself into a sort of hood, which sheathes the ends of the three colossal pipes, and makes the dark and massive dome rest gracefully and cloud-like on their heads.

These three great pipes (of pure English tin) grouped as a triple column in each tower, (each some twenty-nine feet in length), form, as we have said, the most prominent and bold feature in the whole front, looming in the strongest light above, as their sustaining Atlases stand out in black and bold relief below. Slender walnut columns, fluted above, barred and riveted below, enclose them, and with gracefully carved Corinthian capitals uphold the lofty domes. The lower parts of each dome are richly covered with the finest bas-relief; on each side, floating female angels, winged, holding lyres; the carving of the graceful limbs, the hands, the feet, so exquisite, that one marvels why so much beauty should be banished so far off, and then finds an uncommon pleasure in a feeling of the honesty and thoroughness of such work, in the artistic loyalty to the ideal, which works as nature herself works, and does its best where it is by no means the surest to be seen. These floating, free, winged figures are the offset and complement to the fixed and massive style of all below the pipes. While one hand of each pair holds back a lyre, the other reaches forward to held up the end of a gilded wreath and scroll under the colossal face of a Muse, that looks off full in front. Over the rich frieze thus formed, a heavy cornice, upon Ionic scrolls or consoles, bears up the dome, which rounds boldly upward, ribbed and otherwise relieved with ornament. On the summit of each dome, seeming almost to touch the ceiling, are a pair of chubby winged cherubs, beautiful designs, one standing, the other kneeling in front of him, both playing instruments; one pair the French horn and flute, the other pair the lyre and mandoline. These also are beautifully executed, and would bear close examination were they brought down to our feet. Thus freedom, lightness, poetry and grace, finished ideals of our earth-bound nature, with its finer inspirations and its aspirations, characterize, as we have said, the entire allegory of this upper portion, and afford the key and the solution to all the heavy, darkly brooding, crouching prophecy below.

Thus much of the great round towers with the shrine which they enclose. Passing outward, the front falls back again in a harp-shaped field of pipes, answering to that on the inside of the tower, only that the broad upper border offers the returning curve. Double pilasters, barred and fluted, and with Corinthian capitals, like the round columns, divide these from the outermost compartments; and on the entablature above them, leaning on the harp-like curve, and looking off to either side, are life-size figures of a woman and a man, the former laurel-crowned, each with one hand resting on a harp. The male bard is a manly, noble type, full of repose and dignity. The female figure does not seem to us so graceful as some other figures, and yet it is effective, with an all-alive, victorious Corinna air.

The undulating border, which we have traced so far over the whole upper surface, drops in a more sudden curve over the two outermost pipe fields, and their pipes (ten in each), are much shorter and more slender than those of the middle fields. These bring us to the two lateral or end towers, which are square, in Campanile shape, exceeding beautiful in their proportions, composed of graceful pilasters in the same style as before, which are to hold between them (for we write before the whole is put together) two colossal pipes (21 feet each), one in front and one upon the end (or round the corner.) Their leafy capitals take a new start and send up continuations in the form of long acanthus consoles, which sustain rich gabled pediments, crowned with large pavilions, on each side of which stands a four-sided vase or urn, covered with musical emblems, such as are strown so liberally over all parts of the organ which admit of them. These towers, of course, are lower than the central ones. The pediments from which they spring (supported by the Sybils), are semi-circular, finely contrasted with and relieving the sterner classic triangle of that above the central arch; and upon this level, there stands out from either corner a Grecian urn of grand proportions, with the tragic emblem of the goat's head finishing off the bottom of the outer handle; this, with the profile caryatid below, lends a swelling outline to the whole front, not suffering it to end in a sheer, impoverished perpendicular line. The ends of the organ-house correspond with the last-named harp-shaped compartments of the front, each forming a field of ten more shining pipes—thus making a total of from 70 to 80 pipes, ranging from 12 or more to 29 feet in length, which are displayed.

Paying a later visit to the Organ, we find that the artist has been lighting up the entire front, even the lower masses, by a liberal but judicious use of gold, giving it a very gay and festive air, and bringing the great mass into better keeping with the rest of the hall. Mere touches of gilding here and there, for the most part; points to catch the light and reveal sculptured outline; while the number of inscriptions in gold letters has been increased. Thus over the key-boards is the builder's name; in a conspicuous panel, higher up, the motto: "Gloria in Excelsis." In shields within the gabled pediments of the square towers, are the coats of arms of the two cities, Ludwigsburg and Boston.

This is a meagre and we fear a blind description; but it may prepare the reader to expect, what, we are quite sure he will find, a noble, earnest, rich, harmonious work of organ architecture, in keeping with the purpose and the place. A true, impressive work of Art; unique, as well as beautiful and grand in its conception, and with a wealth of detail so subordinated to a noble unity of aspect as to look like genius. We remember no Organ front (or house) in Europe, which it can be said to resemble. There will be criticisms of course, in point of style; for all styles have their partial adherents. Technically, the style of this is Renaissance, and much of its detail is rococo; and many have a feeling against a style considered so luxurious in comparison with the severely classic models, or the mystical, religious Gothic. But the Gothic would not suit the Music Hall, fugue-like as it looks and well as it answers to the term of "frozen music." The Grecian and Roman architecture does not suit the Organ, which is too free and spiritual an essence to be clipped within those formal limitations; for Organs, Musical Art itself belong to a later, freer phase of human development. Greek art lived entirely in the Present; Music mounts on wings of restless aspiration. To this the Gothic, with its perpetual suggestion of the Infinite, corresponds.

Precluded from the Gothic, has not our artist found enough of the same freedom, the same infinite suggestion, here in the Renaissance? But the structure has also an individuality of its own, and perhaps the best answer to the question of style would be to say: it is in the Great Organ style,—which, if it has had no models heretofore, now points to one.

Before proceeding to a description of the "Great instrument" itself and of its musical resources, we may as well meet the curiosity which every one has felt to know whence the wonder came, what is its history, and who are the authors. The earlier chapters of this history we have long since given. But now the story is finished; and it does not need to be told better, or more fully for the present, than it is done in the Atlantic Monthly by Dr. Holmes. We quote from him:

It is mainly to the persistent labors of a single individual that our community is indebted for the privilege it now enjoys in possessing an instrument of the supreme order, such as make cities illustrious by their presence. That which is on the lips of all it can wrong no personal susceptibilities to tell in print; and when we say that Boston owes the Great Organ chiefly to the personal efforts of the present President of the Music-Hall Association, Dr. J. Baxter Upham, the statement is only for the information of distant readers.

In the summer of 1853, less than a year after the Music Hall was opened to the public, Dr. Upham, who had been for some time occupied with the idea of procuring an organ worthy of the edifice, made a tour in Europe with the express object of seeing some of the most famous instruments of the Continent and of Great Britain. He examined many, especially in Germany, and visited some of the great organ-builders, going so far as to obtain specifications from Mr. Walcker of Ludwigsburg, and from Weigl, his pupil, at Stuttgart. On returning to this country, he brought the proposition of procuring a great instrument in Europe in various ways before the public, among the rest by his "Reminiscences of a Summer Tour," published in "Dwight's Journal of Music." After this he laid the matter before the members of the Harvard Musical Association, and, having thus gradually prepared the way, presented it for consideration before the Board of Directors of the Music-Hall Association. A committee was appointed "to consider." There was some division of opinion as to the expediency of the more ambitious plan of sending abroad for a colossal instrument.—There was a majority report in its favor, and a verbal minority report advocating a more modest instrument of home manufacture. Then followed the anacanda-torpor which marks the process of digestion of a huge and as yet crude project by a multivertebate corporation.

On the first of March, 1856, the day of the inauguration of Beethoven's statue, a subscription-paper was started, headed by Dr. Upham, for raising the sum of ten thousand dollars. At a meeting in June the plan was brought before the stockholders of the Music Hall, who unanimously voted to appropriate ten thousand dollars and the proceeds of the old organ, on condition that fifteen thousand dollars should be raised by private subscription. In October it was reported to the Directors that ten thousand dollars of this sum were already subscribed, and Dr. Upham, President of the Board, pledged himself to raise the remainder on certain conditions, which were accepted. He was then authorized to go abroad to investigate the whole subject, with full powers to select the builder and to make the necessary contracts.

Dr. Upham had already made an examination of the best organs and organ-factories in New England, New York, and elsewhere in this country, and received several specifications and plans from builders. He proceeded at once, therefore, to Europe, examined the great English instruments, made the acquaintance of Mr. Hopkins, the well-known organist and recognized authority on all matters pertaining to the instrument, and took lessons of him in order to know better the handling of the keys and the resources of the instrument. In his company, Dr. Upham examined some of the best instruments in London. He made many excursions among the old churches of Sir Christopher Wren's building, where are to be found the fine organs of "Father Smith," John Snetzler, and other famous builders of the past. He visited the workshops of Hill, Gray and Davidson, Willis, Robson, and others. He made a visit to Oxford to examine the beautiful organ in Trinity College. He found his way into the organ-lofts of St. Paul's, of Westminster Abbey, and the Temple Church, during the playing at morning and evening service. He inspected Thompson's euharmonic organ, and obtained models of various portions of organ-structure.

From London Dr. Upham went to Holland, where he visited the famous instruments at Haarlem, Amsterdam, and Rotterdam, and the organ-factory at Utrecht, the largest and best in Holland. Thence to Cologne, where, as well as at Utrecht, he obtained plans and schemes of instruments; to Hamburg, where are fine old organs, some of them built two or three centuries ago; to Lubeck, Dresden, Breslau, Leipzig, Halle, Merseburg. Here he found a splendid organ, built by Ladergast, whose instruments excel especially in their tone-effects. A letter from Liszt, the renowned pianist, recommended this builder particularly to Dr. Upham's choice. At Frankfurt and at Stuttgart he found two magnificent instruments, built by Walcker of Ludwigsburg, to which place he repaired in order to examine his factories carefully, for the second time. Thence the musical tourist proceeded to Ulm, where is the sumptuous organ, the work of the same builder, ranking, we believe, first in point of dimensions of all in the world. Onward still, to Munich, Bamberg, Augsburg, Nuremberg, along the Lake of Constance to Weingarten, where is that great organ claiming to have sixty-six stops and six thousand six hundred and sixty-six pipes; to Freyburg, in Switzerland, where is another great organ, noted for the rare beauty of its vox humana stop, the mechanism of which had been specially studied by Mr. Walcker, who explained it to Dr. Upham.

Returning to Ludwigsburg, Dr. Upham received another specification from Mr. Walcker. He then passed some time at Frankfurt examining the specifications already received and the additional ones which came to him while there.

At last, by the process of exclusion, the choice was narrowed down to three names, Schultze, Ladergast, and Walcker, then to the two last. There was still a difficulty in deciding between these. Dr. Upham called in Mr. Walcker's partner and son, who explained every point on which he questioned them with the utmost minuteness. Still undecided, he revisited Merseburg and Weissenfels, to give Ladergast's instruments another trial. The result was that he asked Mr. Walcker for a third specification, with certain additions and alterations which he named. This he received, and finally decided in his favor,—but with the condition that Mr. Walcker should meet him in Paris for the purpose of examining the French organs with reference to any excellences of which he might avail himself, and afterwards proceed to London and inspect the English instruments with the same object.

The details of this joint tour are very interesting, but we have not space for them. The frank enthusiasm with which the great German organ-builder was received in France contrasted forcibly with the quiet, not to say cool, way in which the insular craftsmen received him, gradually, however, warming, and at last, with a certain degree of effort, admitting him to their confidence.

A fortnight was spent by Dr. Upham in company with Walcker and Mr. Hopkins in studying and perfecting the specification, which was at last signed in German and English, and stamped with the notarial seal, and thus the contract made binding.

A long correspondence relating to the instrument followed between Dr. Upham, the builder, and Mr. Hopkins, ending only with the shipment of the instrument. A most interesting part of this was Dr. Upham's account of his numerous original experiments with the natural larynx, made with reference to determining the conditions requisite for the successful imitation of the human voice in the arrangement called the vox humana. Mr. Walcker has availed himself of the results of these experiments in the stop as made for this organ, but with what success we are unable to say, as the pipes have not been set in place at the time of our writing. . . .

Before the organ could be accepted, it was required by the terms of the contract to be set up at the factory, and tested by three persons: one to be selected by the Organ Committee of the Music-Hall Association, one by the builder, and a third to be chosen by them. Having been approved by these judges, and also by the State-Commissioner of Wurtemberg, according to the State ordinance, the result of the trial was transmitted to the President and Directors of the Music-Hall Association, and the organ was accepted.

The war broke out in the mean time, and there were fears lest the vessel in which the instrument might be shipped should fall a victim to some of the British corsairs sailing under Confederate colors.—But the Dutch brig "Presto," though slow, was safe from the licensed pirates, unless an organ could be shown to be contraband of war. She was out so long, however,—nearly three months from Rotterdam,—that the insurance-office presidents shook their heads over her, fearing that she had gone down with all her precious freight.

"At length, to borrow Dr. Upham's words, "one stormy Sunday in March she was telegraphed from the marine station down in the bay, and the next morning, among the marine intelligence, in the smallest possible type, might be read the invoice of her cargo thus:—

"Sunday, Mar. 22.
"Arr. Dutch brig Presto, Van Wingarten, Rotterdam, Jan. 1. Helvoet. 10th 11ad terrific gales from SW the greater part of the passage. 40 casks gin S. D Williams 8 sheep Chenery & Co 200 bags coffee 2 casks herrings 1 case cheese W Winsel 1 organ J B Upham 20 pipes 6 casks gin J D Richards 6 casks nutmegs J Schumaker 20 do gin 500 bags chickory root Order," etc., etc.

"And this was the heralding of this greatest marvel of a high and noble art, after the labor of seven years bestowed upon it, having been tried and pronounced complete by the most fastidious and competent of critics, the wonder and admiration of music-loving Germany, the pride of Wurtemberg, bringing a new phase of civilization to our shores in the darkest hour of our country's trouble."

It remains to give a brief history of the construction of the grand and imposing architectural frame which we have already attempted to describe. Many organ-fronts were examined with reference to their effects, during Dr. Upham's visits of which we have traced the course, and photographs and sketches obtained for the same purpose. On returning, the task of procuring a fitting plan was immediately undertaken. We need not detail the long series of trials which were necessary before the requirements of the President and Directors of the Music-Hall Association were fully satisfied. As the result of these, it was decided that the work should be committed to the brothers Herter, of New York, European artists, educated at the Royal Academy of Art in Stuttgart. The general outline of the facade followed a design made by Mr. Hammatt Billings, to whom also are due the drawings from which the Saint Cecilia and the two groups of cherubs upon the round towers were modelled. These figures were executed at Stuttgart; the other carvings were all done in New York, under Mr. Herter's direction, by Italian and German artists, one of whom had trained his powers particularly in the shaping of colossal figures. In the course of the work, one of the brothers Herter visited Ludwigsburg for the special purpose of comparing his plans with the structure to which they were to be adapted, and was received with enthusiasm, the design for the front being greatly admired.

The contract was made with Mr. Herter in April, 1860, and the work, having been accepted, was sent to Boston during the last winter, and safely stored in the lecture-room beneath the Music Hall. In March the Great Work arrived from Germany, and was stored in the hall above.

But our space is nearly gone, and we must again postpone the full execution of our plan of giving an account of the interior of the Organ and "a catalogue raisonné" of all its stops, their powers and qualities." Moreover, as the pipes of quite a number of the stops are not yet (at this present writing) planted on their several air-beds (windchests) and tuned, the most we can do now will be to give a list of them, which we have been at considerable pains to make full and accurate,—with a few items of indispensable preliminary.

The Organ properly includes five organs, and has four key-boards for the hands, with one key-board for the feet. The first Manual, which plays the Great Organ, holds the usual convenient place midway between the other manuals, namely, the second from below; the second Manual, for the Swell organ, is the lowest; the third, for the Choir organ, is placed above the first; and the fourth, for the Solo organ, comes above that. The Manuals have each 58 keys, ranging from 8-foot C, to a<sub>2</sub>, that is to the Sixth above four octaves. But there are 16ft Stops, as well as 8ft ones and these are 4ft, 2ft even 1ft stops by drawing which the scale of the key-board is extended an octave downwards and several octaves upwards.

The Pedal key-board has 30 keys, beginning at 16ft C, the lowest C on our Grand Pianos. But it also commands three Stops of 32ft tone, as well as others of only 8ft 4ft and even 2ft. The highest pipes in the Manuals are not more than three-eighths of an inch in speaking length.

All imaginable conveniences for coupling whole key-boards, or for grouping kindred or contrasted registers (Combination pedals), Crescendo, Swells, Tremolos, lightening the touch, &c., &c., exist here and await fitting notice hereafter. The wind is gathered and condensed in a huge reservoir, holding some 400 cubic feet, which is fed by six great pairs of bellows, worked by a machine, whose wheel will probably be turned by the Cochituate water.

We must again remind the uninitiated that the greatness and importance of an Organ is not to be measured altogether by the number of its pipes, or even by the number of its stops. The York Cathedral organ boasts 8,000 pipes, yet it is not so great an organ as our own, which lacks some 2500 of that number; it is easy to multiply small pipes, tiny whistles, by the hundred; but if they are not needed they are idle vanity. The main essential is an ample basis to the harmonic pyramid of sound, a plenty of full-toned, powerful foundation stops, that is, the unison and octave stops, what the Germans call Principals, what we call Diapasons. And this is the first great excellence of Walcker's master-work; admirable proportions, combinations, beauty and individuality of character in each, are others, of which it will be the fit time to report after the "Inauguration." For the present, then, we give merely our list of the musical

Whole number of pipes in Manuals and Pedals... 5474

The Programme of the Inauguration festival, next Monday evening, will be found on our first page. It would be superfluous to dwell upon its temptations; if indeed it is not almost too late, inasmuch as a most numerous and brilliant audience is already secured. The eagerness with which the tickets, at such high price, have been purchased shows that our musical public appreciate the importance of this rare gift of art and science from the old world and desire to share some little of the responsibility of keeping it unmortgaged and in good repair for us and generations after us. It will be a memorable evening.

MUSIC IN BOSTON.—The Organ leaves us little room to speak of other music this week; nor indeed has there been much to speak of. GILMORE's popular concerts, with the unsatiable charm of CAMILLA Urso's bow, have continued to draw crowds, and will still continue to do so, on Sunday evening and afterwards. Excellent concerts of their kind, but why call that a "Sacred" concert, in which "Old Hundred" is preluded by the "Carnival of Venice"!

The "ORPHEUS" gave one of their charming invitation concerts at Chickering's hall on the evening of the 14th, with their usual fine part-song and chorus singing, and with Mr. Leonhard as pianist, and Messrs. Kreissmann, Schraubschilder, Langerfeldt, as solo singers. This was the programme:

1. Chorus. "Auf dem Rhein" ....	Kücken
2. Song. "Trockne Blumen" ....	F. Schubert
3. Chorus. { a. "Das Lieben bringt gross' Freud" R. Frasn
{ b. "Der traumende See" R. Schumann
{ c. "Überall bin ich zu Hause" R. Frasn
4. Piano Solo. { a. Rille Sicherheit } E. Schumann
{ b. Die Harrende }
{ c. Im Wald }
5. Songs. { a. Stille Sicherheit } F. Schubert
6. Double Chorus. Schlachtlied. ....	F. Schubert
7. Piano Solo. { a. Schottischer Barden Chor. ....	Chopin
8. Chorus. { b. Der Waldmann. ....	Silcher
9. Song. Wie schön bist du. ....	Mueller
10. Chorus. { a. Spinnerlied. ....	Weidt
{ b. Der Philister. ....	Appel

WORCESTER, MASS.—Handel's pastoral, "Acis and Galatea," was performed this week by the Hamilton Club, with the aid of the Mendelssohn Quintette Club from Boston.

GERMAN OPERA.—The company of Herr Anschütz, after remarkable success in Baltimore, are to open on Monday evening in Philadelphia.

THE HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY are rehearsing the "Hymn of Praise," and Handel's "Ode to St. Cecilia," for performance in connection with the Great Organ. By the way, it is all a mistake about that Society monopolizing the use of the Music Hall on Sunday evenings; that arrangement was cancelled two years ago, when the rehearsals were transferred to Chickering's.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, OCT. 26.—The week closed with "Ione," Theo. Thomas's matinée, and the Philharmonic rehearsal, with the usual Philharmonic storm. Notwithstanding the unpropitious state of the weather, the attendance at each of these performances was very good. At Irving Hall, Mr. THEO. THOMAS inaugurated a series of matinées, which promise great popularity. The programme, which was interpreted by thirty of the most accomplished performers in the city, included the "Prometheus" overture, by Beethoven; Selections from Verdi's "Un Ballo in Maschera; the "Aurora Ball" polka, by Strauss; and the "Bijouterie" quadrille by the same composer. Messrs. Thomas and Mollenhauer performed the "Oberlaendler" by Gangl. Miss Lucy Simons who made a most successful debut at the first Gottschalk concert, Gottschalk, and Harry Sanderson were the soloists, and Sig. Muzio conductor. The programme of these matinées will be such as to please those who are fond of variety and good music.

A symphony and overture, by Beethoven, Schumann, or some like composer, together with selections from the popular operas, and well-known polkas, waltzes and quadrilles, will be played at each concert. The second matinee is announced for next Saturday, with Gottschalk, Sanderson and several other favorite artists.

The second public rehearsal of the Philharmonic Society, took place on Saturday at the Academy of Music. The instrumental pieces in preparation for the first concert on Nov. 7, are:

Symphony No. 3, op. 61, in C. Schumann.
Overture, "Coriolanus," op. 62, in C minor, Beethoven.
Overture, "Flying Dutchman," in D minor, R. Wagner.

Notwithstanding the increase in the price of subscription, the Philharmonic seems to be well supported this season. The change from Irving Hall to the Academy of Music, although entailing a greater expense, will be more than balanced by the additional pleasure to the subscriber. Mr. CARL BERGMANN will be the conductor at the first concert.

GOTTSCHALK's third concert takes place this evening at Irving Hall. Mr. Gottschalk will be assisted on this occasion by Miss Fannie Riddle, Wm. Castle, Theo. Thomas and Behrens. The first and second concert were immensely thronged and, although on opera nights, the number prevented from entering were sufficient to fill the house. A performance of ROBERT STOEPEL's "Hiawatha" will take place on Nov. 7. MATILDA HERON will recite the poem, and the musical cast will be as follows: Mrs. J. M. Motte as Minnehaha, Mr. Wm. Castle as Hiawatha, Mr. S. C. Campbell as the Great Spirit. The choruses will be sung by the members of the New York Singing Academy. The concert to be given for the benefit of the family of the late HERMANN A. WOLLENHAUPT, the pianist and composer, will take place on the evening of Nov. 4, at Irving Hall, which building has been most generously offered for the purpose by Mr. Harrison. The following committee have the matter in charge: Gen. Wm. Hall, President; C. Beer, Treasurer; Henry C. Watson Secretary; Messrs. Steinway, C. B. Seymour, W. H. Fry, Theo. Hagen, H. A. De Lille, Max Maretzek, L. F. Harrison, Wm. A. Pond, Charles Fradel, E. Remac, M. Masseras, and Paul F. Nicholson. The affair will doubtless be a great pecuniary and artistic success. The gratuitous offer of the house and the services of some of our most eminent artists speaks well for the profession, and the position the deceased occupied in it.

The performance of "Ione," Petrella's great work, on Saturday evening, was one of the most successful of the season, and is placed by the side of that of "Norma," which has met with such a great success by the fine rendition of Maretzek's troupe. "Ione" was announced for the second and "last time" on Saturday evening; but it is to be hoped that the management will see fit to announce it on their bills for future performance. It is a work of power, and there is a wonderful unanimity in regard to its merit. Medori, Sulzer, Mazzoleni, Bellini and Biachi could not select more effective roles, nor do them more justice.

To-night Verdi's "Macbeth" will be repeated with Medori, Sulzer, Lotti, Bellini and Biachi. Novelties are announced in preparation. There will soon be exciting times in operatic matters. Grau is on his way here from Europe, and will soon start an opposition line with his company, with Brignoli at the head. Maretzek will have to look sharp or he will be eclipsed by Grau. When or where the latter will inaugurate his operatic enterprise is not yet known.

Maretzek has just commenced a suit against the editors of a well-known Sunday paper for libel. The articles were drawn forth by the refusal of Max to give the opera advertisement and the usual free ticket to said paper. It is thought that Max will obtain judgment for damages, which he lays at ten thousand dollars. T. W. M.

CHICAGO, ILL., OCT. 10.—That Boston is regarded as the "hub of the universe," while Chicago is "the centre," belongs strictly to geography, and is mentioned in your Journal, only to show that there is much affinity between these two cities. This affinity might even be proved on the "Journal's" own ground. Boston is the Athens of the East, while influential and far-seeing men strive to make Chicago the centre of the West, in Commerce, Education and Music. Limiting my remarks to music, let me say, that like its grade of the streets, its present grade of music is already eight feet above water. Every one who has lived here but a couple of years, seems to be doing "a first rate" business. There are here about as many Piano-fortes or Melodeons as there are parlors; and the number of teachers and pupils of Music is on the increase. The Philharmonic Society, under the leadership of the accomplished Mr. Balatka, will soon show signs of life; and the Chicago Musical Union, a society of singers under the same leader, which in former years has performed Haydn's "Creation," Handel's "Messiah," and Mendelssohn's "Elijah," will this year take up a German opera for practice. The new Directory of the city mentions two other societies, of which in due time we shall get some information; nor must the splendid male quartet club of Mr. George F. Root be forgotten.

Singing has been taught formerly in our Public Schools, but of late the city feels to poor to pay a singing master's salary, and three years ago vocal music was stricken from the branches taught at the public expense. A few days ago, however, the Board of Education voted to appropriate $500 for the ensuing year to this purpose, provided a like sum be raised by subscription; and whoever knows the activity and influence of Mr. Cady and Messrs. Root, or the liberality of the members of the Musical Union, cannot doubt that the amount will soon be forthcoming.

Chicago cannot yet boast of a large hall which would answer the demand of a large city, and the nineteenth century, but it has a number of new and splendid church edifices. The organs are all of small or medium size, and are treated by the players much better than they deserve. One of the finest organs, if not the best one, is in St. Paul's church, was built in 1856 by Erben, and Miss L. S. Tillinghast has filled the place as organist for several years. She is soon to be married to Mr. R. R. Frohock, who intends to open a new music store in Boston. We would bespeak for her a warm reception in your city. She is a lady of talent, taste, and executes very finely. At a private organ concert, which she recently gave to her friends, she performed among other difficult compositions, Bach's Sonata in E flat, Bach's Toccata in F, Mendelssohn's Sonata No. 4, Adagio from Mozart's Overture in B flat, and Bach's Fantasia and Fugue in G minor. The manner in which she played the Pedals, would do credit even to Mr. Paine in your city, and I know of no lady player equal to her in performing on the organ. We hope she will make the acquaintance of the new organ in your Music Hall, will there among others gain a hearing, and soon be engaged as an organist in the Eastern metropolis.

The singing in most of our churches is done by quartets, and in the Trinity church the choir varies so much from the inflexible Episcopal form, as to sing a voluntary before the regular morning and evening services. The protestant Germans stick to their time-honored way of singing their sterling chorals by the whole congregation. The Sunday-schools in this place devote a considerable portion of their time to singing, and the coöperation of these religious institutions must be felt before long. CHS. A.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE
LATEST MUSIC.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Vocal Beauties of "Faust," by Gounod.
The pleasures of youth (A moi les plaisirs) Song. 25
All hail! welcome. (Salut, O mon dernier). 35
All hail! live innocent. (Salut!). Song. 35
The King of Thulé. (Le Roi de Thulé). Ballad. 25
The golden calf. (Le veau d'or). Song. 25
Glory immortal. (Gloire immortelle). 25
Angels, pure and glorious. (Ange purs), Trio. 50
The hour is late. (Tardi si fa). Duet. 50

The new opera of "Faust" seems to have taken the European musical public by storm. Gounod has succeeded in uniting the mystical German story with most light, cheerful, and at the same time excellent French music, which will before long, be as well known among us as that of the standard operas. There is space in this number to notice but:

The King of Thulé. (Le Roi de Thulé) 25
This exquisite, though simple ballad, which is sung by Marguerite of Rouet at the spinning wheel, tells of the King who was "faithful unto death"; and:

The Golden Calf, (Le veau d'or). 25
Sung by Mephistopheles, the roguish devil. The song is a fine specimen of sarcasm, and just the reverse of Marguerite's simple lay.

Now shines with clear, (Nel sol quand' i piu splendido). From "Ione." 40

This is one of the gems of the opera, and is sung by Ione, the beloved of Glaucus.

In affliction and heavy sorrow (Al' afflittio) Romance from "Robert Devereux." 25

Robert Devereux is considered by many, one of the very best works of Donizetti, and the songs which are now appearing, with English, as well as Italian words, will be welcome to amateurs.

Instrumental Music.

Dividenden Waltzer, Johann Strauss. 50

Strauss's waltzes appeared in such profusion, that he was, at times, dreadfully pushed for a name. In the present set, those who invest in Strauss, will receive a large "dividend" of unusually good dance music.

5th Air varié. Violin and Piano. De Beriot.

A very graceful composition, by an acknowledged master of the violin. Does not appear to be very difficult.

La Belle Canadian Polka. Karl M. Fehr. 25

Who will come for mother now. Variations.

A. Baumbach. 50

Will be welcomed by teachers, and others who like to play a pretty melody, gracefully varied.

Gems of Petrella's opera "Ione." A. Baumbach. 50

Purchasers of this piece, may enjoy, in advance, a choice selection of melodies, which they will afterwards admire in the coming representations of the opera.

Books.

THE MUSICAL LYRA.—A collection of Glee, Quartets, and new Operatic Choruses, original and selected. By F. H. Pease. Price $1.00

It is no easy matter for a music teacher to find a good glee book for his choir or advanced singing classes. Some have been used before. Some are too difficult, some too flat, and some have too many old pieces; good of course for beginners in glee singing, but not novel enough for the present purpose. The Musical Lyra is a fresh book. Nearly all the music and words are entirely new. The words are good compositions or well selected; and the writers of the music deserve credit for combining great variety of arrangement, with simple harmony. The pieces from new operas are first-rate.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being about one cent on each piece. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that it is double.

The Organ.

From the German of HERDER.

O, tell me who contrived this wondrous frame,
Full of the voices of all living things,—
This temple, which, by God's own breath inspired,
So boldly blends the heart-appalling groan
Of wailing Miserere with the soft
Tones of the plaintive flute, and cymbal's clang,
And roar of jubilee, and hantoy's scream,
With martial clarion's blast, and with the call
Of the loud-sounding trump of victory.

From lightest shepherd's reed the strain ascends
To cymbal's thunder and the awakening trump
Of judgement. Graves are opening! Hark, the dead
Are stirring!

How the tones hang hovering now
On all creation's mighty, outspread wings.
Expectant, and the breezes murmur! Hark!
Jehovah comes! He comes! His thunder speaks!

In the soft-breathing, animated tone
Of human words speaks the Allmerciful.
At length the trembling heart responds to him;
Till, now, all voices and all souls at once
Ascend to heaven—upon the clouds repose—
One Hallelujah! Bow, bow down in Prayer!

Apollo tuned the light guitar; the son
Of Maia strung the lyre; mighty Pan
Hollowed the flute. Who was this mightiest Pan
That blent the breath of all creation here?

Cecilia, noblest of the Roman maids,
Disdained the music of the feeble strings, Praying within her heart, "Oh that I might
But hear the song of praise, the which of old
Those holy three* sang in the glowing flames,—
The song of the Creation!"

Then there came
An angel who had oft appeared to her
In prayer, and touched her ear. Entranced she heard Creation's song. Stars, sun and moon, and all Heaven's host, and light and darkness, day and night,
The rolling seasons, wind and frost and storm,
And dew and rain, hoar-frost and ice and snow,
Mountain and valley in their spring attire,
And fountains, streams and seas, and rock and wood,
And all the birds of heaven and tribes of earth,
And every thing that hath breath, praised the Lord,
The holy and the merciful.

She sank
In adoration: "Now, O angel, might I
But hear an echo of this song!"

With speed
He sought the artist whom Bezaleel's
Devoted soul inspired; in his hand
He placed the measure and the number. Soon
Uprose an edifice of harmonies.

The Gloria of angels rang; with one
According voice, great Christendom intoned
Her lofty Credo, blessed bond of souls.

And when, at holy sacrament, the chant,
"He comes! Blessed be he who cometh!" rang,
The spirits of the saints came down from heaven,
And took the offering in devotion. Earth
And heaven became a choir; the reprobate
Shook at the temple's door, and seemed to hear
The tramp whose clang proclaimed the day of wrath.—

With all the Christian hearts Cecilia Rejoiced, for she had found what every heart

* Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego.

Seeks with strong yearning in the hour of prayer,—
Union of spirits—Christian unity.

"How shall I name," said she, "this many-armed River which seizes us and bears us on To the wide sea of the eternities?"
"Call it," the angel said, "what thou didst wish;
Call it the ORGAN of the mighty soul,
Which sleeps in all, which stirs all nations' hearts,
Which yearns to intone the everlasting song
Of universal nature, and to find
In richest labyrinth of hearts and sounds
Devotion's richest, fullest harmony."

History of the Great Organ.—Dr. Upham's Report.

GENTLEMEN;

It may be expected of me, perhaps, on behalf of the Directors of this Corporation and in virtue of my official relations, to say a word to you—the Stockholders of the Association, and subscribers to the organ fund, who, with a few others, have been invited here this evening, to a sort of informal test of that work towards which you have manifested so much interest, and which now after the labor of seven years, has been brought to the point of completion. What I have to say will be mainly in the nature of an official report—and I must claim your indulgence during the recital of such dull details as I may offer, in the statement of which I will endeavor to be as brief as possible.

If we refer to the announcement, made by the Directors eleven years ago, of the musical festivities which were to commemorate the completion and opening to the public use, of this noble hall, now again restored to more than its pristine fitness and beauty, we shall learn that the proceeds of that occasion, after deducting expenses, were to be applied "to form the nucleus of a fund, which, at some future day, might furnish the Hall with an Organ of the first class."

The expenses of the evening were heavy, the next amount realized by the festival being only about $920. This was the germ of that fund which has ever since kept steadily growing—by individual munificence—by private subscriptions, and by liberal appropriations from time to time of the money and credit of the corporation, till enough was guaranteed to insure the undertaking of what I will venture to place among the most perfect structures of the kind that the world contains;
—till enough, I say, was vouchsafed to warrant the undertaking of the project—although the usual incubus of a debt weighs now, as it has done all along, upon this, as upon so many other works, begun, continued and ended mainly upon faith. Therefore as we commenced, so must we end, by an appeal to the art-loving citizens of Boston for their liberality and their patronage, till this debt shall be ultimately extinguished, and a fund created to keep the organ in perpetual efficiency and repair.

I shall not go into all the details of the history of the "Great Instrument," as it has been fitly termed, and most eloquently described, by one who touches with his magic pen no subject, whether in the realm of literature, science or art that he does not adorn, and not adorn only but exhaust.
There are some points in this history, however, yet to be gleaned, which it may be of interest to state to you here.

Almost immediately upon the organization of the Board of Directors, a special Committee was appointed for the study and investigation of the whole subject, with a view to the future procurement of an appropriate instrument. Information, —knowledge of the subject was the first requisite,
—from books, and from personal observation and experience, to obtain which the whole field must be gone over faithfully, patiently, thoroughly.

Starting then with this idea, after a sufficient time spent in understanding the theory and philosophy of the matter, the Committee betook themselves to more practical inquiries, by the personal examination of the best works to be found in this department of mechanical and artistic achievement, first in our own city, afterwards in various towns in New England, and in New York and elsewhere. But no one state, or country or continent, could furnish the sum of that knowledge that was requisite for the full understanding of the subject, and the bringing to pass of that perfection of results at which they aimed.

In the summer and autumn of 1853 the committee extended their researches in Great Britain, France, Switzerland and Germany, collecting such written works, and specimens of mechanical structure in the niceties of the art, as they could obtain in the countries visited.
On their return, the facts and experiences in the art of Organ-building thus gained, were compared with the conditions that obtained at home,—compared patiently and candidly and with most loyal and catholic spirit. It is no disparagement to the ingenuity and skill of our own manufacturers to say, that here the vantage ground lay unmistakably in the acquisitions which the accumulated experience of centuries had given to the handicraft of the old world.

This must needs be so. Organ-building is of ancient origin. It is older than the civilization of this Western world. The magnificent instrument which stands in the Church of St. Catharine in Hamburg was finished before the foundations of the first church at Jamestown were begun; and the fine Organ in the Church of St. Peter, in the same city, which was burned in the great fire in 1842, was in its prime of vigorous manhood when the red man was listening to the diapasons of the storm upon our shores undisturbed.

And from the time the disciples of John first heard, in the wilderness about Jordan, the reeds shaken with the wind, until the latest triumph of mechanism, in which the inventive genius of man seems to have been exhausted, it has been a progressive art. It is not by any one nation or people that the present perfection of the instrument has been brought to pass, but all civilized countries have worked together to that end—each in its own measure contributing something towards the grand complete result. Nor is it strange that in this department of science and Art, the builders of continental Europe are still in advance of their livelier neighbors, the craftsmen of Great Britain, when we bear in mind the wholesale destruction in church and cathedral by the iconoclasts under Cromwell, the traces of whose barbarism are not yet extinct; whereby some of the finest specimens of old world mechanism were lost to civilization,—and which it will require a century yet of British industry, and patient and conscientious study and effort to reproduce.

But this is a digression. As I have before said, the proceeds of the first evening's concert, given in this Hall, [on the 20th Nov. 1852] were set apart as a nucleus for an organ fund.

Shortly afterwards, the late Mr. Jonathan Philips made the generous donation of $1000, to the Association. This was without conditions, and at a meeting of the directors held soon after, it was voted that this timely gift should be placed to the same account. With the fund as thus increased, it was afterwards voted to purchase, for temporary use, the organ which, till recently, stood in the niche behind the screen, and for which the Association were then paying a rent of $240 per annum. This instrument, which was considered a large and fine one in its day, has, I may state in passing, been lately disposed of by the Organ Committee, and is now on its way to California.

At a meeting of the Directors, held Nov. 27, 1855, certain propositions concerning the purchase of an organ, together with plans and specifications from organ builders, in this country and in Europe, were brought before the Board, but without definite action thereupon the session adjourned.

On the 10th Dec., in the same year, a proposition from the organ Committee, to take some steps towards the purchase of a grand organ for the Hall, was again discussed. Full particulars as to the construction and cost of such an instrument were given, when, after some deliberation, it was voted to defer the further consideration of the subject to a future meeting.

Early in March, in 1856, the matter was again brought up at a meeting of the Board, and the plan of attempting to raise a private subscription for a portion of the cost of a suitable instrument, was proposed. No very confident anticipations of success from this measure were indulged in by the Board, and, without taking definite action on the subject at that time, they adjourned. The labors of the Committee in that direction were, however, immediately commenced.

The preamble and conditions of that subscription, with your permission, I will read from the little russet-colored book I hold in my hand, (with the physiognomy of which many of you are familiar),—and which are as follows:

We, the subscribers, agree to pay the sums affixed to our names, respectively, towards the purchase of a Grand Organ to be placed in the Boston Music Hall, on condition that the sum of ten thousand dollars be raised by private subscriptions, and an equal amount be appropriated by the Music Hall Association;—the said instrument to be procured under the direction and supervision of the Organ Committee of the Directors of the said Association. It is hereby proposed to obtain an organ of the first class,—one that shall rival in power, in magnitude, and in excellence, the famous instruments of the Old World.

The next official action in the matter was taken at the annual meeting of the stockholders of the Association, held at the Music-Hall, on the 11th day of June, 1856, at which the President, in behalf of the Directors, submitted a Report, in writing, urging, among other things, upon the stockholders, the importance of placing a suitable organ in their Hall. To show the nature and intent of the proposition as then stated, and the reasons which weighed in uniting the votes of the stockholders on that occasion, I beg leave to quote some extracts from that Report, and to recite the purport of the votes subsequently passed:

"It is," says the Report, "the consideration of a plan, having for its object to place in the Boston Music Hall, at no distant day, a Grand Organ, equal in calibre, in power and in quality to the famous specimens which have for so many years excited the admiration and wonder of travellers on the continent of Europe. Just such an instrument the capacity of our hall will allow and requires. Without it, its beautiful architecture will always be incomplete, and its acoustic qualities fail to reach their full perfection.

Of the influence of such an instrument upon the interests of the Association, the value can hardly be estimated. It would place this hall at once, in point of attraction, immeasurably above that of any other institution of the kind in the land, and every year, and at all seasons of the year, we see no reason to doubt, would draw as many pilgrims to its shrine as do the world-renowned organs at Haarlem, at Hamburg, at Ulm, and in the Church of St. Nicholas at Freyburg. To the city and to New England it would be an object of just pride, and to the public would prove a source of the purest enjoyment, and an inculcator of a taste for music, in its highest and holiest forms, for many generations to come.

The subject is one which has at times engaged the attention of each succeeding Board of Directors since the founding of the building. The period has now arrived when they would most respectfully but earnestly urge it upon the notice of the stockholders, and bespeak for it the good will and patronage of the Association.

And in the consideration of a matter so important, it seems particularly desirable to set our standard of excellence high—to be satisfied with nothing inferior to the greatest and the best. Since we are providing for a work that shall stand, it is to be hoped, not for decades only, but for centuries of years.

It must be admitted that a structure, such as is here contemplated, cannot be had without the expenditure of a large amount of funds. But for this expenditure we shall look for adequate results; and in the long run, it is emphatically true in the history of organ building, that the instrument composed of the best materials, and constructed in the most thorough and substantial manner in all its parts, and by consequence of a superior cost, has been found to best subserve the interest of a real economy.

The plan which, after mature deliberation, has suggested itself to the minds of the Directors as most feasible and proper, is this: that the Corporation appropriate the sum of ten thousand dollars towards the enterprise, on the condition that an additional ten thousand be raised by private subscription; the remaining five thousand dollars, or such portion of it as may be required, shall be guaranteed without expense to the Association.*

The plan as thus set forth, was heartily advocated by Judge Putnam, and by Messrs. Hillard, Lamb, Möring, and other stockholders present, and on motion of Mr. Putnam, it was voted that the sum of $10,000 be appropriated by the Music Hall Association, towards the purchase of a Grand Organ for the Hall, of the character mentioned in the Report, and upon the conditions therein named.

It was also voted, that the Directors should be authorized, if it be found necessary, to dispose of the organ then in the Hall, and appropriate the proceeds thereof towards the increase of the fund; and likewise, that all sums appropriated and subscribed for the purchase of the said organ, as contemplated by these votes, should be received and held by the Directors of this Association, in trust for the subscribers, until the purchase be made, and that the said organ, when procured, should be held, used and enjoyed by this Corporation, so long as the Music Hall shall be used for the general purposes for which it is now used, and was originally designed, and that the appropriation of the $10,000, then authorized, be made only upon these conditions; and, finally, that when the said instrument shall have been placed in the Music-Hall, it shall be, at all times, under the general care, control and supervision of the organ Committee of the Directors, for the time being. All these orders were passed unanimously by a stock vote, in which 734 out of 1000 shares were represented.

One important point may arrest our attention for a moment here. It is the grounds upon which the possession of the instrument is held, as suggested in the Report, and subsequently confirmed by the stockholders' votes. It is, on the part of the subscribers, a generous gift to this Association; and the conditions of their appropriations, on the part of the stock-holders themselves, are such, that the instrument can be retained and possessed by them only so long as their hall shall retain its original character; the inference and the intention, it seems to me, being plain, that in case the building shall ever be sold or diverted to purposes foreign to the designs of its founders, then is the organ to be removed to some place of security till such time as another Music-Hall shall be constructed to receive it. Thus it stands, as it is meet it should stand, the guardian in no small measure of our chartered rights, and the hope of Art in future years.

Other appropriations have since been liberally made from time to time, as they were required for immediate use, the corporation not hesitating to mortgage their property as security for payment.

After this meeting, private subscriptions were pushed forward until the stipulated amount of $10,000 was promised—and in October following, one of the organ committee was delegated by the Directors to proceed to Europe and complete the investigation of the subject, make choice of a builder, and execute a contract on the part of the corporation with full powers. This mission was forthwith entered upon, and after a period of about five months, satisfactorily concluded upon terms within the limits designated by the stockholders.

* I may state in explanation here, that it was supposed at this time, the completed work would not exceed in cost the sum of $25,000. It is unnecessary to add, that circumstances beyond human control, have since contributed to more than double this original estimate. The guarantee alluded to in the Report, was readily obtained on conditions satisfactory to the Directors, and is now among the files of the Clerk of the Corporation.

I will not weary you with the details of that tour. Suffice it to say, that no time, nor effort, nor pains were spared to obtain, from whatever sources, the requisite information upon which to base a sound judgment, in the choice of a builder, and the procurement of such contract as should be exact and discriminating in its specifications, and comprehensive and complete in its results. To this end, the principal organs and organ-factories in Great Britain, Holland, Belgium, France and Germany, were critically examined, and plans and specifications from all these sources obtained. In London, the valuable aid of Mr. Hopkins, organist of the Temple Church, and author of a learned work upon the organ, was invoked and cheerfully rendered. Mr. Hopkins entered into the plan with enthusiasm from the first, and has never ceased to manifest his interest in its success.

The contract itself, as originally agreed upon in Frankfurt, afterwards carefully revised by Mr. Walcker in person at Ludwigsburg, and finally, after his visit of inspection among the principal organs and organ-factories of Paris and London, critically reviewed and scrutinized in its every detail and specification, in company with Mr. Hopkins in London, is a formidable document of more than forty pages in manuscript.

In this contract is stipulated, not only the general scope and character of the work—the range and compass of its manuals and pedal—its stops in quantity and quality, their combination and connections, number of pipes, weight and composition of metal, &c., &c.,—but the minute details of all the essential parts, and whatever the resources and possibilities of the art, up to the limits of the time of the construction of the instrument, would permit, were insisted upon on the part of the Directors, and cheerfully acceded to and put into faithful execution by the builder. The brilliant trumpets, in the Swell, for instance, are fashioned like orchestral trumpets of brass, and polished and burnished with the greatest care, although hidden forever from view. Its bassoons and oboes are turned and polished, after the similitude of the instruments of their class. Its traverse flute is of choice wood, in shape like actual flutes, turned and varnished, and fitted with embouchures of brass—its concert flute is of wood, of choicest selection and finest grain, and so on. So, likewise, with the accessory parts of the instrument,—the wind-chests are constructed after a new and admirable invention of the builder, by which the faults which, under the common system of sliders, have been for centuries justly complained of in the best works, are avoided—and the difficulties, to which we in this country are particularly subjected, from sudden changes of temperature and the hygro-metrical conditions of the atmosphere, are almost wholly counteracted. The swell organ includes within its walls a portion of the pedal, and is an instrument complete in itself. Added to this, is an apparatus attached to some of the individual stops, by which to affect the increase or diminution of the sound at pleasure—besides all which is the grand crescendo and diminuendo to the whole work. The combination movements have been studied with the greatest care. By means of an extensive application of the pneumatic lever, lightness is given to the touch; and by a combination of ingenious contrivances, the whole resources of the instrument are brought within easy reach and control of the player. The pitch of the organ was originally stipulated to be in unison with that of the Boston orchestral pitch, at the average temperature of the Music Hall throughout the year, which was found to be about 66° of Fahrenheit. This requisition was subsequently altered so as to correspond with the new orchestral pitch, adopted by the French, which is somewhat more than a quarter of a tone lower than that of England and our own country. For this the organ can justly claim the thanks of all singers, if not, at the first, of the players upon instruments.

But not to weary you with further details of the contract, let me quote its closing paragraph, written down and dictated from the lips of the builder himself, which is as follows:

"And in regard to the execution of this commission, Mr. Walker begs to say, in conclusion, that, as well for the interest of Art, as for the consideration of his own good name, he will faithfully and in good earnest, strive to equal and to rival the merits of his best and most extensive works,—guaranteeing to combine with the excellencies to be found in his own land, such additions as he has met with in his recent visit to France and England, and further to introduce, without especial requirement or additional charge, any improvement of real importance that shall come to his knowledge during the construction of the work."

This indenture being completed,—the usual guarantees for the punctual payment of instalments on our part, and the timely delivery of the instrument on the part of the builder were interchanged—the notarial seals affixed, and the contract closed;—with heartfelt expressions of joy and of gratitude on the part of Mr. Walker, that he was thus permitted to place this latest production of his declining years, and the greatest monument to his name, among the cities of the New World—and with no less passionate regret on the part of Mr. Hopkins, who, with an artist's enthusiasm, bemoaned the day when this completest marvel of a cherished art, sailing westward by the shores of England, should fade from his long-lingering sight.

Of the final completion of the work—its successful ordeal before the most competent and critical judges that could be found in England and on the Continent—its tempestuous and perilous voyage of three months duration across the Atlantic in winter—its providential protection from pirates, and its safe and opportune arrival here in the early months of spring, you have already heard or read.

Immediately after the order for the work had gone forth, copies of the original plans and drawings of the hall were obtained from the architect, Mr. Snell, and sent to Germany, together with a model in wood of the interior of the building, showing with accuracy the measurements of its every part, its material and form of structure and the like, so that the instrument might be adapted precisely to the acoustic requirements of the place that was to contain it,—in strictest accordance with which, in its voicing and intonation—its capacity and fund of reserved power, the organ was designed and constructed.

In regard to the architectural form and enshrinement of the instrument, I have time to say but a word. This part of the work was approached by the Directors with no little diffidence and doubt. No structure of the kind, that could be found in Europe, appeared to meet the somewhat anomalous position that was to be occupied. Hence all estimates, as to its cost—and it was many times guessed at by those who considered themselves knowing in such matters—fell wide of the mark. It was only after months and years of patient effort and trial, that the present fitting habitation for so noble an instrument was obtained. The germ of the structure is a design by Hammatt Billings. His were the outlines, and general form and proportions. But in its present emboliment, if we except the cherubs on the tops of the high towers, and the figure of St. Cecilia, the germ alone remains. The finally-adopted plan, in its artistic and elaborate beauty and grandeur, belongs to the brothers Gustave and Christian Herter of New York, whose designs, when submitted to Mr. Billings, were pronounced by him, with characteristic candor and unselfishness, to be superior to his own, and urged upon the acceptance of the committee.

It is impossible to speak, in terms of too high praise, of the care, attention and conscientious application on the part of Mr. Herter himself, and all in his employ, to the work, during the two years and more of its construction. By almost providential disposal, the right man, whether for colossal figures or minutest detail of ornamentation, seemed to come at his bidding; and, in all this profusion of elaborate richness, nothing was hurried, nothing slighted. Be it the artist (who, in the person of the younger Herter, is present with us to-night) from whose brain, leaped forth Minerva-like, the finished forms of human and ideal things—or the sculptor, by whose cunning these were stiffened into shape and fixed in the willing wood—the modellers in clay and in plaster—the carvers, the carpenters, the finishers—all labored con amore and with one mind towards the perfect result.

Under the admirable management of Mr. Eben Dale, the difficult and delicate task of transporting this vast structure by land carriage, from the workshops of Mr. Herter in New York to the Music Hall, during the last winter, was successfully accomplished, without the least accident or injury.

I should not forget to mention here, what had perhaps been better said in another connection—the successful efforts of Judge Putnam, at Washington, to effect a remittance of the duties upon the instrument, made more than usually onerous by the recent increase of the tariff. In the course of the organ tour abroad, to which allusion has been made, it was ascertained in regard to the large organ placed by the Messrs. Walker, a few years since, in one of the principal churches in St. Petersburg in Russia, that, in consideration of so noble a contribution to Art, the customs were remitted by Imperial Ukase; and it was hoped to obtain, upon like grounds, a similar government favor at home. The weight of eminent names was freely contributed to an application, made in due form to the powers at Washington. On the grounds of imperial precedent or national zeal, we regret to say, our suit did not succeed. But what was reluctantly refused as a nation's boon to Art, was granted when viewed as a purely legal right, upon which the merits of the case were rested by Judge Putnam from the first. The Solicitor of the Treasury, to whom the question was referred by Mr. Secretary Chase, concurring with the Judge that the clause in our charter which defines the purposes and object of this Association, as being a Corporate Institution, established for the advancement of music as an Art, brought us within the category of exemptions named in the tariff act, and justly entitled us to the admission of the organ duty free. Thus at a critical juncture of affairs, an important saving was made in the cost of the instrument.

Some incidents that have occurred during the progress of this enterprise, it may not be improper to mention here—as showing the appreciation the work has already received in foreign lands. The three groups of figures that surmount the central portions of the organ were carved at the Royal Academy of Art in Stuttgart. When finished they were placed on exhibition there and greatly admired. Subsequently, a request was received by the directors, for permission to place them for a time in the great exhibition of the industry of all nations in London, as models of their kind.

About this same time also, came a solicitation from Mr. Walker, endorsed by the State Commissioners and others in Wurtemberg, that a portion of the instrument itself might be set up at the London Exhibition. Both these requests were granted, on condition that the shipment of the organ should not be materially delayed thereby. The project was only reluctantly given up, when it was ascertained that too much time would be thus consumed. Likewise, a few months before the opening of the Great Exhibition, a request came in due form from the Treasurer of the Crystal Palace Association at Sydenham, asking upon what terms a loan of the Boston organ, then nearly completed in Ludwigsburg, could be had for the grand commemoration of Handel—a colossal concert by 4000 picked voices and instruments, to be given in the Sydenham Crystal Palace, on the occasion of the opening of the exhibition. I may say, in parenthesis, that the Sydenham Association were already in temporary possession of a large and fine organ, built for them by the celebrated house of Gray & Davidson in London, and which, it was proposed to take down and lay aside, for the time being, if their proposition was accepted.

This was soon after the commencement of the war—the period of gloom and despondency in financial matters—a time when the organ fund itself was low, and the prospect of its increase not encouraging—when the rates of exchange were rising, and the time for the payment of instalments approaching. The proposition was discussed in full session of the Board of Directors, and its acceptance on certain conditions entertained. A voluminous correspondence followed. Terms and conditions were named on which the loan might possibly be made, and the Directors, reluctantly and in sorrow, were making up their minds to yield into the hands of a rival nation the first fruits of their long years of anxiety and toil,—when upon a sudden, the "Trent affair," in which Commodore Wilkes and Messrs. Mason and Slidell were the principal actors, intervened and put a stop to further proceedings.

In reference to this more than ordinarily interesting feature in the history of our somewhat eventful organ enterprise, I should be glad to present some extracts from the correspondence to which it gave rise, and which I hold in my hand, but the time will not permit. It is unnecessary to add, that, under the circumstances, the Directors were unwilling to entertain the proposition longer, and all further correspondence on the subject was dropped. Such, gentlemen, and after such manner, is the work you have so liberally and in good faith entrusted to our supervision and care.

It remains to tender to the eminent builder, now ripe in years as in the harvest of a well-earned fame,—to the son, Herr Friedrich Walcker, youngest scion of the house, on whom the mantle of his honored father seems already to have fallen,—to the faithful Stünn, the worthy foreman of the factory, and his associates who accompanied the instrument across the seas, and have worked together faithfully and harmoniously during these long months of preparation, to one and all,—our most earnest heartfelt thanks for the responsible part they have taken, each in his own sphere, in the production of this so great and noble creation of Art.

The city that is first in this New World to receive at your hands a legacy so precious and so rare, will delight to hold you in affectionate remembrance, and be the last I am sure, to fail in her allegiance to the land of letters and of song.

Will you, gentlemen—stockholders of this Association—to whom is now committed the formal custody of this sacred trust, suffer from us a single word of entreaty—that you will accept it and keep it—in the broad and liberal interpretation of the terms so well expressed, in the votes you passed unanimously, while it existed only in hope,—as one of the cherished institutions of our favored city. Preserve it with a jealous care from all base or profane and incongruous uses—guard and protect it and watch over it—in the spirit of the sublime motto you have inscribed upon its front,—as the great names that are before you, in their silent eloquence appeal to you to do,—as the image of Sebastian Bach, from its high enthronement, would entreat of you, if he could—as the Great Master of Harmony, standing never more appropriately than now, through whose deaf ears heavenly harmonies are strained once more upon earth, seems almost audibly to beseech of you. Let it be to you and to your children the inculcator of high and noble aims—an educator of generations yet unborn—teaching with its thousand tongues the precepts of religion and virtue and heaven-born charity—from out whose golden mouths shall ever issue PRAISE TO GOD.

Ode.

RECITED BY MISS CHARLOTTE CUSHMAN AT THE INAUGURATION OF THE GREAT ORGAN.

I.

Listen to the invocation!
Now awaking, praiseful breaking,
It shall bear the heart of a nation,
Rising in vast convocation,
Full of honor, full of song,
Upward to the Source of Praise where harmonies belong.

II.

It rises from our city by the fragrant sea,
Where, young, laborious, brave and free,
She stands in her prosperity.

Our fathers clutched the wild shore stark and cold,
Saying, This strand shall be our home,
And let no despot hither come;
Strong of purpose, strong of bone,
We will govern it alone.
Yet Mercy's light our fathers could not gain,
Nor perfect Justice did their hearts contain;
They sinned their sins; the tale is not untold.
And bitterness of arrogance
And wily hate and ignorance
Heaped their poisoned agony
Upon the young-browed colony:
But still the people grew and strengthened as Time rolled.
The towers rose, the bells were swung,
And rifted stone assumed new grace,
While up and down the children sung,
Bringing their sunshine to the place.
After long years their children's children grew
And wandered into foreign lands,
And other nations knew
And saw them bound in cold despotic bands.
At last, in thankfulness, they said,
We will choose from out our own
Those who early loved and reverent laid
Their listening ear to the harmonic shell;
Let them seek in many an antique town,
To find in what recesses dwell
Art's divinest melodies.
Voiceless, shall we as the dead
See the morning spread
Over us her rich surprise?
See the evening's golden tale
Written on each floating sail,
And no people's song arise
Tuneless for our home, our earthly Paradise?
We have sinned, and need a psalm for sadness;
We have joyed and should find voice for gladness;
We will build an organ vast,
It shall sound a noble blast
And wear a stately form;
It shall tell of mountain streams,
Until we hear their quickly flowing dreams,
Ringing to music for our waking hours;
It shall rehearse the tale of pine-strewn woods,
Until their pensive moods
Shall haunt the common street with their weird powers;
They who dwell in inland homes
May learn the murmur of the sea,
Through its tumultuous tone,
Surging, as when the north-wind comes,
After a storm, while yet the fierce waves moan,
And drives the herded clouds across the crystal sea.
Nature in every form that soothes our pain
Shall come to us again,
As when in childhood's hours of rest
We lay upon her breast;
The organ then shall lead the quiring soul
Onward to worlds where unheard anthems roll.

III.

At length the people sought and found
A builder foremost in his art,
Who bled his work dear unto his heart,
The child of his old age.
Tender as a monk of old
Slipping down the scale of years,
Who paints his last stroke on the enamelled page,
So wrought he on this organ for the Free.
At last the long laborious hours were told,
Ended their ecstasies and fears;
Struck by the master's hand, there leaped a sound
From these fresh wells of secret melody.

Bring the wood of choicest grain,
Dyed with hues of richest stain,
Cried the builder old;
And choose a worthy architect,
Whose eye can skillfully select
The subtlest curve in leaf and branch and wave;
Let his obedient hand engrave
Whatever form his busy thought shall name.
Worthy to bind these silver spires within their sculptured frame.

Art-brothers then in answering concord came,
With fancy glowing in the flame.
And flashing upward to their high intent.
The soul of one a instrument
Where Beauty's hand her influence lent,
Until harp lines by him were blent,
And fluted columns lightly sent
To greet the upper air,
Crowned with the forest's leafy hair.
Lost in the convolutions of his work,
We seem to hear the stir of summer wind,
Or rustling birds who lurk
In hidden nooks we seek, but never find.

Another, of athletic mind,
Brought two strong sons of Atlas, doomed to stand
Forever holding up with strained hand
The world of varied pipes and carvings rare;
Caryatids, gloomy-browed,
By his power were allowed
Again to leave the silent halls of Greece
And listen in their toil to Music's voice of peace.
And many were the figures from his soul
Which fled to form and answered his control;
Chief of them all, the master soul of song
Follows with jealous love the keys along.
Last, highest, as if just aite,
See divine Cecilia sit;
She has found our far dominions,
On her wide melodious pinions;
From her rapt lyre it seems she drops
Sweet wandering notes to guide the swelling stops,
While circles into circle breaking,
Wider circles still awaking,
Every sphere can swinging hear
The ripples of our atmosphere,
The growing circles of our prayer;
Circling beyond all time, all place,
And breaking with its suite grace
Upon dim shores of God's illimitable space.

IV.

While thus with strenuous eagerness they wrought,
Thither the black-winged echoes sailing brought
A heavy noise that quelled each rising thought.
A wailing as of "War,"
Now near and now afar,
Darkened the star-sown firmament of Peace,
Wherever men should look to find release.
Black was the sky, and blacker still it grew,
While Faith alone the unred future knew.
Still the work was bravely sped.
Though in faint souls Hope was dead.
Or distant as a murmur from the midnight summer sea.
Onward surely went the labor,
While the sharpened clash of sabre
Echoed in the workmen's ear,
Listening yet for Victory.

V.

A voice for weeping,
And a bell for tolling.
Wakeful dreams in place of sleeping.—
Shall we tell no other story
Of our country's hard-won glory?
The organ shall its noble triumphs spread.
Hasten, builders young and builders hoary,
Let its first notes tell the eloquent story
Of fresh desires like autumn lustre shed,
The willing tribute of our faith and glory.

VI.

Now the offering stands completed.
Be its joyful advent greeted!
Lift ye up each mourning head!
It shall sound the heroic dead!
And if the notes must tell of Beauty fled
From this earth-bound portal
To the gate immortal,
Thence, on radiant wing, their resonant might shall bring Fairer Beauty born of Duty,
Beauty fled, but never dead,
The mortal and immortal wed.

O sweet joys vanisbed!
O life-hopes hung on broken thread!
Hearken to-day,
And hear a people say,
"Not for their homes alone
Our martyrs' light hath shone,—
Broad as the land its rays are known;
Too generous to wait till set of sun,
They saw the bitter strife begun,
Rejoiced to know their innocent course was run,
Since with their death the enslaved tasks were done.
Ye, and such as ye, we hold our pledge of Victory!
Ere yet our tears are dry,
We hear the wide resounding cry,
The coming roll of Victory,
And Freedom walks beside her stately car."

Let the musician come,
Fresh from that star where Genius has its home,
Whose sympathetic soul
Sways, like the wind-swept grain,
To human joy or pain.
And yet no passions trample to their base control.
His hand shall vibrate the responsive strings,
Hiding on supernal wings
Of Music's wondrous mystery:
Now, at his touch, unviled are hidden things,
Now falls oppression, now decay false kings;
Through all the tones the voice of Freedom rings
One choral chant, one song of Praise, A NATION'S VICTORY.

From the Diarist.

Vienna, Sept. 20, 1863.

Here are some notes written upon the receipt, early in June, of various articles on Gluck's "Orpheus," which the performance of that opera in New York called out in the papers of that city. These notes were mislaid, and have only recently made their appearance again. True, the occasion which called them out is past, but, as they relate to the truth of history, they cannot be amiss in a journal of music. It is immaterial in what particular papers the short extract commented upon appeared, and I will therefore merely denote them by quotation marks.

1. "Gluck's Orpheus, composed in Paris in 1762."

This opera was composed in Vienna, and produced in the Burg-Theatre, April 5, 1762. Its first performance in Paris took place on the 2d of August, 1774, the original text being translated into French by Moline.

2. "Gluck a German, or perhaps more precisely speaking a Hungarian."

Yes, just as a person born in the north west corner of Vermont is a Pennsylvanian. Gluck was born in Bohemia, just on the borders of Saxony.

3. "Handel assailed the innovator furiously."

When Gluck was a young man of thirty, that is in 1745, he composed an occasional piece, entitled "La Caduta dei Giganti," to be performed in London. The occasion was the rejoicings at the suppression of the rebellion of "Charley, my darling, the young cavalier." The piece ran five nights only. Handel, already sixty years old, and the author of the "Messiah," "Samson," "Israel in Egypt," &c., &c., remarked somewhat contemptuously upon the young man's want of knowledge of counterpoint! Seventeen years afterwards, when Handel was already dead, Gluck succeeded in producing a work (the Orpheus) based upon a system, the idea of which had been awakened in his mind by the works of Handel, and especially Dr. Arne in England, and Rameau in France! The "Alceste," the "Elen e Paride," and two operas for the daughter of Empress Maria Theresa followed, and Gluck still had no thought of Paris or French opera. In 1772, Ronlet, a Frenchman and poet, became acquainted with the composer in Vienna, and persuaded him to compose a text which he had written, "Iphigenie en Aulis."

So Gluck had long been victorious in Vienna, before he ever saw Paris as an "innovator." In Paris, his operas followed each other in this order:—

"Iphigenie en Aulis," April 19, 1774. (One year before the fight at Lexington.)

"Orpheus," August 24, 1774.

"Alceste," April 23, 1776.

"Armide," Sept. 23, 1777.

"Iphigenie en Tauris," May 18, 1779.

"Echo et Narcisse," Sept. 24, 1779.

One of the New York critics gives a mass of fine writing about the production of these operas at Versailles. Unluckily they were not performed there at all. Gluck brought them out in the grand opera in Paris, which then was in "la nouvelle Salle du Palais Royal," which was opened January 26, 1770.

Completion of the Great Organ.—A Week of Musical Festivities.

The "Great Instrument," complete now in its majesty and beauty, and flooding the Music Hall with harmony, has swept into its strong, sonorous current nearly all the musical interest of the past week or two. The subject is so much more interesting than any other that can just now come up to us, and is at the same time so large, as necessarily to almost monopolize our columns. In spite of ourselves, therefore, and at the risk of being called the organ of the Organ, we make this an Organ number of our paper. We have first of all to put on record the incidents of the Inauguration, which embraced a whole week of festivities, public or private, musical or social. And this precludes the continuation in this number of our formal description of the Organ, which has already run through two numbers: we shall resume that in our next. The first and in some respects the most remarkable of these experiences was

THE "PRIVATE TEST."

This occurred on Saturday evening, Oct. 31, in the presence of the subscribers and the stockholders of the Music Hall Association, members of the city government and other invited guests, numbering about a thousand gentlemen. Never were hospitable doors besieged with greater eagerness. A huge green curtain was all that met the first inquiring glance toward the stage end of the hall, veiling the great instrument in mystery:—shall we be allowed to see the wonder, or is the sense of hearing to be the only test at present? Meanwhile all eyes are wandering with pleasure over the renovated walls and ceiling of the hall, for years so dingy and discolored. Thanks to Mr. William J. McPherson, the well-known decorative painter, it is all clean and fresh and beautiful again, as if touched by magic. The tone of coloring is changed, and for the better. That delicate and rather timid roseate tint, that used to flush the walls with a faint sunset light, was beautiful, but, like the sunset, it had too soon faded out. Now, to harmonize the hall with the Organ, the walls have been made somewhat darker and the ceiling lighter. In the words of the Advertiser,

The groundwork of the diamond panneling in the ceiling has been changed to a sea-green color, with mouldings of buff and cream color, finished with a semi-circular gold-finish moulding, of high reflective power, and knotted, at the intersections, with handsome rosettes of full gilt. The wall panels are finished in brown-drab, as also is the niche wherein the statue stands. Heavy gilt mouldings have taken the place of the narrow strips before used and under the brilliant jets from the cornice serve very materially to diffuse the light throughout the hall. Much of the superfluous gilding about the doorways has been changed to the sober, serviceable drab; in this instance as in countless others which occur to the observer, betraying that mixture of good sense and just appreciation of the uses to which the hall is to be devoted, with a refined and artistic taste, which places Mr. McPherson's name chief among those of his calling.

The old and excellent system of lighting the hall by cornice jet is still adhered to, although a 2 1-2 inch main pipe has been substituted for the 1 1-2 inch in the lighting gallery. The burners are all new, and by the new pipe a supply of gas is at command for the most brilliant display requisite for any occasion.

Another and hardly less noticeable feature of the renovation is the reseating of the hall. The loss of room on account of the platform space taken by the organ is amply compensated by bringing the gallery, which ran behind the first balcony, into the hall. This change, desirable for more reasons than one, allows the seats at the end of the balcony, heretofore on a steep incline, to be placed on a grade uniform with the other seats and other rows to be placed along with them. The clock has been removed to the second (upper) balcony,—a little change producing a great effect on the general appearance of this end of the hall. The seats have been newly upholstered, and covered with dark red enamel cloth. They are numbered by an entirely new set of porcelain plates. . . . The whole number of seats in the hall is 2654. . . .

The system of renovation which has bestowed so much care and expense upon the hall proper, has also extended to the entrance-hall, corridors and ante-rooms. New orchestral rooms, very convenient to the Organ, have been arranged, and the waiting and cloakroom enlarged, newly papered, painted, carpeted and furnished, and the lower rooms immediately connected with the upper by a circular stairway. In a word, every thing about the hall looks clean and fresh. The eye delights to dwell on the new arrangement of colors, especially in the evening, when they reflect the light with such clear splendor. Incongruous as the associations of delicate light coloring and gilt with a massive black-walnut structure may seem, the combination cannot offend the eye. On the contrary, the effect is so pleasing as to excite general admiration, as was the case on Saturday night.

There was no set programme of the music. But while all were wondering and waiting and surveying the improvements in the hall, a soft strain arose behind the curtain—invisible, impersonal, as befits organ music—and rapidly grew into a sublime crescendo, and then sank and wandered on in sweet and careless voluntary,—no composition, to be sure, but fascinating and exciting for the time, as the first sounds from the great mysterious instrument must naturally have been. For a quarter of an hour or more, the audience sat listening, in the dim light, perhaps studying to make out the two cherub faces, that seemed to have climbed to the top of the screen, and to be looking over upon us, when suddenly the gaslights flashed forth, and the curtain began slowly and majestically to descend, revealing first the full length of the cherubs with their gilded instruments surmounting the domes of the two central towers; then the chaste beauty of the ribbed and rounded domes; then the triple columns of huge silvery pipes, with St. Cecilia throned in beauty on the summit of the arch between; and so little by little the whole breadth and grandeur of the superb façade, with its grand caryatides, its figures, heads, and wealth of carvings. As the rare symmetry and harmony developed into wonderful completeness, a perfect music to the sight, a symphony in wood and metal, the silence of the rapt audience gave way to a murmur of delight; then round on round of applause swelled in a long crescendo with each new phase of the disclosure, all rising to their feet unconsciously. In the excitement of the scene, none saw how silently the fallen screen was gathered up upon the platform and conveyed away; it seemed as if it had vanished through the floor. From the work to the author; three cheers were called for, rousing ones, and given with a will, for DR. J. B. UPHAM, to whose first suggestion, enthusiasm, wise and persistent energy, in the face of one may imagine how much incredulity and worse, for seven long years, the whole enterprise, now crowned with such complete success, is mainly due.

The enthusiasm of that moment was as unique as it was perfect: the like thereof can hardly have been known before. It was a fresh and sudden inspiration; every body was surprised by his own feeling, and knew that every body shared it. The old world has many a great Organ built away into the architectural wildernesses of its great cathedrals; but was there ever an Organ cheered and clapped before in the assembly of the people? This outburst was in strange contrast with the reverent demeanor of churches, where organs hitherto have properly belonged; yet none the less was there religion in it; for was it not in some sense a recognition of the divine, the hailing of a new triumph of our civilization, of a new type and instrument of that ideal harmony of a more free and perfect life, which is the aspiration of our institutions, never felt so keenly by the true American as in this hour of their peril and the new break of day!

After the applause had subsided, Mr. MORGAN, organist of Grace Church, New York, was introduced and performed the "Tell" overture, giving an appetizing foretaste of the orchestral effects, the variety and contrasts of the many stops in the wonderful instrument; in short, gratifying the general curiosity to know its sounds, which probably was stronger at that moment than any purely musical desire for organ music in the highest sense of Art. Mr. Morgan's mastery of the instrument, even with this short opportunity of studying its peculiarities, was striking and was much applauded. Dr. Upham, as President of the Music Hall Association and Chairman of the Organ Committee, then rendered a most appropriate account of his stewardship, by reading the interesting Report, which we give in full in another part of this paper (with the last revisions of the author), of the seven years labor of the committee, with a history of the whole organ project up to this joyous hour of its completion. By this Report the Instrument was formally transferred to the Music Hall Association, and the tenure of the property defined. The solemn charge conveyed in the closing sentences is indeed an earnest dedication of the instrument to high and worthy uses, and in this spirit should be kept by those who have accepted it. No profanation of so grand an instrument; no unartistic trifling, no courting of a low popularity, no mere mammon worship, with that which in its whole plan and structure, and by its grand outward presence, always suggests the high and the eternal! Dr. Upham was often interrupted by applause, especially when he referred to persons who had rendered signal aid to the enterprise, and above all to Mr. Walcker, the builder, and his son, who sat upon the stage, who rose and modestly bowed during the enthusiastic applause at the mention of his name; also to Herr Sturm, his faithful foreman; to the younger Herter, the designer of the organ house, &c. One of the pleasantest features of the scene was to see this little group of Walcker and his workmen, Herter, &c., seated on the stage, a little apart from the group of Music Hall Directors. The artist spirit shone in the faces of these artisans,—that spirit which has reigned in every department, every detail of the work, from the beginning, and which is the surest guaranty that the Organ is a solid success, that it has more sweet and sterling virtues in it than the first week's or the first year's trials can bring out.

After the address, MR. LANG played a sweet Andante of Mendelssohn, and a part of Rink's flute concerto, tickling the ear of the curious. Cleverly and tastefully he did it; but so far there had been no great organ music, nothing of that in which the organ is supreme. All this skimming with fancy stops, orchestral imitations, &c., was well enough for such an informal occasion, when (as we have said) curiosity and not Art was the motive; but, if one thought of it, it was almost in flat contradiction with the earnest closing appeal of the President. One deeply musical soon wearies of all the pretty fluting and mixing of tone-colors, merely to try effects, of all the sentimental solo-singing upon this stop and that stop, making a Vox humana of each one of them, and ear and soul begin to crave the grand, rich volume of the full organ, infinite and satisfying as the ocean, rolling out the great thoughts of God, and swallowing in oblivion all the little weariness personalities of the smaller music. It was a comfort, therefore, when MR. PAINE unstopped the full organ, and in strong and lusty tones, with grand unfathomable basses, (such as those colossal pipes there promise), poured out the roaring, foaming, lifesome tide of Bach's Toccata in D minor. Many at first may find the continued sound of the full organ confusing and monotonous; but, depend upon it, the ear learns to love and crave such glorious great sonority; it cannot be too great, provided it be musical, its tones all pure, well blended and proportioned, as they here are.

Mr. THAYER, of Worcester, played a Marche Triumphale of his own, and Mr. WILLCOX, with his usual skill, which seems like an instinct, wove together various stops in pleasing combinations, part selected, part impromptu.

The evening ended with a general flocking of the company toward the stage, for a nearer examination of the beautiful details of the work. They seemed a crowd of worshippers going up to a cathedral; and the bronze Beethoven, looking down benignly in the very focus of all that architectural beauty,—how beautiful he looked!—seemed like the idol of their homage.

We have already described the organ front so fully, that we need only notice a few added details here. The mouths of the tin front pipes have been gilded; those of the six great ones in the towers have quaint, antique-looking singing faces, painted on a gold ground, the whole taking a shell-like shape. The spaces in the end towers (hereafter to be filled each by a large pipe), were covered by an ornamental device for the time being,—a series of circular shields containing the opening lines from Dryden's Ode to St. Cecilia:

From Harmony, from heavenly Harmony,
The universal frame began, &c.

The middle space behind Bach, over which the St. Cecilia sits, was dressed with the flags of Wurtemberg and the United States, with stars, a gold wreath over Bach's head, &c.; but this space will be better filled when its destined pipes arrive. The whole, however, is quite tasteful as it stands. And so passed a most delightful and unprecedented evening. All went away extremely pleased with what they had seen and heard of the great Organ, eagerly hoping to hear more.

THE INAUGURATION.

The great occasion, the long expected formal opening, took place on Monday evening, Nov. 2. The tickets at three dollars (it might safely have been five) had been rapidly sold, with the understanding that the proceeds should go to the Organ fund; and the Hall was completely filled with such an audience as only fine occasions can assemble, remarkable for character, distinction, beauty, fashion and fine dresses. Organists and music-lovers from almost every State were present. The great green curtain, as before, withheld the desire of all eyes until the appointed moment; nor was the expectation of the ear much piqued or gratified by the weak strains that oozed lazily forth from the veiled oracle. There was no pretence of really playing, or of showing off the instrument, it was simply to fill the time while people waited; had it been ever so good, it would have still been a mistake, because an organ voluntary, before a whole concert of organ music, can only be like eating while one waits for dinner. Silence had been better, until the proper time for music; the rambling and superfluous prelude brushed some of the bloom off from the fine fruits significantly grouped together in the

The Ode "by a lady of Boston" (now understood to be Mrs. JAMES T. FIELDS), came not more providentially than did the gifted, noble woman who recited it, upon the very eve of her return to Europe. Miss CUSHMAN's delivery was fervent, graceful and impressive, entering heartily into the elevated thought and spirit of the poem. Plainly the Organ had inspired the poem; its "lofty rhyme" was "built" with enthusiasm, with a fine, if an untutored, sense of the significance and the grand uses of the Instrument, fitly connecting it with the social destiny of our free nation. Such an ode would do honor to a much more practised and distinguished authorship; with all its inequalities, occasional weak lines, and so forth, we think, with a writer in the Transcript, that it is, "in poetic conception and expression, far superior to the great majority of similar productions in England and the United States;" "in the qualities of structure and imaginative poise and verbal expression of high thought conspicuously excellent." But the best about it is, for that occasion, that the poem finds so much of poetry in the labor which planned and built the Organ, that it appreciates the organ in its wide relations ("Circle into circle breaking, Wider circles still awaking," &c.); that it demands that it be kept true to the dignity and grandeur of its design, and that only the earnest artist use it in Art's pure, soulful, self-forgetting service:

Let the musician come,
Fresh from that star where Genius has its home,
Whose sympathetic soul
Sways, like the wind-swept grain,
To human joy or pain,
And yet no passions trample to their base control.

And thus was this noble instrument once more consecrated by this Ode to earnest uses, as it already was by the earnest appeal at the close of the President's report; as it was by the earnest character of the musical programme of the inauguration; as it is by the grand bust of Bach forever looking earnestly out from the centre of his house, by the earnest style of the organ architecture, by the earnestness of its entire design and of all the thought and labor that have patiently produced it.

The Ode was thus the formal, earnest act of consecration; for true effect, the earnest music should immediately have followed. But the dramatic surprise, which at this moment intervened, while it was a disturbing element so far as the opening of the stately music was concerned, was interesting in itself, as well as rendered necessary for certain reasons.—After Miss Cushman had seated herself amid vigorous applause, screened behind the immense bouquet presented by the President, soft strains again rose from within the Organ, swelling louder and louder as the curtain slowly descended in the same manner as before; and there was unbounded demonstration of enthusiasm, ladies waving their handkerchiefs (though it was not in the nature of things that such a pitch as that of Saturday could be reached twice), and Herr Friedrich Walcker was seen seated at the keyboards. Being led forward and introduced to the audience by Dr. Upham, amid most loud and cordial greeting, he modestly declined to do more than touch a few chords on the organ, not deeming himself an organist, and having been induced to do this little rather in the sense of accepting a just compliment as representing the builder, and of simply drawing a few sounds from the finished instrument in the act of formally delivering it to those for whom it had been made. We are careful to say this, in justice to Mr. Walcker, because some of the correspondents of New York newspapers have stupidly and cruelly entered into criticism of his performance, when no "performance" was pretended or intended, more than the modest little that was done.

As Mr. Walcker rejoined the little group of his associates upon the stage, the powerful rays of an electric light were thrown upon the organ front bringing out much of its detail with great clearness. The effect was startling, brilliant, but disturbing to the more important portion of the musical exercises which then came in order. Even the unscrewing of the organ at that moment was somewhat fatal to true musical enjoyment, which requires silence and a quiet state of mind. But now all was flutter and excitement, all were wondering and exclaiming at the glorious sight so suddenly revealed, pointing out its beauties one to another, and so forth; all which would have had its hour and have subsided, had the front been visible from the beginning. But now this dazzling, unquiet, tremulous light was a new and an irresistible distraction, and it lasted long enough to render the larger part of the audience insensible to more than the mere sound of the whole first part of the music, which was all by BACH, the master of masters in the true organ music,—the fittest of all music to follow immediately upon the Ode in this solemnity, and constituting par excellence the musical consecration of the great instrument. Not until that nervous jack-o'-lantern got its quietus, did the mass of the audience really begin to listen and appreciate. Such effects should be reserved to the end of a programme; on a musical occasion let sight-seeing wait the convenience of hearing.

Amid these disturbing circumstances it was that Mr. PAINE, in his quiet and sincere artist spirit, with reverence for the organ and the master and the task, sat down to play the Toccata and the Sonata Trio. Those who knew how good it was, and therefore listened, were pleased and edified. They did not find the Toccata all a great roaring and fatiguing noise, but felt its mighty inspiration, its refreshing grandeur, its inexhaustible suggestion as of the ocean rolling in upon the beach. Nor did they hearken so indifferently and so obtusely as to confound the Trio Sonata in their memory afterwards in one unremitting blare of full organ with the Toccata—calling it all "fugue" too—when in fact the Sonata was played on soft stops, with alternation and contrast of voices, as well as of tempo in the several movements. The only fugue, strictly speaking, was the glorious G minor played by Mr. THAYER, which made the proper balance and finale to the appropriate trilogy (so to speak) of great works of Bach. Both of these young artists acquitted themselves admirably, the latter doing credit to himself and to his teacher who preceded him.

Part II. was more miscellaneous, although many of the smart newspaper reporters have complained of the whole programme as "heavy," they betting only on the "light weights." But what was the main design of the programme? what was the meaning of the whole occasion? The music was not chosen, nor ought it to have been chosen, with mere regard to the momentary entertainment. The object was to inaugurate the organ, to pledge and consecrate it to its high and noble uses, to sound, as it were, the keynote of its central purpose, of its future influence for good, from which it frequently may modulate to lighter variations, but to which it must remain ever loyal and continually return. It was not built for a hand-organ. The programme, therefore, was so selected as to be worthy of the occasion, interpretative of the true worth of this new possession, and such as might be read with pride hereafter in the story of our Organ. It was not made to amuse, nor to gratify mere curiosity about new sounds and stops, nor to show off the skill of the performers or institute any comparisons between them, nor to provoke encores, nor to try to beat the fashionable virtuosos and "monster concert" givers at their own poor game; but it was made so as to represent the principal worthy schools of organ music, so far as available organists and time and opportunity admitted of it, and, above all, to reveal something of the proper grandeur and beauty of the Organ in its impersonality. And it is much to the honor of the organists on that occasion, that they so cheerfully and reasonably consented to merge their own personalities in the unity of that design, forgetting themselves in the Organ and its great mission, not thrusting themselves between it and the people. This they did so truly, that criticism on their individual performances is out of place. Suffice it to say that every one did his work well, and every one gave pleasure, just in proportion as he was truly listened to. One more to one class and one more to another, of course, according to the various tastes and culture of an audience rather too fashionable to partake of the musical heaven so generally as we sometimes find on more everyday occasions.

Mr. MORGAN rolled out the great 32-foot basses with superb effect in those "Israel in Egypt" choruses, and had to answer to an irresistible recall. This again disturbed the programme, and more than it need have done, had he simply responded with another piece of Handel, at once in keeping and in contrast with what he had played—for his part was indeed too short; but the introduction just there of the "Star-spangled Banner" with fantastic variations, with the Fourth of July illumination of the flag and the outburst of patriotism in the wrong place, made all confused and heterogeneous; artistic unity was gone beyond recovery, fluttered away like frightened birds. And yet again he was recalled and played. No wonder the people were delighted with his brilliant execution; he is the most experienced and clever master of the instrument we have, perhaps, and he does all good-naturedly and tellingly; it was not all his fault but the public's, if he had to overstep the proprieties of the occasion. Mr. LANG's choice of stops in the Mendelssohn Sonata was most appropriate, and revealed rare beauties in the organ as well as in the composition; it was richly enjoyed. Dr. TUCKERMAN had for his task to discourse a little of the music of the grand old Italian church school and of the old English school which builds upon it; pieces not written for the organ, but yet in the organ spirit. Although he had just risen from long illness, his favorite music did not suffer in his hands. The Offertoire, performed so admirably by Mr. WILLCOX, had more of thought and serious purpose in it than most of the French music, and was a very effective specimen of that school. It served well his peculiar talent for contrasting and combining various stops; the leading melody, several times recurring, showed how finely characteristic are some of the tones of the new organ, as the flutes, the softer reeds (hauteboy and bassoon, Vox angelica, &c.), and the firm, ringing quality of the trumpet in the great organ. Mr. W. also was encored. His is the art to mix stops as the painter mixes and tries colors on his palette. What he did was done gracefully and modestly. Handel's "Hallelujah" made a fit and welcome close to an occasion which, like some other great things, Niagara for instance, will be even greater in the memory hereafter than it was in the actual presence.

THE COMPLIMENTARY DINNER.

On the evening of Tuesday, Nov. 3d, an entertainment was given at the Revere House by the directors of the Music Hall Association to Mr. WALKER, and the other artists, who have, in various ways and in their several departments, worked harmoniously together in the structure of the great organ. It was a natural and just expression of gratitude to a body of men who have toiled for us with a sincere devotion to art and a noble elevation of aim, which have given dignity to the humblest mechanical function which the enterprise has called forth. With the exception of a certain number of official personages—including the Governor, the Mayor of Boston, the President of Harvard College, the Chairman of the Board of Aldermen, the President of the Common Council, and the Superintendent of public Schools—the invitations were limited to persons who had in some way or other, at some time or other, aided in the enterprise which has culminated in the great organ, or been in some way associated or identified with it. Between thirty or forty persons sat down at about nine o'clock to an entertainment served with the taste and elegance which may always be found at the Revere House.

Dr. Upham presided at the table with a frank simplicity and cordial sincerity of manner, which were much better than the most elaborate graces of rhetoric would have been without them. He began by giving a brief and unstudied narrative of some interesting points in the history of the organ, and after paying a generous tribute to the professional eminence and private worth of the elder Walker, called upon the company to drink to the health of the younger, his son, whose excellent services were duly commended. Mr. Walker in a few simple and modest words, evidently spoken with strong feeling, made proper acknowledgment on behalf of his father and of himself. Mr. Herter, one of the firm of Herter Brothers, by whom the carvings of the frame were mostly executed, was then called up, and in a few appropriate words returned thanks for the honor which had been done. Dr. Upham next called upon the Governor of our Commonwealth, with a happy allusion to the triumphant vote by which he had just been re-elected. Gov. Andrew was warmly received, and spoke with his usual hearty sincerity and kindness of manner. He said that he esteemed it to be a fortunate element in his own lot that he should have chanced to be presiding over the Commonwealth at the time when its Capital city was enriched by this matchless instrument. The Mayor of Boston followed in a few appropriate remarks on behalf of the city of Boston. The Rev. Dr. LOTHROP, who spoke with great feeling, stated some of his experiences connected with the school committee, especially in regard to music in the public schools, and paid an emphatic tribute to the value of Dr. Upham's services in that department. He told the company of the vote which had been passed in the School committee that afternoon, by which the children of the public schools were allowed to lend their aid by singing in behalf of the organ. He described the emotions which he had felt and shared with the audience at the Music Hall on Saturday evening when the curtain fell and revealed the organ's glorious front. The President of Harvard University expressed his gratification at the happy consummation of the enterprise for procuring a first-class organ for the city of Boston, which could not fail to be of service to the community in which it stands, in an intellectual and moral point of view. Mr. JAMES T. FIELDS then read a graceful poem in honor of Germany, the land which had sent us the organ, which was received, as it deserved to be, with warm enthusiasm. Mr. HILLARD, who was next called up, expressed his pleasure at being present, and said he was a representative of those who loved good music without being skilled in it. He spoke of the completion of the organ as an interesting event in the history of New England. He said that it was highly desirable to extend the cultivation of music and a taste for it among the people of New England, especially in the rural portions, as giving a grace and variety to our common life which it now lacked. He spoke of the great progress which had been made in this respect from his own youth, and of the great benefits which New England had received at the hands of Germany, the land of art, and how much our life had been decorated and sweetened by German music and German musicians. He concluded with a sentiment embodying the idea that a true life was one in which labor and art were blended in due proportions. Dr. HOLMES was next called up, and the mention of his name produced a warm greeting from the audience. He had been lecturing for an hour and a half in the early part of the evening, but neither in voice nor manner did he show the slightest signs of weariness. He read a brilliant and sparkling poem, which was received with hearty and due applause. Judge PUTNAM, who followed Dr. Holmes, gave an account of the manner in which the duties on the organ came to be remitted. Mr. HALE, the President of the Common Council, spoke briefly and appropriately. Mr. PHILBRICK gave some interesting details on the subject of education in Wurtemberg, which he pronounced to be superior to that of most of the German states. We have his speech in full and shall give it in our next.

The company dispersed at an early hour, in one sense, after an evening of rare social satisfaction.

THE SECOND AND THIRD CONCERTS.

These occurred on the ensuing Thursday and Saturday evenings, with still large audiences, the latter at reduced prices; and thus the week of Inauguration concerts passed in a way that more than satisfied most sanguine expectations,—and with a substantial addition, we trust, to the Organ fund. But our space is so run out that we can barely give their programmes now, reserving comments for a general survey of results after a week more of trials of the organ. The second was divided between three performers, thus:

- Part I. By W. Eugene Thayer, of Worcester.
1. Concert Variations: Star Spangled Banner. W. E. Thayer.
  2. Overture to Le Serment. Auber.
  3. Offertoire. Battiste.
  4. Grand Triumphant March. W. E. Thayer.
- Part II. By John K. Paine.
1. Prelude and Fugue in A minor. Bach.
  2. Choral Varied: "Christ the Lord to Jordan came." Bach.
  3. Andante and Allegretto. Mendelssohn.
  4. Reverie; Suggested by Longfellow's "Song of the Silent Land." J. K. Paine.
- Part III. By George W. Morgan.
1. Overture—William Tell. (By request). Rossini.
  2. Fugue in D major. Bach.
  3. Slow Movement. (Sym. No. 2). Beethoven.
  4. Turkish March (Ruins of Athens). Beethoven.
  5. Movement from the Lessons. Handel.

The third programme was as follows:

- Part I.
1. Prelude and Fugue in C. Bach.
  2. Overture to Samson. (By request). Handel.
  3. Andante from Sym. No. 5. Beethoven.
  4. Offertoire in B Minor. Battiste.
  5. Fugue—"St. Ann's." Bach.
  6. Overture to Egmont (Transcribed). Beethoven.
- Part II.
1. Hallelujah Mt. of Olives. Beethoven.
  2. (a.) Aria Robert to que J'aine. Meyerbeer.
  - (b.) Miserere—Trovatore. Verdi.
  3. Pastoral Symphony, "Messiah." Handel.
  4. Improvisations. By J. H. Willcox.
  5. Flute Concerto in F Allegro. Rink.
  6. National Anthems (by request). Morgan.

There was a great preponderance of good music in all this, and there was some ill-timed ambition and some nonsense. But all served to make the Organ better known and more admired, both in its full power and in its separate or variously mingled tone qualities; while the performers grew rapidly into acquaintance with and mastery of its novel complications, each in his way ministering to great enjoyment; and everybody glad for his own sake and his children's, and proud for Boston and his country, and thankful to the originator, and the authors, that such a noble work of Art, such a beneficent possession, should at length be ours.

The fourth Organ Concert will take place this (SATURDAY) AFTERNOON, at 3 o'clock. Tickets, with reserved seats, one dollar. Performers Messrs. LANG and WILLCOX, with a fine programme from Bach, Handel, Beethoven, Battiste, Rink, Gounod, and improvisations by Mr. Willcox.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, Nov. 10.—The past fortnight has been of unusual musical buoyancy. Irving Place, the great centre of musical attraction, has resounded from morning to night with sweet sounds, only interrupted by the carpenter's hammer preparing for the great ball. On Saturday the street was alive with people at every hour, so numerous were the objects for patronage. At 10½, the Philharmonic rehearsal; 12, Thomas's matinee; 1½, Opera Matinée; 8, Philharmonic and 71st Regiment Band Concert. The amount of wind and muscle required on that day, must have been immense. Who does not envy a musician of the Philharmonic? But to commence somewhat more systematically.

At the Academy the opera deserves the first mention. With great effort, MAREZEK has succeeded in overcoming the prejudice and disfavor aroused by the unfortunate, but unavoidable disappointments and substitutions of the beginning of the season, and his promises are now faithfully performed. The audience has been very large and fashionable, and the performances of the troupe very praiseworthy and satisfactory. "Macbeth", "Trovatore", "Ione", "Lucretia", "Martha", "Lucia" and "Norma" have been presented during the interval of my letters, and "Judith", Maestro Peri's great work, is to be produced on Wednesday evening. The most successful performance of the week was "Lucretia". The whole company was distributed in the cast, and the performance was so gratifying, that a repetition of the opera was demanded and given on the succeeding opera night. The season will shortly end, and then ANSCHUTZ will appear with his German company. GRAU has been moving around very nervously, trying at first to secure the Academy on Maretzek's off nights; but the jealousy of the artists, it is said, prevented the consummation of the plan, and finally winding up in an announcement to perform the opera "La Favorita", on Wednesday, Friday and Saturday evenings at Niblo's Garden. The roles of Leonora, Fernando, and Alfonso will be interpreted by Mme. Vera Lorini, the new prima donna, Sigs. Stefani and Morelli. A suit is in progress between Grau and Brignoli—the latter plaintiff—for salary not forthcoming. The "silver-voiced" tenor, it seems, was to receive sixteen hundred dollars a month from the time of his engagement, and the failure and refusal of Grau to pay it, for reasons best known to himself, led to the litigation. In the meantime Grau commences with Stefani, and Brignoli hovers around as complacent and serene as usual, quite happy in his troubles.

The WOLLENHAUPT Memorial Concert was a great success, the house (Irving Hall) being crowded to excess, and many being compelled to leave for want of accommodation. The nature of the entertainment called forth a most generous inducement, and the net proceeds amounted to over $2,000.

The Academy was filled on Saturday evening on the occasion of the first Philharmonic Concert of the season. It must have been very gratifying to the Board of Directors to see their new enterprise so nobly sustained. It was a venture on their part to assume the expense of the Academy, but the attendance on the night of their first concert dispelled all doubts as to the feasibility of the plan. The audience was large, brilliant, and appreciative, and the rendition of the following programme pains-taking and successful.

Part I.
Symphony No. 2, in C. Op. 67.....R. Schumann
Grand Scene from "Der Freischütz".....Weber
Miss Clara Louise Kellogg
Concerto for Piano, in F Sharp Minor, Op. 69, (1st time).
F. Hiller
Mr. S. B. Mills.
Part II.
Overture, "Coriolanus".....Beethoven
Grand Waltz, from "Faust".....Gounod
Transcribed by F. Liszt.
Mr. S. B. Mills.
Variations de Bravura, for Soprano, (1st time)...Theo. Elfeld Clara Louise Kellogg.
Overture, "Flying Dutchman".....E. Wagner.

There seems to be a perfect surfeit of concerts, and a detailed review of them is utterly impossible. The Rose Hill Ladies' Soldiers' Relief Association, had a grand concert in aid of their funds, at Irving Hall last evening. Mlle. Cordier, who has accepted an engagement from Max Strakosch, sang the Shadow aria from "Dinorah" and Gottschalk, Sanderson, Warren, Campbell and Carlo Patti assisted on the occasion.

Harry Sanderson is to have a complimentary benefit to-morrow evening. All the prominent musical celebrities of the city will appear. T. W. M.

PHILADELPHIA, Nov. 1.—Though late to commence, the indications of a long and brilliant musical season are favorable. The GERMANIA ORCHESTRA has, thus far, given three public rehearsals, with good programmes, but slim attendance. As soon as we have survived the series of rainy Saturdays now in progress, the crowds that usually attend their entertainments will re-appear, and the Musical Fund Hall will again be alive with the youth and beauty that there do congregate on Saturday afternoons. These rehearsals are a safety valve for the expansive misses who attend but do not listen, and who annoy those who go for the sake of hearing the music. There is no use quarrelling with tastes; and, though I would rather have the solid portion of the programme the larger, and would readily dispense with the frivolities that usually fill up two-thirds of it, I admit that the Germania may as well please those who care for nothing of a higher order than a polka. But if I am considerate enough to sit through all these things in silence, merely because there are those who come to hear them, might not the friends of the polka, the waltz, and the Balse-ian opera, return the compliment, and hold their peace, while the orchestra interprets some creation of Mozart or Haydn, Beethoven or Mendelssohn?

The Germania concerts have hitherto afforded entertainment to a very large class. Because it is politic so to arrange the programme, that every one may find at least one piece to please him, the selections are, of necessity, so varied. From the young lady who delights in the Ledger no velette, and whose idea of the musically perfect finds its embodiment in Grobe's variations on The Shells of Ocean, up to yon blue with the convex glasses, who prates about high art, and quotes Charles Auchester at the breakfast table; from the young lady who comes to astound her neighbors with the proceeds of her last French lesson, up, or down, to the young man, with weak eyes and strong glasses, who puns on the programme—all are to be pleased.

The GOTTSCHALK concert of last Tuesday evening deserves to be commemorated as the first occasion of Mr. G.'s favoring a Philadelphia audience with a leaf from the classics. In his arrangement of the Andante and Scherzo from the "Scotch" Symphony, he had the able assistance of Mr. WOLFSOHN. As the composition was received with delight, and its repetition called for, it is to be hoped that Mr. Gottschalk will, in future concerts, give us other classical compositions. There was also a Fantasia on airs from Il Trovatore, for two pianos, in which Mr. Wolfsohn again assisted.

Mr. Gottschalk stands in no need of praise. In his own line of music, he stands alone and is, deservedly a great favorite. Of the vocalists little need be said. Mrs. Behrens sang the cradle song tastefully, and Madame Strakosch performed, in her usual manner, the songs we have heard by her for the last fifteen years. She ought to learn a few new ones. Mr. Carlo Patti's violin-playing was a feature of the concert. Unfortunately for himself and the audience, it was of the kind that usually escapes criticism.

To-morrow night the Anschutz Opera Troupe begins its season with Flotow's "Martha," or the Last Rose of Summer, with Variations. S.

With my last sigh. (A te diro). Song.
Live, ungrateful. (Vivi ingrato). Song.
Friendship and love. (Non venni mai). Duet.

The above are the more noted pieces in "Robert Devereux," thought by many good judges to be one of Donizetti's very best operas. The scenes are laid at the court of Queen Elizabeth of England, and the chief personages are, the Queen, Robert, Count of Essex, Nottingham, and his wife, the Duchess Sarah. The Queen's songs are full, by turns, of strong affection, pity, forgiveness, and furious scorn, jealousy, and revenge. Those of Essex and Sarah are sad, those of Nottingham show manliness, pity, generosity. The stately words and music can hardly fail to have many admirers.

Blanche. Song. Kücken. 25
A cheerful German song, set to English words by Linley.

The Captain. Song. (Accomp. for guitar). Winner. 25
A favorite song with an easy guitar accompaniment.

O lay me in the valley. J. P. King. 25
A fine ballad.

From the red battle field. Quartet. N. B. Barker. 25
A beautiful and mournful welcome to the lifeless forms of the Volunteers, who return "not as they went."

I wish I were a wild bird free. W. Leonard. 25
Some fine poetic fancies, and a very pleasing melody.

Fuara in lo via. Comic song. 25
Capital for children.

Lost tear. Ballad. F. Hoffman. 25
A beautiful composition.

Instrumental Music.

Finale de Lucretia Borgia. Variations. A. Goria. 75
The airs of Lucretia, are so well known, that it requires no common genius to make a piece from them which will "sound new." Goria has accomplished this in the present composition, which will not fail to please those who can play it. In five flats. Difficult.

Roulette Polka. Chas. Coote, Jr. 25
Belongs to a class of music very popular in England.

Extremely simple, but brilliant.

Dream Life Polka, (for Piano), E. Peers. 25
" " " (for Guitar). " 25

Lauretta Polka. C. A. Ingraham. 25
Easy and agreeable piece.

Reveil des Oiseaux, (Bird's Reveille) Idylle. C. B. Lysburg. 75
Quite difficult to play. A sort of instrumental morning anthem, in the spirit of that which fortunate dwellers in the country hear, gratis, at sunrise, in summer, but of a higher style than that composed by the feathered orchestra.

TO REBECCA DIRICHLET IN BERLIN.

Düsseldorf, Oct. 28, 1853.

MY DEAR LITTLE SISTER;—The history of my life these last weeks is long and merry. Sunday, Maximilian's day, was my first Mass; the choir was crammed with singers male and female, the whole church dressed up with green boughs and tapestry; the organist quintled* up and down in a frightful manner; the Mass by Haydn was scandalously jolly, and yet the whole was tolerable. Thereupon came the procession with my solemn March in E flat, where the musicians in the Bass repeated the first part while those in the Discant played on; but that made no matter in the open air, and when I met the procession afterwards, they had already played the march so often, that it went right well, and I reckon it an honor to me, that the musicians have begged of me a new march for the next Fair.

Before that Sunday, however, there was a stirring scene. The fact is, no fitting epithet can possibly exist for the music hitherto performed here upon this occasion. A chaplain came and told me his grievances; the burgomaster said that his predecessor was evangelical and had put up with it, but that he wished to walk with them in the procession, and they must have better music. A very old, morose musician, with a shabby coat, who heretofore had beaten the time for it, was summoned and appeared, and when they rated him, he declared that he should not and would not make any better music; if we wished to have it better, we might give it to another. He knew very well that people make great claims just now; now every thing is expected to sound finely—it was not so in his time, and he did it as well as it used to be done. It was really hard for me to bear this from him, although the others will certainly do it better; but I thought to myself, what if I should some day, 50 years hence, be called to a townhouse, and should talk in that way, and a saucy young fellow should snub me, and my coat should be so shabby, and I should know no reason in the world why all ought to sound better,—and then I felt badly!

It was a vexation to me, that in all the musical collections here, I could not find a single tolerable serious Mass; nothing of the older Italians, mere modern show stuff. I conceived a desire to travel over my domains and seek good music; so on Wednesday I seated myself in the carriage, drove to Elberfeld, and hunted up the Improperia of Palestrina, the Misereres of Allegri and Bai, and also the score and parts of "Alexander's Feast," took them along with me, and I drove to Bonn. There I ransacked the library alone, because poor Breidenstein is so sick, that he will hardly get up again,—but he gave me the keys and lent me every thing. I found splendid things, and took away from there six masses by Pale-trina, one by Lotti, one by Pergolesi, and Psalms by Leo, Lotti, &c. Finally, in Cologne I hunted up the best old pieces, that I have ever yet known, especially two Motets by Orlando Lassus, which are quite wonderful, even broader and more earnest than the two Crucifixus of Lotti. We sing a "Populus meus" of his publicly in church next Friday.

On the following day, that is to say, Sunday, there was no steamboat, and as I knew that my presence was necessary in Düsseldorf, I took the post coach here; on all sides people streamed hither on the highways; many gates of honor were erected, and the houses were set with lamps. I arrived here with my great packet, but not a soul would hear of it; nothing but the crown prince, and again the crown prince. And now he happily arrived on Sunday evening through the gates of honor, during the illumination, amid ringing of bells, firing of cannon, with an escort of civic guard, between rows of soldiers and military music, at the Jägerhof. The next day he gave a dinner, and invited me too, and I amused myself most capitally, since I was very merry at a little table with Lessing, Hübner and a couple of others. Besides, the crown prince was as friendly as any one could wish, shook hands with me, said he felt badly that I had forsaken him and Berlin for so long a time, heard my story, called me out of the corner as "dear Mendelssohn"—in short I demean myself at some distance twice as amiably.

I will describe to you the festival, that was given to him, and for which I, with the aid of some old transparencies to be connected together by verses, had proposed the "Israel in Egypt" with tableaux vivans! It was in the great hall of the Academy, where a stage was erected. Before it stood in two half circles the double chorus around my English grand piano (some 90 singers in all), and then came the seats for 400 spectators. R—, in mediæval costume, was the interpreter of the whole, and knew how to unite the unlike objects in a very skilful manner in iambics. He showed three transparencies: first the Melancholy after Dürer; to that was sung at a very remote distance, by men's voices, a Motet by Lotti. Then the Virgin Mary appearing in a dream to Raphael, with the music, O sanctissima—(a common-place song, but which always makes the people weep). Thirdly, St. Jerome in his tent, with a song by Weber: "Hör uns Wahrü." That was the first part. Now came the heart of the matter. We began "Israel in Egypt" below; you know the first Recitative, and how the chorus raises itself by little and little; first the altos alone, then more and more voices in addition thereto, as far as the strong passage with the single chords: "They sighed, they sighed by reason of their bondage" (in G minor); then the curtain rose, and we had the first tableau, "The children of Israel in bondage," designed and placed by Bendemann; in front Moses, downcast, in apathy, looking away before him; near him an old man, just sinking under the weight of his beam, while his son strives to take it off from him; some beautiful raised arms in the background, in front a pair of weeping children, the whole closely crowded together like a group of fugitives. This remained standing until the conclusion of the first chorus, where at the same moment the chorus in C minor ended, and the curtain closed before the lucid picture. I have seldom seen a more beautiful effect than that.

And now the chorus sang of the plagues, hail, darkness, &c., without any tableau: "But as for His people, He led them like a shepherd," the curtain rose again; then Moses with uplifted staff came forward, and behind him, in jovial confusion, all the same figures that had mourned in the first tableau: all marching forward, all laden with gold and silver vessels; especially pretty was a young maiden, who with her pilgrim staff came just then out from the coulisse, and was about to walk over the stage (also by Bendemann). Then came again, without tableau, the choruses: "But the waters," "He commanded, the deeps o'erwhelmed them," "Thy right hand, O Lord," and then the recitative: "And Miriam the prophetess," at the close of which the soprano solo entered. Before its entrance, the last tableau appeared: Miriam with the timbrel singing praises, other maidens with harps and citherns, behind them four men with trombones facing in all directions; to this the soprano solo was sung behind the scenes, as if it proceeded from the tableau; and where the chorus came in forte, there were real trombones, trumpets, and kettle drums put upon the stage; these came in like a thunder-storm. Handel has clearly hinted this arrangement, for he makes them pause after the entrance, until they appear again at the end at the C major, where the instruments recur; and so we closed the part. This last tableau was by Hübner, and pleased me very much.

The effect of the whole was indescribably beautiful. If there had been any pretension about it, there might perhaps be much to be said against it; but it had something social, nothing public in it, and so I scarcely believe that another such beautiful festival could be invented. The things which now followed were a living tableau, drawn and placed by Schadow, "Lorenzo de Medici, surrounded by the genii of Poesy, Sculpture and Painting, who lead to him Dante, Raphael, Michel Angelo and Bramante," with a practical application to the crown prince, and a closing chorus; and then as a second part the comic scenes from the "Midsummer Night's Dream," represented by the painters,—but I relished nothing more, because this had been too striking.

How do you translate, in the same measure: "No love was crowned, but music won the cause!" Write me soon a good idea, for on the 22nd of November we are actually going to bring out the "Alexander's Feast," overture to Egmont and Beethoven's Concerto in C minor; in Becker's hall an orchestra is built, to my knowledge, for 200 men; and whatever can draw bow, or sing, or pay, will have to come.

Tell me also, whether I shall go on here with my Greek again? I did not dislike it, but I fear it will not go very swimmingly. Can I understand Æschylus perhaps? Be frank. . . You must get the Hebrides for four hands, it must be already out. But I think the overture to Melusina will be the best that I have made.

Adieu, FELIX.

FROM A LETTER TO HIS MOTHER AND SISTER.

Frankfurt, July, 14, 1838.

Hiller is here, whose presence was at all times dear to me, and we have always had much interesting intercourse. Only he is not—how shall I call it—one-sided enough for me. By nature he loves Bach and Beethoven before all, and would join himself most gladly to the earnest side. But now he is pleased also with Rossini, Auber, Bellini, &c., and with such many-sidedness no man gets on far. This forms the matter of all our conversations, as soon as we see each other, and so it is doubly pleasant to me to pass some time with him just now, and if possible to work upon him in my sense.

Yesterday morning I came to him. Who sits there? Rossini, large as life, in the most amiable Sunday humor. I really know few men who can be so witty and amusing as he can, if he pleases; we laughed the whole time. I have promised him to have the B minor Mass and some other things of Sebastian Bach sung before him in the Cecilia-verein; it will really be too fine, if Rossini has to admire Sebastian Bach. He thinks, however, after the custom of the country he is in, and will howl with the wolves. He is enchanted with Germany, he says, and if they once bring him the wine list in the evening on the Rhine, the kellner will have to show him his chamber, or he will never find it. He tells the funniest, most laughable things of Paris and all the musicians there, of himself and his compositions; and he shows such an immense respect for all persons present, that one could really believe him, if he had no eyes to see the prudent face he wears all the while. But there is mind and vivacity and wit in all his gestures and in every word, and whoever does not regard him as a genius, has only to hear him preach so once, and he will soon change his mind. * * *

Leipzig, Jan. 18, 1838.

TO A HIGHLY RESPECTED COMMITTEE FOR THIS YEAR'S LOWER RHINE MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

I am heartily grateful for the invitation contained in your letter of the 8th of January. Your friendly thought of me is not less dear to me than the prospect of again attending so joyous a festival and of having the same sort of pleasure in it that I already owe to the Rhenish musical festivals. With sincere joy, therefore, will I accept your invitation, if God grants health to me and mine, and if we can agree to perfect mutual satisfaction upon the choice of musical pieces. The more successful the last Cologne festival was in regard to the order of works performed, especially through the work of Handel with organ, so much the more important does it seem to me to have this time also at least one piece on the programme, by which this year's festival may distinguish itself from the other, and show, if possible, some progress. Now to this end I really think it necessary to have the name Sebastian Bach upon the programme, even if only in a short piece; but certainly it is time, that in these festivals, to which Handel has lent so much lustre, the other immortal master too, who in no piece stands below another master, and in many stands above all, should no longer be forgotten. The same considerations, which now prevail against it, must also have prevailed in former years against the works of Handel; and you are all thankful to those who rose above them, and who have opened to you such a treasure of edification and improvement. May you, therefore, merit like thanks from the Rhenish friends of music, by making a beginning, which (I do not deny) is hard, and must be done with much reflection, but which will surely be productive of the best consequences, and be imitated on all sides. For if something by him is only once performed, then it is not hard to find it beautiful and have it done again. But the beginning! there's the rub.

The plan I would propose to you, therefore, in this regard, would be, to perform at the approaching festival a short Psalm of Bach (some twenty minutes or half an hour long); and if you are afraid to do this on the second day, lest you should frighten away the public through the terror of the learned name, why do it on the first day, and give at the same time a somewhat shorter oratorio of Handel besides. That no fewer people will come to hear the Handel, is quite certain; for anybody not afraid of one desires another, and there are still three or four wholly unknown, most excellent oratorios of Handel, which would last about an hour and a half or two very short hours, and would be a new revelation to all music-lovers. Through the splendid gift* of the former committee, I have first become acquainted with these works, and I should be very happy if you should again profit by it for this year's festival.

In regard to the second day, I might casually ask, whether you would not knock at Cherubini's door and inquire after his new grand Requiem; it would have to be translated, to be sure, and is only for men's voices; but as it is said to be only an hour long, or less, that perhaps would be no matter, and according to all accounts it is a splendid work. Meanwhile, the main thing this time seems to me to be the first point of this letter, and I must once more beg of you that you will talk it over as soon as possible.

TO HIS MOTHER.

Leipzig, Aug. 10, 1840.

. . . . On Thursday I gave an organ concert here in the Thomas-kirche, with the proceeds of which the old Sebastian Bach is to get a monument here in front of the Thomas School. I gave it solissimo, and played nine pieces, and a free Fantasia at the end. That was the whole programme. Although the expenses were considerable, yet I had 300 thalers left me clear. Now in the autumn or spring I shall repeat the joke once more, and then an ornamental stone can be erected.* But I practised eight days long beforehand, so that I could hardly stand straight on my feet, and in the street I walked nothing but organ passages.

* In an earlier letter (Oct. 6, 1835), Mendelssohn writes, after describing a good time he had with Chopin: "Just before his departure my Handel's works came, in which Chopin had a real childlike joy; but they are really so beautiful that I cannot rejoice enough over them. 33 great folios, in the well-known elegant English manner bound in thick green leather; on the back of each, in strong gold letters, the title of the whole and the contents of the volume; and in the first volume, besides, the following words: 'To Director F. M. B. The Musical Festival Committee of 1835 in Cologne,' accompanied by a very friendly letter of the whole committee, with all their signatures."

* It was done. The monument may be seen on the Promenade under the windows of Sebastian Bach's room in the Thomas School.

Johann Sebastian Bach.

Johann Sebastian, in some respects, the greatest musician that has lived, was the third and youngest son of J. Ambrosius, born at Eisenach, March 31, 1685, one month after the birth of Handel, at Halle, died at Leipzig, July 28, 1750. At a very early age he lost his mother, and had hardly reached his 10th year when his father died also. The little orphan was then placed under the care of his brother, J. Christoph, at Ohrdruff, with whom he continued his musical studies and began the practice of keyed instruments—the harpsichord and organ. The lessons of his brother soon ceased to interest him, and he begged the use of a manuscript in Christoph's possession containing compositions for the harpsichord by Froberger, Kerl, Pachelbel, the most noted organists of that day, but this was refused him. The door of the case in which this book was kept was of lattice-work, through which little Bach's hand would pass, and, as it was not bound, he was able to roll it up and draw it out. On bright moonlight nights, he would take it to his room and copy from it, and thus, in the course of six months, he had it in his own hand. It was hardly finished, however, when his brother accidentally discovered it, and took it away. The act seemed harsh, but doubtless the teacher knew best how to direct the studies of so young a pupil. The boy's pupilage in Ohrdruff was short, being ended by the early death of Christoph. In Europe—in England as well as on the continent—in our day as well as in the days of Bach—there is a resource for such boys in the choir of cathedrals, ecclesiastical schools, and richly endowed churches. English, Italian, and German musical history gives us the name of many a celebrated composer who in youth was a chorister. Bach found a place as treble singer in such a choir at Lüneburg not many miles from Hamburg, remaining there until his voice changed, with the best advantages of excellent school and the best musical instruction, and in receipt of a small stipend, yet sufficient for his boyish necessities. His enthusiasm for the organ, and his zeal for music in other forms and styles, at this period, are sufficiently attested by his foot journeys to Hamburg to hear Reinke, the great organist, and to Zelle to listen to the French band in the service of the prince. With the change in his voice came the loss of his place and the necessity of entering upon a new field. Like Handel, he had studied the violin—with success, as his remarkable compositions prove—and it was now his resource. At the age of 13, therefore, he journeyed to Weimar, and entered the service of the court there as violinist. His leisure hours were still devoted to the organ, to counterpoint, and composition, and in less than two years, though hardly 20 years of age, he was called to Arnstadt to fill the place of organist, probably in the church where his father's uncle Heinrich had so long officiated. The three years spent in Arnstadt were years of most devoted study, and during that time he developed those powers which afterward placed him above all rivalry. Beside the labor which he devoted to the working out of his own conceptions, he let nothing escape him which appeared from the pens of Bruhns, Reinke, and Buxtehude. He was so charmed with the works of the last named that he went to Lubeck to hear him play, and prolonged his visit to a stay of three months, merely to listen to him in the church, for his acquaintance he did not make. In 1707 he accepted a call to Mulhausen, and the following year returned to Weimar, in the capacity of court organist. Encouraged by the continual applause of the court he exerted himself to the utmost, and his principal compositions for the organ date during the seven years of his services there. In 1714 he gave up his position as organist and accepted the place of concert-master to the duke, with the additional duty of composing and conducting the vocal music of the ducal chapel. Here, doubtless, began the enormous list of works in every form of sacred music, which, mostly in manuscript, are preserved in the musical libraries of Berlin, Leipsic, and other cities. Here, too, he had constant practice in writing orchestral works and instrumental chamber music, and fitted himself for a larger stage of action. In 1717, Marchand, then at the head of French organists, appeared in Dresden, and charmed Augustus so greatly by his skill as to receive an offer of a very large salary to enter his service. Volumier, also a Frenchman, the concert-master of the king—whether jealous for the honor of his own nation or that in which he had cast his lot cannot now be determined—invited Bach to the capital to a trial of skill with Marchand. The Saxon accepted the invitation, and through the kindness of Volumier had an opportunity of hearing his rival. With the knowledge and consent of Augustus, Bach sent his challenge to the French artist, which was accepted. At the time fixed, Bach appeared at the house of the minister where the contest was to take place. The king and company waited long, but Marchand came not. At length came news that he had left the city early that day by extra post. The greatness of the German organist, however, more than made good the loss. Bach returned to Weimar, but soon after accepted the office of Kapellmeister to the court at Kothen, where he remained, composing for and directing the orchestra, until 1723, when the city authorities of Leipsic elected him to the position of musical director and cantor of the Thomas school. During the six years at Kothen, he had not neglected his favorite instrument. Obtaining leave of absence, he again visited Hamburg to see the aged Reinke, who had now nearly completed his century. While there, he gave a performance upon the organ of the Catherine Church in presence of the city magistrates and the principal citizens, extemporizing for more than two hours in such a manner, that the aged Reinke, who had listened with delighted attention, exclaimed at the close, "I thought this art had completely died out; but I see it still lives in you." At the age of 38 then, Bach, rich in all that study of theory, hearing the best models of his age and country, practice as member and leader of orchestras, and constant exercise in composition for church and concert room, could give him, entered upon the calm, quiet life of succeeding years, and devoted himself to teaching and to the working out of his lofty conceptions of the musical art. Twenty-seven years he thus lived and labored, surrounded by his pupils and his large family of sons, composing music sacred and secular in all the forms then known, except the opera and dramatic oratorio, and leaving as the fruits of these years, a mass of compositions, which for number, variety and excellence, form perhaps the most astonishing monument of musical genius and learning. Mozart and Handel alone can at all come in competition with him in this regard. Of the few works from his pen, which appeared in his lifetime, most are said to have been engraved upon copper by himself with the assistance of his son Friedemann, and this labor, added to his others so numerous, finally cost him his sight. A few years later, at the age of 62, an attack of apoplexy carried him to the tomb. He was twice married, and of the fruits of those marriages he left ten sons; all of them fine musicians: several of them among the very first of that great period in the history of the art, in which Mozart, Haydn and Gluck, were the chief ornaments. This great musician had no cause to complain of a want of due appreciation, either as organist or composer. Very soon after his establishment in Leipsic, the duke of Weissenfels conferred the title of Kapellmeister, with the emoluments of the office, without requiring his personal attendance at court, and in 1736, Augustus of Saxony created him "Royal Polish and Saxon electoral court composer." In 1747

he was persuaded to accept an invitation from Frederick II., king of Prussia, to visit Berlin and Potsdam. Notice was given to the king of his arrival in the latter city just as a private concert in the palace was to begin. "Gentlemen," said Frederic, "old Bach has come!" The old organist was instantly sent for, and without affording him time to change his dress, he was brought to the palace. The king had several of Silbermann's piano-fortes in various apartments—one may still be seen there—and to these in succession Bach was taken and called upon to try their powers. At length the king gave him a theme for a fugue, which was so coined out as to afford him the highest gratification, and he immediately afterward demanded an extemporaneous fugue in 6 parts. Bach thought a moment, and selecting the theme, worked it up, to the astonishment not only of the king, but of the several distinguished musicians present. Upon his return to Leipsic he wrote out the fugue, added to it another in three parts, and a ricercar, also, in six, both upon the same theme, together with other specimens of his powers, and published them with the title of "A Musical Offering." The only works by Bach, published during his life are exercises for the harpsichord, in three parts, which appeared at intervals; an air with 30 variations; 6 choral preludes in three parts for the organ; variations in canon upon the choral Von Himmel hoch and the "Musical Offering." The rest of his works left in manuscript have come out one by one, or still remain unprinted. The 6th volume in folio, of his complete works, has just appeared in Leipsic, edited by the Bach society. Our limits forbid any attempt to give a catalogue of these works—they amount to many hundreds in number. Among them are found 5 complete sets of vocal pieces for the church for all the Sundays and festivals of the year; a great collection of oratorios, masses, magnificats, sanctus, pieces for birth, wedding and funeral occasions, and not a few comic compositions; 5 "passions," so called, compositions to which the accounts of the suffering and Death of Christ, as given by the evangelists, furnish the text; more than a hundred sacred cantatas are preserved in the library of the Thomas school alone. "The Well-tempered Clavier," a collection of 48 preludes and 48 fugues, is known to every student of the piano-forte, as remarkable in its adaptation to the purpose of enabling the performer to conquer the difficulties of that instrument. His works for organ, harpsichord, orchestra, and every sole instrument in use a century since, are as numerous and effective as his vocal compositions, and begin again to form a part of the programme in the principal concerts of Central Europe. As a virtuoso upon keyed instruments, Bach seems to have anticipated the wonderful effects produced in our own days by Thalberg and even Liszt. In his own age he was in this regard—as has been said of Shakespeare as a poet—so far above all others as to have no second. The fingering invented by Bach was the basis of his son Emanuel's work upon the piano-forte, which opened a new era for the instrument, and led, through Mozart and Clementi, the way to the extraordinary perfection exhibited by the virtuosos of our own time. To it he was compelled by his own works, for, as he himself said, "he had often been compelled to study long at night how to play the compositions which he had written during the day." Perhaps the most striking points in Bach's compositions are the marvellous invention they exhibit, and their extraordinary grandeur, power and science. Mozart, when, near the end of life, he came to Leipsic, after having exhausted all the sources of musical learning of Rome, Milan, Vienna and Paris, heard the Thomas school boys sing a motet of Bach. His attention was caught: "Ah," he exclaimed, "here is that from which one may still learn something!" Bach's works occupy some such ground in art as do the works of our noble old English prose writers in literature: they require study to be comprehended and felt in their greatness. Here and there the forms of expression have become antiquated; at first much seems obscure, which afterwards stands out prominent for beauty; but study is rewarded finally by leading him who perseveres to treasures of original thought there and only there to be found.—New American Cyclopaedia.

What They Say of the Great Organ.

From the New York Commercial Advertiser:

The public expectation concerning this organ has not been disappointed. The full power is magnificent, and the solos, which were little used except by Mr. Willcox, seem to be perfect. The vox humana I did not hear distinctly, and cannot give an opinion as to its real value. So far as I can judge from a single hearing, the quality of tone has a perfection with which nothing else in the country can be compared. The descriptions which have been written of the case come far short of doing it justice. As I looked at it again and again during the evening I found new beauties. In the softened gaslight and the dazzling glare of the electric light, burning on the polished pipes, I hardly thought of its being real. But on ascending the stage afterwards and standing by the two figures which support the two groups of large pipes, I saw the majesty of the design. Looking at the figure, I was almost startled by its terrible naturalness, for the brawny arms clasped above the head showed great bunches of straining muscle, and the expression of the face was that of intense pain. They do seem crushed, and for my own part, I doubt the propriety of representing human bodies in such posture; but I have to do justice to the fidelity of the work. It is only by standing close by that an idea of the scope and marvellous creation in it can be fully attained. Since Dr. Holmes's article, the artist has improved the general tone by touching bits of gilding here and there, binding in a golden band the viols and flutes which deck the sides of the case, dotting the dome of the towers, &c.

This façade is a creation, a thing of perfect beauty. In itself alone we might behold art enshrined; but when there is behind all this, as its lord and occasion, a thousand-tongued soul, we may be reverently glad at having on American soil what is at least as perfect an organ as any in the world, if not the largest. Let us accept the fulfilment now of this work, begun in a financial crisis, as a hopeful omen. With my heart full of music which I thought it no blasphemy to call divine, I stood under the great pipes, sublime with their open mouths and singing heads painted thereon; and as I marked how every sculptured line for itself wrought a little toward the complete fabric, and the parts lost themselves in the whole, and then turned to the simple and noble words above the keys, over the maker's name, "Opus CC. Begun February, 1857; completed, October, 1863," a flash of the burning light fell on the Saint Cecilia and transfigured her with her harp as the singer, who shall hymn the peace and liberty of the continent. Then, as the light went out, I turned reluctantly, and left the hall and the majesty it contains.

From the World (New York).

....Grandeur, more beautiful, richer, better—better in all than the thought had pictured. It makes Boston the metropolis of music, for no other city has achieved the creation of such a glory of harmony. They, the Boston music-lovers, have been liberal, have been patient. They have recognized the value of years, of books. They have sought not the maker, or the country, or the style or the school, but all. For this their agent had crossed the seas, studied all organology, heard all existing giant instruments, asked for all inventions, all improvements, and has been able to judge which was best—and the best is here.

....But of beauty, of form, of shape, of decoration, I can judge, and this casing—this house in which are these harmonies—is exquisite. It is so in form; it is so in color; it is so in carving; in the sweep of the silver pipes; in the recesses, as to an inner temple of music, of the key board; in the busts and legends, and scrolls and columns; but beyond all in magnificence of breadth and height. For the first time the American people see a great organ. The power and the sweetness—viceroy of sound, as voice is king—are in such form and dimensions as bring the mind up with it, and from this opening music in America has advanced a movement of the ages.

If one desired to see the reality of his ideal of a cell where a musician lives, it is before him in the beautiful direction of this instrument. The keys, obedient to every volition, are there and at their side the very riches of all sweet sounds. Touched they talk, and their language is from storm to whisper. When Mr. Walcker, while yet the organ was curtailed, gave the full swell, one might ask of the roof what its idea was of security, and yet as gentle and as glittering as the piano. All voices that air can form—it is but to ask the stop, and it is given. The organist has all at his command, and never did old master write theme so complex, combination so daring, but that its fulfillment is achievable with this great melodic.

The great organ opening will never be forgotten. We may hear with more patience now of the wonders of Harlem and Freiburg, as in our own land we have their companion. The event has been anticipated as declaring a new era in the refinement of our people. What a people this must be, who in the midst of a terrific war, can thus crowd to a festival of music! The legend borne by the organ is most appropriate—"Gloria in Excelsis." Oh, if we could but add to it, "And on earth peace!"

From the Independent.

The instrument has many doors of entrance. One admits to the huge piles of bellows below, one to the compensating pair above that unites and regulates them. Two enter through carved doors in front, and lead down winding stairs to its central hall. Here, above and around you, rise the pipes and run the multitudinous strings of wood. These thousands of fibrous tissues—slim, narrow nerves—give it speech. Without them, like a voiceless word, it would live and die unheard. With them, it is united with the touch and the soul of man, and so becomes spiritual and immortal. They are of various lengths, according to the distance of the pipes from the player. Some of them reach over thirty feet and turn five or six angles, upwards, sideways, and backwards, before they make the connection. Yet the faintest breath of motion on the keys is instantly answered by the soul within.

Of the more than five thousand pipes that tower around you on every side and of every size, from those large enough for a man to creep through, to mere quills and hairs—of the thousands of little valves, no bigger than those in a child's toy, that open and shut with every impulsion of the fingers—of the many great bellows that rise and fall like the waves of the central ocean—are they not chronicled in The Atlantic by the brilliant Professor of human, and so, properly, of this anatomy? To stand here when the organ is playing, and to see—as you easily can, as it is lighted with gas—these harking valves, and waving bellows, and nerves of motion flying back and forward, is like standing in the human frame, which "mediums" profess to do, and beholding the various forms of energy which a great orator calls into play in the full tide of speech. Not being gifted with spiritualistic vision, we rejoice in the not feeble likeness thereof which the great organ expresses when thus excited through all its gigantic frame. One illustration will set this vastness more clearly before you. It is 24 feet deep, 48 wide, and 60 high, or almost exactly the size of a first-class five-storied city house. Empty that house of apartments, and fill it with pipes, shafts, and piles of heaving bellows, and you have the vitals of the great organ.

The front of the palace of music comports with its inward furnishing. A polished basement of black walnut, twenty feet high, is set forth with admirable carvings of heads, masks, musical instruments, scrolls, and eminent names. An hour's study could not exhaust their richness. The key board is approached by an elegant recess, like the doorway of a cathedral. Above this pediment rise the pipes. Like that, they are not arranged on a straight line, but are broken up into that discord which is the highest concord.

The outer towers are of carved wood, crowned with Byzantine domes, with the arms of Boston and Wurtemberg wrought upon them. From them a curve of pipes sweeps inward, and then outward beyond their line to the two prominent pillars. These are composed of three great pipes, each five and a half feet in circumference and thirty-two feet high. They stand in a compact semicircle and are supported by the shoulders of Atlantean caryatids. Their mouths are seven feet from their pointed bases of almost solid tin, and above the orifices on the shaved surface five heads are painted with open mouths full of exultant praise. Thus leap to the lofty ceiling the shining pillars of song. From these advanced towers the curve again sweeps inward to the centre, and a short, straight spire, at whose base is the recess of the key-board, breaks up, with the outer buttresses, the otherwise weakening flow of curvilinear lines. The four towers in the centre are crowned with statuary, the former of cherubs playing on lyre, lute, flute, and horn, while St. Cecilia bending over her harp gives it central and harmonious perfection.

Another thought often occurred during the evening. How is it that we can be indulging in such costly luxuries, when we were told but a few years since that if our Southern brethren left us we should instantly plunge to destruction? Now Richmond is starving and Charleston is burning, while poor, hated, loathed Boston is giving ten thousand dollars for one evening's entertainment with a new organ that costs more than fifty thousands. She is making ample arrangements for her comfort "in the cold," where her warm enemies are anxious to leave her. May Charleston and Richmond, refined and purified by the fires through which they are passing, soon rejoice in Boston principles, Boston prosperity, and a Boston organ!

DR. HOLMES'S IMPROMPTU.

I asked three little maidens who heard the organ play Where all the music came from that stole our hearts away:

"I know,"—said fair-haired Edith,—"it was the autumn breeze
That whistled through the hollows of all those silver trees."

"No, child!"—said keen-eyed Clara,—"it is a lion's cage,—
They woke him out of slumber,—I heard him roar and rage."

"Nay!"—answered soft-voiced Anna,—"'twas thun- der that you heard,
And after that came sunshine and singing of a bird."

—"Hush, hush, you little children, for all of you are wrong,"

I said, "my pretty darlings,—it was no earthly song;
A band of blessed angels has left the heavenly choirs,
And what you heard last evening were seraph lips and lyres!"

MR. PHILBRICK'S SPEECH.

Mr JOHN D. PHILBRICK spoke substantially as follows:

Mr President,—I take pride, as every Bostonian must, in the great triumph of Art which we commemorate this evening; but I take pride in it also on personal grounds, for this achievement is the result of your enterprise. It was you, sir, who first conceived the design, and called to your aid in executing it the accomplished artists and mechanics whom we honor to-night,—you who now do me the honor to introduce me to this company as your classmate.

I know not how to express what I feel on this subject. I remember that Coleridge somewhere says, it made him feel happy that such a man as William Wordsworth had lived. And I must say that it makes me feel happy to know that there is, in this city, such a thing as the Great Organ in Music Hall. Happy are those to whose genius and skill we are indebted for this noble work. Their names will live and be honored here as long as music is cultivated and appreciated.

It is an honor to Boston to possess such a work of art, for it was the education of Boston, or the civilization, which amounts to the same thing, that brought it here. But why could not Boston make it? Why could not America make it? Both the instrument and the matchless structure in which it is enshrined, are the production of the art and skill of the little kingdom of Wurtemberg, for the Messrs. Herter, as well as the Messrs. Walcker, are Wurtembergers. You searched both continents, and found the Wurtembergers most competent to execute your great tasks. How did this happen? This question has been repeatedly asked. Permit me to answer it briefly, for to me it is a very interesting question, and the answer from my point of view contains a very important lesson. Now I say there is no mystery, no chance in all this. No prejudice in favor of foreign skilled biased your choice of artists. Your motto was, "Get the best," and you actually found the best exactly where the educationist would expect to find it, in a state preëminent for mental culture. We are justly proud of the educational eminence of our own State. She stands at the head of the educating States of America. But Wurtemberg, with a territorial area about equal to that of our Commonwealth, and a population a quarter larger, has a far more ample and perfect system of education. If, indeed, I were called upon to name the State in all the world, where all the educational wants of the people are most perfectly provided for, I should designate just this little kingdom of Wurtemberg.

Look at her university with six faculties and seventy professors; her nine real or scientific schools, with seventy professors; her five lyceæ with thirty-five professors and teachers; her six gymnasia with ninety professors and teachers, in which the classical course is equal to that of our colleges; her eighty-seven Latin schools with two hundred instructors; her theological seminaries; her polytechnic school with twenty-one instructors, for teaching the application of science to the practical arts; her institute for agriculture and forestry at Hohenheim, the most complete agricultural establishment of the kind in Europe; her veterinary schools; her superior seminaries for girls; and her seven schools of art and drawing, at one of which the finest groups of statuary which adorn our organ were sculptured;—look at all these institutions, sir, and tell me if there is any other spot on the globe where the means of high and varied intellectual cultivation are more ample and more liberal. Nor is the provision for elementary instruction less liberal. Every locality of thirty families and upwards, must maintain a common school; and where the number is less the school is supported in part by government aid. And it is to be remembered that every one of these elementary schools is taught by a learned man, thoroughly trained in the science and art of education, and devoted to the profession of teaching for life. Indeed, the crowning glory of the Wurtemberg system of education consists in its superior provision for the professional training and improvement of teachers in public institutions, which comprises six teachers' seminaries, each having an ample corps of professors, sixty teachers' associations, and twelve annual institutes of two weeks duration, held in different places in the kingdom. Denzel, the eminent director of the Seminary at Esslingen, wrote the most complete treatise on education in any language, which was published in six volumes, in 1839, at Stuttgart, and in which is developed the highest modern ideal of education.

Nor is this complete system of national education of recent date. Its main features are adopted and incorporated into the frame of the Government, nearly a century before the Mayflower dropped anchor in the harbor of Plymouth; and the University at Tübingen was established long before Columbus made his first voyage of discovery to this New World.

Now since skill in the mechanic and fine arts is the result of mental culture, who does not see, in the facts I have stated, a sufficient cause of the superior skill and art of the Wurtemberg people? Yes, sir, my theory accounts for the fact that you found the highest skill in Wurtemberg, and the fact sustains my theory.

The superior talents employed in the production of your superior organ are the legitimate fruit of a ripe and liberal system of national popular education. Let your guests, on their return to their Fatherland, tell their countrymen that we know and appreciate their educational preëminence.

Permit me to offer, in conclusion, the sentiment: Mental and moral culture, the source of national power, glory, prosperity and happiness.

The Great Organ—What it is not and what it is.

The great work is done and dedicated. We are all proud of it and happy in it. It more than rewards years of patient waiting, more than equals the most sanguine expectation; it vindicates triumphantly the zeal and the persistency of its projectors, and refutes the unbelief of "practical" utilitarians. It seems too good a thing to be true; but it is really ours, in permanent possession, "a thing of beauty and a joy forever," as far as work of man may be called certain or enduring. It is done, and nobly done, and there it stands. What does it stand for? What do we gain by having this great Organ? Admitting all the excellence that has been claimed for it as an organ—and we believe it to be as nearly perfect as the art with all its acquisitions to this day could make it,—it is still well, and indeed it is our duty to try to form a sober estimate of the event, both negatively and positively. The enthusiasm there is about the Organ is all natural; the glowing descriptions, even if they overshoot the mark in some particulars, are not too glowing; the delight which thousands have felt in the seeing and the hearing of the wonder is quite sincere and unaffected; it is natural enough, nor could it well be otherwise, that the Organ should be the only musical topic talked of for the time being, and even that the Music Hall for a whole month or two should know no other music but that of the organ, Beethoven's statue standing for his Symphonies the meanwhile—a sure pledge, however, that they will have their day again. We are still in the midst of the enthusiasm, the fresh sensation and surprise of all this; yet it is not too early to try to form to ourselves a clear and definite appreciation, not of the organ as an organ, but of its advent here as likely to impart a new impulse to musical, artistic, social progress. What signifies the new possession? Wherein precisely does its value lie? What can it, and what will it do for us?

To get at the reasonable answer we will begin negatively, approaching definition by the process of limitation. Rejoicing with the rest in our great Organ; admiring it and loving it for the beautiful and conscientious work which we have seen put into it, as we have watched its progress day by day; feeling the poetic grandeur, harmony and richness of its outward enshrinement growing on us daily as we stood before it—a sure sign of a real work of art, a poem to the sight,—caught up, as every one at all imaginative is, by glimpses of great meanings and great possibilities before such a solid revelation, such a tangible, unvanishing mirage; hopeful of nobler impulses which it will awaken in men's hearts with the vibrations of its thousands of true, heaven-strung voices; made as happy as another by all this enthusiasm and this fine anticipation, we are still reminded of certain limits in the very nature of the case, which such enthusiasm is apt to overlook, flooding them out of sight.

1. In the first place, it is well called the "Great Instrument." For, after all, it is but an instrument. Whether it will do to hail its arrival as "the most interesting event in the musical history of the New World," depends entirely on the use that shall be made of it. You may build a splendid statehouse, but that does not "constitute a State;" the birth of the State, though with but a log hut for its offices, is really the event. The arrival of the first Chickering Grand Piano in a musical household is an event; but the birth of a musical genius in that house were an incomparably greater one. The first performance of a Beethoven Symphony in Boston; the first triumph of organized native effort in bringing out Handel's "Messiah" and teaching us the love of such things; the visit of Jenny Lind to these shores; the settling in any of our towns or cities of one really superior, high-toned, genial and inspiring artist, teacher and conductor—are not these greater musical events, more fraught with influence, than the acquisition of the very beau idéal of instruments upon the grandest scale? Nay, is there any comparison in worth between a great organ and a great organist—by which we mean a great musician, in the fullest sense, and not a mere player of the instrument. The bust of Bach looks out from the centre of our Organ: suppose we had Bach himself here, a new John Sebastian of the nineteenth century, a free-born American; with whatever instrument came to his hand, would he not be a greater possession than the grandest instrument without him? Indeed it is because there lived a Bach, and because there have been other musical geniuses, creators; because Beethoven's Symphonies and such live influences have nourished a regard for earnest music here in Boston, that we now take unto ourselves an organ. But a great organist, richly as he might revel, could he sit down at these key-boards and pedals, could do a mighty good work in the world with half as good an instrument.

So do not let us be in haste to hail our Organ opening as the greatest event in our musical history, while it is verily a great one. If we make too much of it in our pride of its importance, there is danger that we shall not make the most of it in the practical way of its best uses. With all its untold resources, all its grand associations and suggestions, the all in all of Organs never can become the all in all of Music. It is timely to remind ourselves of a few of its limitations, that so we may come to a clearer idea of its true, its noblest uses.

2. The organ cannot take the place of an orchestra. Some are too apt to think it can, because it contains such a variety of stops, each voiced after the type of some orchestral instrument; such unmistakable flutes, clarinets, oboes, bassoons, trumpets, and pipes of such a stringy quality as to represent the viol family in all its members; and because some clever organist can combine and alternate these in a way to reproduce to you the leading features of an overture, or movement from a Symphony, with enough truth of color to revive pleasant memories, with the added charm (but not the sterling one) of unexpectedness. Compared to the original, there is at least all the difference of the colored crayon copy from the original masterpiece in oil. Besides, the drawing is often sadly out. The color you have; but the form, which is the tempo, the rhythm, the thrilling vital accent,—these halt and drag, lack outline, fire and force of purpose, and you lose the soul of the composition in the very luxury of its tone-fleshiness.

Then again, the many parts or voices in an orchestral composition run so independently, each following out its own melodic channel, often crossing each other, that there is no playing them upon keyboards with one pair of hands (and feet), as you would organ or piano music. The texture of the fabric is quite different, and far more complicated. The organ gives you the 80 instruments, to be sure; but where are the 80 souls, intelligences, behind the instruments? Compare the notes of an orchestral score—say a symphony—with an organ or piano-forte "arrangement" thereof. In the one, you follow the various colored threads (or instruments) as they mutually entwine, vanish, re-emerge in the wondrous web of tones; in the other, though you may imitate a salient melody of this or that instrument by drawing out some solo stop, or may mix stops to match tolerably well the general tone-color of a passage, yet if you have three, or six, or ten chosen stops drawn out (on the same Manual), they will all move together one way, instead of individualizing themselves. Played on a great organ, a Symphony is merely a piano-forte arrangement illuminated, as it were, by coloring these notes of a bit of melody violet, these bright yellow (as of flutes), these scarlet (as of trumpets), &c., &c.; but all this does not make an orchestral score of it. Overtures and parts of noble Symphonies may be very pleasingly and surprisingly recalled by such clever imitations on so many-voiced an organ, as we have heard here since the opening from Mr. Morgan and some of the younger organists; but if the illusion grow too captivating, till our ears rest contented with it, and no longer ask to have the real thing, where is the musical gain? The great Organ puts back the cause of music, becomes a loss instead of a gain, if it be allowed to supplant or exclude from the field the Orchestra.

3. As to the expression, passion, which most people love in music; seek it in songs, seek it in opera, in oratorio, in orchestral instruments, but do not look for any singularly fine or glowing exhibitions thereof in an organ. It lacks the power of accent; it cannot emphasize or shade a note, except to the limited extent of such contrivances as the swell and the tremolo. True its tones have their characters, some warm, some cold, some bright and positive, some soft and wooing; one is well named the Vox humana, and another Vox angelica, and still another might perhaps be named Vox diabolical; and is not here material, and personnel too, for an opera? Some of the sounds are so sweet, so rich, so warm, or so stirring, that they go right to the heart; but none the more and none the less because the organist is warm or cold at heart himself; the charm is one of nature, just as some human voices seem naturally full of feeling although their owners sing without a particle of inspiration. Whatever is personal, or sentimental, can find better utterance elsewhere than in an Organ; God has given it other organs.

4. If the edification of the listener, or the improvement of his taste for music, or the deepening of his love for it, were in proportion to the pleasure and the wonder which the sounds of such an Organ excite in the largest number, then indeed it would be clear gain in the highest sense. But many things may please the multitude without at all helping to improve its taste. All that tickles the palate is not necessarily wholesome. In a crowd of children sugar plums are popular, and sure to be encored; now the public is a child in music, and giving it sugar plums is not the way to form its appetite for better food. The greatest organ may be so used (and in a concert hall, with no restraints as of a hallowed place, the greater it is the greater the temptation so to use it) as not only to content the ignorant with sweetmeats, but even to demoralize somewhat the musical sense and conscience of the best of us, by lapping our souls in lazy luxury of mere sounds. The very sounds of this Organ are so beautiful, so fascinating, in their contrasts and combinations, that even the earnest Art-lover finds himself enjoying them without regard to any musical thought which they contain; he grows indifferent to meaning, listens willingly and pleased to everything that may be played, however insignificant as music, however frivolous in its associations, hacknied in its sentiment, un-organ-like in its entire want of any earnest reference to the Art principle. The charm is partly sensual, partly of pleased curiosity, but in no true sense is it musical, is it artistic. What justifies the existence of the Organ is its power as an instrument to give voice to music that is great in itself as music, its power to interpret a great composition. But when used just to please the ear, the order is reversed; the music is a mere vehicle to the curious and pleasant sounds of so many sets of minors: worth about as much as the oil with which a painter blends and fastens his pigments, but not amounting to a thought, a picture, which would have intrinsic value even without the colors. Now if the Organ is not to be used earnestly, if it is chiefly to minister to an idle pleasure in sweet sounds or astonishment at grand ones, if its task is still to be to exhibit itself instead of interpreting to us the great music, it becomes too grand a means for so small an end, a sublime superfluity. If the public is such a child in music as to be still calling for Mother Goose when it may have Shakespeare, why, give it Mother Goose in the good old honest nursery (hand-organ or promenade concert) style. But to set up this noble paragon of Organs just to play the pretty tunes, is like giving us Mother Goose in superb folio édition de luxe, in the highest style of print and binding, massive covers, gold and Russia leather, like a great church bible, and illustrated with the finest art of Kaulbach or Gustave Doré:—a grand work of Art in itself, but—for the purpose of Mother Goose! Our illustration is an extreme one, to be sure; we do not mean to say that our organ concerts ever have come quite down to this nursery level even during the wildest saturnalia of the mad-cap tyrant Encore, who delights in distorting and pulling to pieces the best planned programmes; nor have we much fear that we shall come to such a pass; we merely suggest sugar plums and Mother Goose as the reductio ad absurdum of this whole principle of making a noble instrument but serve the momentary pleasure of the greatest (we sometimes suspect it is only the loudest) number. An inspiration, an idea lay at the root of the art which culminated in the first grand Organ, and that idea was not amusement, nor could this have built it or conceived it, any more than it did the wonderful old Gothic cathedrals, the like of which there is no faith entire enough in this age to produce again.

So far the negative side; now for the positive. The Great Organ cannot of itself bring in great music, or lift us up to it, without the aid of musical genius, culture, conscience,—not so much as these can with poor organs; it cannot take the place of an orchestra, nor of the human voice; it cannot ally itself with sentimentality so consistently or so effectively as a guitar; nor can it go down on all fours for popular amusement without readily compromising its dignity; nor can it, in stepping from the church into the concert room, properly borrow so much as it brings, and learn to serve virtuoso vanity and egotistic skill, when it should shame them out of sight. These are its limitations, by no means disparaging ones. What remains? Enough, and of the noblest.

1. If it cannot give us these things, it can give us—organ music; and that is a very noble kind of music, and has long been a desideratum among our musical opportunities, a blank in our musical culture. The organ has a music peculiarly its own, and in which a really great organ is supreme. We do not speak now of its technically religious uses, the part it takes in public worship, for our concern is with an organ in no church, a concert organ. The music which is truest to the genius of the organ, the great fugue style (not limited to strict fugues) of Bach, is alike in place, alike divine, outside the church or in the church: it is secular music, in that it has no ritual function; it is religious in that it addresses the sense of the Infinite within us, being impersonal and universal in its spirit, lifting us above ourselves. Who can doubt that the music of Bach, and whatever else there is of really great organ music, will be henceforth much oftener heard in Boston, through the presence of this great organ? It will, it must help, directly and indirectly, to bring Bach as a live influence home to us. What does not every one with a deep love of music feel that he owes to Beethoven? Because through his symphonies we know him, he has become and he remains very near to us, lives in our inmost life. An equally great acquaintanceship and sympathy, an equally enduring blessing, is the true music-lover yet to find in Bach; and this shall as surely bring him to us, or bring us to him, as his grand head looks down there on the organist. In spite of all less worthy uses of the organ, of all the caterings to many tastes and no taste, of all the demands which for a time curiosity will make upon its newly opened variegated stock of sounds, and in spite of the necessity of making it attractive to the crowd until its debt is paid off and it is ours without a peradventure, it must and will in due time find its place among other musical means and influences and in the long run belong to Art. Organ music is not for crowds; it is like the grander poetry, like the Bible, to which the musical soul turns in its deeper moods for strength, for solace, for life and freedom in forgetting all the little wearying personalities and superficialities which ensnare and drag us down. We do not expect the children to enjoy Bach; but as the moral experience deepens, as one learns to know the great inner wants, the hunger of the soul, does he, if musical, come into a condition to understand and feel and drink in deeply that great music; then he feels that Bach's music is not more wonderful for its unequalled technical musicianship, than for its profound tenderness and truth to the most significant experience of all souls. Whoever has deeply suffered, and not lost faith, must love Bach: that is the testimony of earnest musicians; and therefore it is worth while to cultivate enough of musical knowledge and familiarity with his forms to be able to know him. It is the sheerest ignorance which talks of Bach's music as pedantic, learned, dry and merely intellectual. Few creations of man's genius have so much of soul, imagination, poetry. Therefore, we say, this and kindred music does not belong to crowds, to fashionable and parade occasions. Only as an auxiliary, an incident in certain festival occasions, in oratorios, in public worship, does the organ naturally address a crowd. Organ performances as such, and by itself, are for such as like them and at such times as one needs them; we are not aware that they are or ever were in any part of the world popular; travellers stop at Freiburg to hear the famous organ, because it is one of the lions; but organ concerts do not command and do not need large audiences, as operas and oratorios and symphony concerts do. The sweetest enjoyment of the organ is in the quietest way, and the real worth and comfort of our organ will be felt, after it has ceased to be an event, when the novelty and excitement are passed, and it shall have settled down into its every day, unpretending, ordinary estate. Then it will be heard very frequently, daily perhaps, by such as may come in proper hours, by groups and companies of listeners, more or less as the case may be, now tens, now hundreds, and the influence will steal into their hearts quietly; the less parade and crowd, the better chance of sincere real music. It will have its great occasions also; but the quiet every day influence, on a few at a time, will be the deepest and the widest and the most abiding; for these seeds will take root. Like the great cathedrals, let it in some sense stand always open, as universal as the sunshine, so that one may enter when he is passing, when he feels the want, and let heavenly music shine into his soul.

But we wander; what we mean by all this is, simply, that is not of so much importance that the Organ charm to it the greatest number, as that its word be generally high and great, befitting its great presence, that it discourse earnest, sincere music, so that its influence shall be of the best so far as it goes; and then it will be sure to go far, really, if not obviously. We place, therefore, first in the list of benefits to be derived from the great Organ, that it guarantees to us great Organ music.

2. But we do not wish to be too exclusive. The great organ music, such as Bach's Fugues, and Toccatas, or oratorio fugued choruses, which admit very well of being transferred to the organ, are properly played with the full organ, rolling out great volumes of sound, hundreds of pipes blended in one chord. This is the proper organ tone, large utterance of godlike thoughts. It is the kind of tone which best satisfies both ear and soul in the long run; you are exalted and emancipated while it fills you. If it sound confusing and almost stunning at first, the ear by custom learns to love and crave it, and recognizes the movement of individual voices and the wealth of varied detail in its perpetual unfolding. The organ, to be sure, is, and has been commonly considered even by great organists, by men like Mendelssohn, a one-sided instrument,—its one side being this great one of the utterance of what is most sublime, impersonal and universal in music. But it allows alternations from this full chorus duty, and is furnished for them. The beam of white light may be shivered into its prismatic colors. Separate stops may step into the foreground, singly, or in groups, and that too without departing from the true organ style of composition, that is to say the polyphonic style. How sweetly they may be contrasted in Bach's trio Sonatas, how touchingly and strangely in his varied Chorals (Choralvorspiele), where a voice intones the melody, while figured harmonies rustle and flow beneath it and above it like running water and the breezes in the trees. Mendelssohn's organ sonatas have something of the same charm. Much doubtless may yet be done with the separate stops of such an organ, all in the earnest spirit of true polyphonic music, which no composer has as yet discovered. Would not old Bach find out new ways of using these resources, if he could sit down to an organ like this?

And we are willing, even, to make pretty large allowance for uses of the organ which are not strictly organ-like, especially for renderings of fine passages from oratorios and other serious works. The orchestral "transcriptions" (overtures, &c.) are among the most questionable and in the end unsatisfactory; but they are not unsuggestive for the time being, and may serve a good turn if they are only treated as exceptional, and not as the true thing. The modern French Offertories of Battiste, Wely, &c., are too much for effect, too operatic, indulging in such cadences, such melodies as are sung behind the foot-lights; yet they have their good points. We do not fear any of these things, or worse things, provided they are kept subordinate, offset by frequent hearings of the nobler music. In the long run the latter works its way in spite of all smarter and more specious rivals. There are always some souls which it is sure to enter, and where it enters it goes deeply. Whatever is heard, so it be musical, some education of the ear goes on; it depends on the hearer's depth of nature whether he demands more; only take care that he have opportunities; let the great books be within as easy reach as the light novels.

3. The Organ, as an auxiliary, accompanying great choruses in oratorios, &c., and even doing the work of a small orchestral accompaniment in certain cases—although great oratorios are written for orchestra and cannot do without it—can contribute an inspiring element of grandeur, as we shall presently (this very evening) have occasion to witness.

4. The Organ will give, is already giving, a new and a higher impulse to our organists. They work and study with a new encouragement, a new assurance that the dignity of their calling begins to be recognized. To play an organ, such a grand thing as stands there before us, is not that a task worthy of a man? Then everything about the Organ, its grand sonority, its grand aspect, inspire the young organist with a reverence for his task, and kindle in him a noble longing to do something worthy. Publics may be delighted with it as a plaything, and endorse the little brilliancies and prettinesses; all very sweet to their palates, but growing less and less so to the young organist himself, who burns to be in manlier service. Already we have seen that, with very few exceptions, all the organists who have thus far played in the Music Hall, even the lovers of the light and popular, the sceptical about fugues, have sought some color of earnestness for whatsoever they have played. The wonder, after all, is, considering the general ignorance of organ music and what a child the public is in Art, that there has been so little of nonsense and frivolity in these seven concerts. The proportions of pure Organ music might have been greater; but the general drift was earnest. The organists are likely to grow earnest, to deepen in their purpose, under the new inspiration.

5. Last, and not least, one solid, sure gain have we in this Organ: we have got a real genuine great work of Art. Great inwardly and outwardly, great in untold possibilities of harmony to the ear, great actually to the sight. It is perhaps the first thorough, really great work of Art, made without any poor economy of means, made with an artistic zeal and conscience pervading the entire work, made with ideal truth and beauty for the motive and no eye to profit or any secondary end, which we have yet had in this country; and therefore by the mere fact of its existence and its presence is it a perpetual inspiration; a reminder of the soul's ideals; a monitor to nobler life and purpose; a rebuke to all sorts of sham and mean pretension in Art; a standard of the best; a grand authority, intolerant of false and foolish things, silently frowning down upon egotistic efforts, or sonorously flooding them out of sight. It will grow harder and harder to do frivolous and shallow things in the name of music under the shadow of such a Temple. May its performance be as noble as its presence!

Concerts.

The series of GRAND ORGAN CONCERTS, seven in all, in aid of the Organ Fund, closed last Sunday evening. They have been generally quite well attended, the Hall being half full at least, which is a great audience for an organ concert, and at the dollar price must have eked out the fund not a little. The selections, with the exception of the last, have contained less of Bach, or any other pure organ music, than the first two, and yet there has been a great deal that was good and edifying.

MR. LANG and MR. WILCOX divided the burden of the fourth concert (Saturday afternoon, Nov. 14) between them equally. Mr. Lang played a very grand slow movement (Grave) from the Fantasia in G by Bach—a broad, full, rich, deep, tranquil flood of harmony, cooling off the aching petty fever of this life. Also the overture to Egmont, so well as to choice of stops and execution, that one missed the orchestral fire and crispness thereof less than he had thought possible. The little Pastoral Symphony from the "Messiah," on a deep diapason sub-bass (how round and satisfying those great tones!) breathed itself out very sweetly; and the Adagio and Allegretto (with flute solo) from Rink's Concerto in F were nuts to many of course. Mr. Wilcox played Handel's "Coronation Anthem," of which Mendelssohn says in one of his letters: "The beginning is of the finest that Handel or any other man ever made; and all the rest, after the first short movement, so dreadfully dry and ordinary!" Also a Fantasia in A flat by Battiste, full of fanciful and striking effects, astonishing the people with the powers of the organ: a rumbling Improvisation displaying the beauty of the stops in a graceful way, but hardly amounting to composition; and a March from Gounod's "Queen of Sheba," more bright and popular than organ-like in any high sense.—Everything was skilfully done and generally much enjoyed.

The same two organists furnished the fifth concert (Wednesday afternoon, 18th). Mr. Lang repeated the Mendelssohn Sonata and Mr. Wilcox the Lefebvre-Wely Offertoire of the Inauguration Night; very welcome. Mr. Wilcox also played a chorus from Handel's "Saul," and Handel's "Harmonious Blacksmith" variations, showing the stops to fine advantage, and improvised again acceptably as usual. Mr. Lang gave an organ imitation of the Freyshütz overture, which sounded more like the orchestra than either of the overtures thus far attempted. The unearthly great bassoon and trombone of this organ, its warm clarionet-like Corno-basso stop, its full, mellow flute tones for the horn passage, and its stringy violin tones, told well in this wild, romantic, mystical overture. Handel's "He shall feed his flock," very tenderly and delicately treated, and a March of Israelites from Costa's "Eli," made out the rest of his share.

In the sixth concert (last Saturday evening) Mr. J. C. D. PARKER, for the first time, joined his force to that of the two gentlemen above named. He played No. 2 of Mendelssohn's six Organ Sonatas, and an Offertoire by Battiste (which sounded to us empty and trivial in some parts), in the manner of an accomplished organist. The main feature of the programme to a musician was one of Schumann's six fugues on the letters B, A, C, H (it being the German letter for B natural); it is a noble, truly organ-like piece, ending with an exceedingly grand chromatic crescendo of full chorals, and Mr. Lang did it finely. He also gave the Recitative and Angel Trio from "Elijah" on exquisite, fine, remote and slightly tremulous stops, and repeated the Freyshütz overture with closer likeness than before. Mr. Wilcox presented Kullak's pretty Pastorale in very fresh, piquant and winning colors; improvised with more adherence to a melodic text than before, ending with the Quoniam from Hummel's Mass in B flat; and closed the evening grandly with Haydn's chorus: "The Heavens are telling."

The seventh programme (Sunday evening) was of a more serious character, but too long. The audience larger than usual.

Part I. By Mr. J. K. Paine.

1. Fantasia Sonata in D minor, a. Grave—Allegro agitato. b. Andante con variazioni. c. Presto. J. K. Paine
2. Choral Varied; for two manuals and double pedals. Bach
3. Andante. Mozart
4. Fantasia in A minor. Thiele

Part II. By Dr. S. P. Tuckerman.

- a. Introduction to Oratorio of "David". Neukomm
- b. Chorus from the "Tod Jesu," the death of Jesus. "Surely he hath borne our griefs." Graun
- c. Terzetto—"Lift thine eyes". Mendelssohn
- d. "He was despised" (Messiah). Handel
- e. Choral—"Jesu, King of Glory". Bach
- f. Dead March in "Saul". Handel
- g. Chorus—"Ory Aloud and Shout". Dr. Croft

Part III. By Mr. J. K. Paine.

1. Pasacaglia in C minor. Bach
2. Vivace, from Trio Sonata in G. Bach
3. Reverie—"Song of the Silent Land". J. K. Paine
4. Old Hundred with Variations. J. K. Paine

The Choral Varied and the Pasacaglia were the two great things of this programme; but the latter had to be cut short and the Vivace wholly omitted on account of the great length into which Mr. Paine unconsciously ran in his opening composition; a work in an earnest direction, polyphonic in structure, interesting in most parts, but capable we should think of being abridged to advantage. Mr. Paine always plays true organ music, and plays it as no other whom we have among us. The fantasia by Thiele is a strong foaming cataract of strong and splendid harmony almost as stirring as a Bach Toccata.

Of Dr. Tuckerman's selections (none of them strictly organ pieces) the most impressive were chorals by Graun, and the Dead March in "Saul," in both of which the great deep diapasons told superbly. The other pieces were all interesting and artistically rendered.

THE MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB gave a concert at Chickering's on the 13th, in aid of the Sanitary Commission. Adagio and Allegro from Beethoven's Septet; the stately Andante con moto, with variations from Schubert's Quartet in D minor; Mozart's beautiful Trio, for piano, clarinet and viola, with Mr. DAUM for pianist; a couple of Franz songs by Miss HOUSTON, were among the good things of an enjoyable programme.

GOTTSCALK has given three or four concerts of his own fashionable and peculiar music here during the past fortnight, aided by Mlle. CORDIER, the singer, and another little PATTI, master Carlo, who gives promise with the violin.—GILMORE'S Sunday evening "sacred" concerts at the Boston Theatre still draw their crowds; but Gilmore handsomely postponed last Sunday in favor of the organ concert.

Music in Prospect.

THE HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY combine their forces with the Great Organ this evening for a "Grand Choral Inauguration." We shall hear the Organ as an accompaniment in Oratorio (See programme among advertisements). There will be full orchestra besides, and excellent solo singers. Handel's music to Dryden's "Ode to St. Cecilia," will be a novelty, and quite appropriate just now; in this the organ will perform the whole accompaniment. The Society give their services in aid of the Organ Fund.

Next will come the Organ in connection with the musical festival of the public school children—an occasion of rare interest; then the great Sanitary Fair will occupy the Hall; then the Christmas performance of the "Messiah" and that brings it to the end of the year. What next? Plenty of Organ concerts undoubtedly; the more of them the better; but what for Orchestral, for Philharmonic concerts? Is it not time to hear of something?

In the way of Chamber Music in Chickering's Hall, we are to have something choice forthwith. Next Saturday evening Messrs. KRUMPHOLTZ, LEONHARD and EICHBERG will commence a series of four Soirées. Those who attended their soirées two years ago will need no persuasion. Their first programme will embrace the E flat Trio of Schubert, a violin and piano Sonata (Op. 23) of Beethoven, a Nocturne (piano) of Schumann, Beethoven's violin Romanza in F, a Siciliano by Bach, and of course some fine Franz songs,—for have we not the singer?

DEATH OF MME. VANNUCCINI (late Miss LIZZIE CHAPMAN). It is not a year since our oratorio and concert audiences were listening with rare pleasure to this young native singer, after her studies in Florence. She returned there early in the Spring, and in the month of May was married, at Perugia, to her teacher, the Maestro Vannuccini, considered there the first in his profession, a high-toned, honorable, amiable gentleman. Life looked bright before her. But disease came, and four months of painful illness ended in her death. She had made many friends in her new home, both among the Americans and the Italians, and the attendance at her funeral is said by a gentleman long resident in Florence to have been larger than any he remembered to have seen at a Protestant funeral there.

Musical Prosperity.

In the midst of our national struggles, which might appear to affect very disadvantageously those branches of industry which are immediately connected with the amenities of peace, it is really surprising to find how prosperous many of those branches are. Music makers and musical instrument makers are alike fully and successfully employed. The demands of the army alone for band instruments and their performers, have been very large. Our teachers are well occupied, and the season bids fair to be a brilliant one in every way. Our noble Organ comes, in the midst of all, to give a new impetus to the cause of music, and expectation is now moving our whole musical community. Piano-fortes are among the most costly luxuries, though musical necessities, of an enlightened taste. One would think they would be among the first relinquishments which a people at war would make. We are surprised, and no less gratified, to learn that the demand for them was never larger. The single establishment of CHICKERING & SONS is no less than some hundreds of instruments behind their orders. And this is a cash business besides. Even the manifold facilities which such able and experienced manufacturers must necessarily possess, are inadequate to supply the momentary demands of a public, which is willing to pay, and roundly, for the best to be had. It is certainly a satisfactory state of things for those, who believe music to be something more than amusement, to contemplate. In the midst of what seems to be an anomaly, a war prosperity, our people find the time and the means to think of and to purchase music and its most costly appurtenances.

The Art Principle, and its application to the teaching of Music. By ANNA JACKSON. Philadelphia: Frederick Leypoldt, 1868. 12mo., pp. 30.

The leading idea of this very interesting essay is, that the true Teacher should treat music not as a species of Mechanism, but as really one of the Fine Arts. Man (according to the author) is normally so constituted as to possess a Principle of Art—a principle, which (as far as music is concerned) amounts, in the chosen few, to a faculty for the production of original and permanent works; in others, to the ability to reproduce such works in an intelligent and sympathetic performance; and, in a still larger class, to the capacity for appreciating and enjoying such works when so interpreted for them. In all cases, this Principle ought to be educated. For the pupil and the hearer, the proper education should consist in assiduously listening to specimens of true music—to the works of the great Poets, who have uttered what God has given them to say, through the medium of musical sounds. Nor is it enough, (in Miss Jackson's view,) that the education of the pupil should be only thus far associated with the works of the great masters, while the pieces, which he is taught to execute, should be the usual show pieces of mere finger dexterity. She would have his actual lessons to be real specimens of true music. With such views, Miss Jackson would not, to be sure, regret the use of Exercises in mechanism, but she would have them selected and applied in judicious subordination to the true end of piano study.

Music so taught becomes an efficient agent in producing cultivation of the highest order; and when we consider how widely the study of the Piano is diffused, and how naturally it introduces the pupil to other chamber-music, and then to that of the orchestra, we begin to feel how noble a vocation is that of the piano-teacher, when it is pursued in the spirit which animates the essay now before us. Miss Jackson deserves the thanks of all the friends of genuine culture for the earnestness and the ability with which she has employed her pen in the good cause. In the interest of that cause, we venture to go a little beyond the printed record, and to say, Miss Jackson has won a perfect right to speak as she has, by having constantly lived up to her own precepts. She is herself an earnest and successful Teacher in her native city; and, both in her lessons and in her private soirées of chamber music, (for stringed instruments as well as for the piano,) has done more for classical music, in the case of her pupils and their friends, than societies and orchestras have done for the public.

WORCESTER, MASS. Handel's Acis and Galatea was performed here on Thursday evening, Oct. 29, in Mechanics' Hall, by the Hamilton Club. Too worthy an enterprise to go unchronicled; so we copy from "Stella's" notice of it in the Palladium:

The performance of Handel's pastoral was, as a whole, excellent. The singers seemed not the least daunted by the empty hall in which six or seven hundred listeners seemed but a hand-full; but sang with a spirit and animation which was remarkable.—This was, in no small measure, due to the orchestral support of the Quintette-Club, who had the assistance of Messrs. Burt and Stearns. Their correct, and always artistic playing, was not lost on the singers, who came up to their work with a will, and gave the choruses with almost unerring precision and promptness—and in good time and tune. Certainly, better choral singing is not often heard. "O, the pleasure of the plains," and "Happy We," were especially inspiring, and readily found favor with the audience. It would be difficult, where all was so good, to particularize what was best; but the triumph of the singers was in the difficult choruses, "Wretched Lovers," which was exceedingly well given, and highly creditable to Mr. Allen's ability as conductor. The solos were generally well sung; although there was at times a little want of animation, and an occasional lack of finish—faults always of amateur performances. Miss Whiting, recently of this city, but now of Springfield, took the part of Galatea, and contributed in no small degree to the excellence of the evening's performance. Under Zerrahn's careful instruction, she is advancing to a high rank among native singers—a place that will be won not only by acknowledged talent, but by a conscientious study of what is highest and best in music, without which no performer can succeed in giving truly artistic interpretations. The other soloists were Mr. Richards, Acis; Mr. Knight, Damon; Mrs. Richards; Miss Hood, whose voice has much richness of tone; and Mr. Hammond, Polypheus. The latter gentleman acquitted himself well, giving to his part much of the needed energy and force, without a thought of theatrical exaggeration. The other two were generally successful, and their efforts deserved more than a passing notice. Mrs. Hammond, as pianist for the Club, had an important duty which was well performed. She has more merit than many who are less retiring; and has unusual taste and skill as an accompanist. As for the little orchestra, its playing, aside from the other attractions of the evening, was something to be remembered with satisfaction and pleasure. The seven instruments, played by such performers, produced more sound than would the instruments of a score of indifferent players, and every tone was as "true as steel."

During an intermission between the parts, miscellaneous selections were given.

The Hamilton Club, which retires from the field as the season approaches for the rehearsals of the Mozart Society, celebrated its adjournment for the year by a pleasant social festival on Tuesday evening. After the transaction of business, the society, by invitation of its president, Mr. D. H. O'Neil, visited Marra's supper room, exchanging, over an oyster supper, mutual congratulations upon the success that might have crowned their late concert had the public been disposed to award it. "Better a failure on the part of the audience than on the part of the singers," was the well-expressed sentiment of the Club, and one that will yet gain for it the favor it deserves. Edward Hamilton, Esq., in honor of whom the society takes its name, made some happy remarks, thanking them for the personal compliment implied in their name, congratulating them upon their musical if not pecuniary success, and wishing them a prosperous future. Other members of the society followed, in speeches made upon the principle that "brevity is the soul of wit," and the proceedings were throughout, marked by a spirit of friendliness and good will—a social harmony, which does not always dwell among musical fraternities. Success to the Hamilton Club!

MR. CHARLES C. PERKINS'S "TUSCAN SCULPTURE." The Messrs. Longman & Co. announce in press a magnificent work on Tuscan Sculpture, from its revival to its decline. It is to be published in two quarto volumes, with numerous illustrations on steel and wood designs by the author. Mr. Perkins has lived many years in Europe, and is recognized both in Great Britain and on the Continent as a scholar of eminent ability. Although, so long a resident abroad, he has always shown a true patriot's interest in his native land, attesting by his liberality his sincere regard for the welfare of home. Crawford's glowing statue of Beethoven, standing in front of the great organ, is a perpetual reminder of Mr. Perkins's magnificent generosity, that work being his gift many years ago to the Music Hall.

The great work on the Sculpture of Tuscany will not probably appear till some time in 1864, the designs of so elaborate an undertaking taking years for the engraving. Boston may well be proud of Mr. Perkins, and will hail his book with the welcome every true mark of genius should receive.—Transcript.

From Mendelssohn's Letters. New Volume.

TO FELIX MENDELSSOHN BARTHOLDY IN DUSSELDORF, FROM HIS FATHER.*

Berlin, March 10, 1835.

This is the third letter that I write to you this week, and if it goes on in this way, the reading of my letters will become a standing article in your budget of time-expenses; but then you must charge it to your own account, for you are spoiling me through praise. I pass at once to the musical part of your last letter.

I am particularly struck with your remark, that Sebastian Bach transforms every room, where he is sung, into a church; and so upon a single hearing the conclusion of the piece you mention has made the same impression upon me. Otherwise I confess I cannot get over my aversion to figured Chorals in general, because I do not understand precisely the idea that lies at their foundation, especially where the two contending masses are kept in equilibrium of power. Where, as for example in the first chorus of the Passion, the Choral only forms a more weighty and consistent part of the whole, or where, as in the above mentioned piece of the Cantata, if I remember rightly after this single hearing, the Choral is the main building, and the single voice only an ornament, I can more readily conceive of the idea and object,—but not at all where the figure executes variations in a certain sense upon the theme. It will never do to trifle with the Choral. The highest aim with it is, that the people sing it purely with the accompaniment of the organ,—every thing else appears to me idle and unchurch-like.

At the last music morning at Fanny's* the motet of Bach: Gottes Zeit ist die allerbeste Zeit, and your Ave Maria were sung by select voices. A large passage of the latter, in the middle, as well as the end also, seemed to me too artificial and difficult for the simply pious and altogether genuine Catholic style, which for the rest prevails in it. Now if Rebecca* remarks that some confusion occurred in the execution of the very passages which I have regarded as too difficult, it only proves that I am an ignoramus, but not that the end is not too subtly modulated. Now as regards Bach, the piece named seems to me altogether wonderful. The introduction, which Fanny played particularly finely, has surprised me and taken hold of me as nothing has done for a long time, and I was forced again to think of Bach's solitude, of his utterly isolated position among his surroundings and contemporaries, of his pure, mild, immense power, and the clearness of his depth. Of the single pieces, "Bestelle dein Haus," and "Es ist der alte Bund," impressed me instantly and lastingly; but the Bass aria with the alto solos less. What first became clear to me in the Passion music, that Bach is the musical representative of Protestantism, grows positively or negatively evident to me in every new piece that I hear of him;—thus lately through the Mass, which I heard in the Academy, and which seems to me most decidedly anti-Catholic; all its great beauties seem to me to avail as little towards solving the intrinsic contradiction, as it would to have Mass read in a Protestant church by a Protestant clergyman. At the same time it became clear to me anew, what a great service Zelter has done in giving Bach back to the Germans; for between Forkel and him Bach was little talked of, and what little talk there was, was almost solely about the "Well-tempered Clavichord." On him first dawned the true light about Bach, through the possession of other works of his, with which he became acquainted as a collector, and taught others to know as a true artist. His Friday musical performances are another proof that nothing, which is begun in earnest and silently continued without interruption, can be without results. It is at least made out, that your musical direction would without Zelter have been a wholly different one.

Your proposal, to restore Handel in his original form, has suggested to me some thoughts about the later instrumentation of his works. Here the question commonly arises, whether Handel, if he wrote to-day, would not make use of all the musical means now at hand for the composition of his oratorios, which after all amounts simply to this: whether the artistic moral phenomenon, to which we give the name of Handel, would assume the same outward form to-day, that it had 100 years ago; or in a wider sense, whether the world to-day looks as it did 100 years ago;—to which the answer is self-evident. But one must put the question otherwise: not whether Handel would compose his oratorios to-day as he did 100 years ago, but whether he would compose oratorios at all. Hardly perhaps, if they are now to be written only as they have been in these latest times. From my saying this to you you may infer, how full of expectation and of confidence I look forward to your own oratorio, which, it is to be hoped, will solve the problem of the union of the old feeling with the new means; else it will fail of effect, just as surely as those painters of the 19th century would only make themselves ridiculous, who should try to reproduce the religiosity of the 15th century with long arms and legs and a perspective set upon the head. To me the new means, as indeed every thing in the world, seem to have come at the right time to support and quicken the inner motives as they grew weaker; for on that height of religious feeling, on which Bach, Handel and their contemporaries found themselves, they needed no great orchestra for their oratorios; and I myself remember very well, in my earliest years, how the "Messiah," "Judas" and "Alexander's Feast," just as Handel wrote them, and even without organ, were given to the delight and edification of all.

But how is the thing to be come at now, when noise in music has gradually developed in the same ratio with its emptiness of thought? The orchestra is here, and will retain its present form for a long while perhaps without essential alteration. But riches is only then a fault, when one knows not how to use it. How then shall the riches of the orchestra be used? What occasion can the poet give to it, and in what regions, or shall the music separate itself entirely from the poetry and work independently and purely? I do not believe that it will be able to do the latter, at least only in a limited degree, and not with general validity; but for the former an object would have to be found, as well for music as for painting, which by its truth to inward feeling, by its universal validity and intelligibility, should be able to supply the place of the earlier religious objects. Now I cannot help fancying that Haydn's two oratorios are a very remarkable manifestation also in this regard. Both the poems are weak, considered as such; but they have in a very happy manner, instead of the old positive and almost supersensual religious motive, seized the one which Nature, as the visible emanation of Deity, in her universality and her thousandfold individuality, inspires in every open soul. Hence the infinitely deep, but also cheerful, universally current and certainly truly religious effect of these two works, which to this day stand entirely alone;—hence the working together of all the trivial, playful details with the grandest and truest feeling of gratitude, which gushes from the whole; and hence too it comes, that, I at least, would be as unwilling to miss the crowing of the cock, the singing of the lark, the lowing of the cattle, and the merriment of the country people, whether in the "Creation" or the "Seasons," as in Nature itself. In other words: the "Creation" and the "Seasons" are founded upon Nature and the visible worship of God, and shall there not still be found new stuff for music there?

The publication of Goethe's "Correspondence with a Child," I hold to be a scandalous and pernicious misuse of the press, whereby faster and faster all illusion, without which life is a death, is destroyed. May you be happy with illusions and preserve the childlike attachment to your FATHER.

TO HIS FATHER.

Düsseldorf, March 23, 1835.

DEAR FATHER,—I have got to thank you for the last letter and my Ave; I am often at a loss to comprehend how it is possible to have so accurate a judgment about music, without being technically musical; and if I could say that which I certainly feel about it, as clearly and intuitively as you do, the moment you speak about it, I would never again make a single confused speech in all my life. A thousand thanks for it, and for your words about Bach. You have, to be sure, after a single imperfect hearing of my piece, * Mendelssohn's brother, who edits the Letters, says: "The following letter from Mendelssohn's father will certainly be read with interest, as it sheds a clear light on the intellectual relations between father and son." It has been selected out of a large number of similar imports.

* Mendelssohn's sister, who married the painter Hansel, and lived in Berlin.

* Rebecca Dirichlet, another sister of Mendelssohn.

found out what I have only now after a long acquaintance found, and I ought perhaps to feel a little mortified about it; and then after all it is a j to me to know that such a clearness of feeling in music exists, and that you have got just that; for the whole trouble in the end, and in the middle passage, lies in such little faults, which could have been corrected with so few notes (namely by striking them out), that neither I nor any other musician would have come upon it without frequent hearing, since as a rule we seek much deeper. It injures the simplicity of the sound, which is just what pleases me in the beginning; and though I also think it would strike one less in a perfect execution, especially with a large choir, still the effect will never be just what it should be. Another time I will do it better. But I should like to have you hear the Bach once more, because a piece, to which you attach less consequence, pleases me the most of all:—it is the Alto and Bass aria; only the Choral must be sung by many alto voices, and the Bass be sung very finely. Splendid as are the pieces: "Beste dein Haus" and "Es ist der alle Bund," yet there is something very sublime and deep-felt in the plan of the following piece, in the way that the Alto begins, and the Bass breaks in all fresh and new, and sticks to his words, while the Choral enters as a third party, and then the Bass joyfully concludes, but the Choral not for a long time, but keeps singing on more and more quietly and earnestly. Moreover it is peculiar with this music;—it must fall very early, or very late in Bach's career; for it differs entirely from the usual mode of writing of his middle period; and the first chorus sentences and the concluding chorus are such, that I should not have taken them for Sebastian Bach, but for some other composer of that time; whereas no other man can have made one bar of the middle pieces.

Mother is not quite just to Hiller; for, in spite of his pleasures and honors in Paris and his backslidings in Frankfort, he writes, that he envies me my place here on the Rhine with all its disagreeable features; and as another may perhaps be found in Germany, I do not give up the hope of persuading him back out of the Parisian honor and pleasure atmosphere into the work room.

Now farewell, dear father. Pray let me hear from you soon and much. Your FELIX.

What They Say of the Great Organ.

From the Atlantic Monthly, (O. W. Holmes).

The great organ of the Music Hall is a choir of nearly six thousand vocal throats. Its largest wind-pipes are thirty-two feet in length, and a man can crawl through them. Its finest tubes are too small for a baby's whistle. Eighty-nine stops produce the various changes and combinations of which its immense orchestra is capable, from the purest solo of a singing nun to the loudest chorus in which all its groups of voices have their part in the full flow of its harmonies. Like all instruments of its class, it contains several distinct systems of pipes, commonly spoken of as separate organs, and capable of being played alone or in connection with each other. Four manuals, or hand key-boards, and two pedals*, or foot key-boards, command these several systems,—the solo organ, the choir organ, the swell organ, and the great organ, and the piano and forte pedal-organ. Twelve pairs of bellows, which it is intended to move by water-power, derived from the Cochituate reservoirs, furnish the breath which pours itself forth in music. Those beautiful effects for which the organ is incomparable, the crescendo and diminuendo,—the gradual rise of the sound from the lowest murmur to the loudest blast, and the dying fall by which it steals gently back into silence,—the dissolving views, so to speak, of harmony,—are not only provided for in the swell-organ, but may be obtained by special adjustments from the several systems of pipes and from the entire instrument.

It would be anticipating the proper time for judgment, if we should speak of the excellence of the musical qualities of the great organ before having had the opportunity of hearing its full powers displayed. We have enjoyed the privilege, granted to few as yet, of listening to some portions of the partially mounted instrument, from which we can confidently infer that its effect, when all its majestic voices find utterance, must be noble and enchanting beyond all common terms of praise. But even without such imperfect trial, we have a right, merely from a knowledge of its principles of construction, of the preëminent skill of its builder, of the time spent in its construction, of the extraordinary means taken to insure its perfection, and of the liberal scale of expenditure which has rendered all the rest possible, to feel sure that we are to hear the instrument which is and will probably long remain beyond dispute the first of the New World and second to none in the Old in the sum of its excellences and capacities.

The mere comparison of numbers of pipes and of stops, or of external dimensions, though it gives an approximate idea of the scale of an organ, is not so decisive as it might seem as to its real musical effectiveness. In some cases, many of the stops are rather nominal than of any real significance. Even in the Harlem organ, which has only about two-thirds as many as the Boston one, Dr. Burney says, "The variety they afford is by no means what might be expected." It is obviously easy to multiply the small pipes to almost any extent. The dimensions of an organ, in its external aspect, must depend a good deal on the height of the edifice in which it is contained. Thus, the vaulted roof of the Cathedral of Ulm permitted the builder of our Music-Hall organ to pile the façade of the one he constructed for that edifice up to the giddy elevation of almost a hundred feet, while the famous instrument in the Town Hall of Birmingham has only three-quarters of the height of our own, which is sixty feet. It is obvious also that the effective power of an organ does not depend merely on its size, but that the perfection of all its parts will have quite as much to do with it. In judging a vocalist, we can form but a very poor guess of the compass, force, quality of the voice from a mere inspection of the throat and chest. In the case of the organ, however, we have the advantage of being able to minutely inspect every throat and larynx, to walk into the interior of the working mechanism, and to see the adaptation of each part to its office. In absolute power and compass the Music Hall organ ranks among the three or four mightiest instruments ever built. In the perfection of all its parts, and in its whole arrangements, it challenges comparison with any the world can show.

Such an instrument ought to enshrine itself in an outward frame that should correspond in some measure to the grandeur and loveliness of its own musical character. It has been a dream of metaphysicians, that the soul shaped its own body. If this many-throated singing creature could have sung itself into an external form, it could hardly have moulded one more expressive of its own nature. We must leave to those more skilled in architecture the detailed description of that noble façade which fills the eye with music as the voices from behind it fill the mind through the ear with vague, dreamy pictures. For us it loses all technical character in its relations to the soul of which it is the body. It is as if a glorious anthem had passed into outward solid form in the very ecstasy of its grandest chorus. Milton has told us of such a miracle, wrought by fallen angels, it is true, but in a description rich with all his opulence of caressing and ennobling language:—

"Anon out of the earth a fabric huge
Rose, like an exhalation, with the sound
Of dulcet symphonies and voices sweet,
Built like a temple, where pilasters round
Were set, and Doric pillars overlaid
With golden architrave; nor did there want Cornice or frieze with bossy sculptures grav'n."

The structure is of black walnut, and is covered with carved statues, busts, masks, and figures in the boldest relief. In the centre a richly ornamented arch contains the niche for the key-boards and stops. A colossal mask of a singing woman looks from over its summit. The pediment above is surmounted by the bust of Johann Sebastian Bach. Behind this rises the lofty central division, containing pipes, and crowning it is a beautiful sitting statue of Saint Cecilia, holding her lyre. On each side of her a griffin sits as guardian. This centre is connected by harp-shaped compartments, filled with pipes, to the two great round towers, one on each side, and each of them containing three colossal pipes. These magnificent towers come boldly forward into the hall, being the most prominent, as they are the highest and stateliest, part of the façade. At the base of each a gigantic half-caryatid, in the style of the ancient hermæ, but finished to the waist, bends beneath the superincumbent weight, like Atlas under the globe. These figures are of wonderful force, the muscular development almost excessive, but in keeping with their superhuman task. At each side of the base two lion-hermæ share in the task of the giant. Over the base rise the round pillars which support the dome and inclose the three great pipes already mentioned. Graceful as these look in their position, half a dozen men might creep into one of them and lie hidden. A man of six feet high went up a ladder, and standing at the base of one of them could just reach to put his hand into the mouth at its lower part, above the conical foot. The three great pipes are crowned by a heavily sculptured, ribbed, rounded dome; and this is surmounted, on each side, by two cherubs, whose heads almost touch the lofty ceiling. This whole portion of the sculpture is of eminent beauty. The two exquisite cherubs of one side are playing on the lyre and the lute; those of the other side on the flute and the horn. All the reliefs that run round the lower portion of the dome are of singular richness. We have had an opportunity of seeing one of the artist's photographs, which showed in detail the full-length figures and the large central mask of this portion of the work, and found them as beautiful on close inspection as the originals at a distance.

Two other lateral compartments, filled with pipes, and still more suggestive of the harp in their form, lead to the square lateral towers. Over these compartments, close to the round tower, sits on each side a harper, a man on the right, a woman on the left, with their harps, all apparently of natural size. The square towers, holding pipes in their open interior, are lower than the round towers, and full somewhat back from the front. Below, three colossal hermæ of Sibyl-like women perform for them the office which the giants and the lion-shapes perform for the round towers. The four pillars which rise from the base are square, and the dome which surmounts them is square also. Above the dome is a vase-like support, upon which are disposed figures of the lyre and other musical symbols.

The whole base of the instrument, in the intervals of the figures described, is covered with elaborate carvings. Groups of musical instruments, standing out almost detached from the background, occupy the panels. Ancient and modern, clustered with careless grace and quaint variety, from the violin down to a string of sleigh-bells, they call up all the echoes of forgotten music, such as the thousand-tongued organ blends together in one grand harmony.

The instrument is placed upon a low platform, the outlines of which are in accordance with its own. Its whole height is about sixty feet, its breadth forty-eight feet, and its average depth twenty-four feet. Some idea of its magnitude may be got from the fact that the wind-machinery and the swell-organ alone fill up the whole recess occupied by the former organ, which was not a small one. All the other portions of the great instrument come forward into the hall.

In front of its centre stands Crawford's noble bronze statue of Beethoven, the gift of our townsman, Mr. Charles C. Perkins. It might be suggested that so fine a work of Art should have a platform wholly to itself; but the eye soon reconciles itself to the position of the statue, and the tremulous atmosphere which surrounds the vibrating organ is that which the almost breathing figure would seem to delight in, as our imagination invests it with momentary consciousness.

As we return to the impression produced by the grand façade, we are more and more struck with the subtle art displayed in its adaptations and symbolisms. Never did any structure we have looked upon so fully justify Madame de Staël's definition of architecture as "frozen music." The outermost towers, their pillars and domes, are all square, their outlines thus passing without too sudden transitions from the sharp square angles of the vaulted ceiling and the rectangular lines of the walls of the hall itself into the more central parts of the instrument, where a smoother harmony of outline is predominant. For in the great towers, which step forward, as it were, to represent the meaning of the entire structure, the lines are all curved, as if the slight discords which gave sharpness and variety to its less vital portions were all resolved as we approached its throbbing heart. And again, the half fantastic repetitions of musical forms in the principal outlines—the lyre-like shape of the bases of the great towers, the harp-like figure of the connecting wings, the clustering reeds of the columns—fill the mind with musical suggestions, and dispose the wondering spectator to become the entranced listener.

The great organ would be but half known, if it were not played in a place fitted for it in dimensions. In the open air the sound would be diluted and lost; in an ordinary hall the atmosphere would be churned into a mere tumult by the vibrations. The Boston Music Hall is of ample size to give play to the waves of sound, yet not so large that its space will not be filled and saturated with the overflowing resonance. It is one hundred and thirty feet in length by seventy-eight in breadth and sixty-five in height, being thus of somewhat greater dimensions than the celebrated Town Hall of Birmingham. At the time of building it, (1852,) its great height was ordered partly with reference to the future possibility of its being furnished with a large organ. It will be observed that the three dimensions above given are all multiples of the same number, thirteen, the length being ten times, the breadth six times and the height five times this number. This is in accordance with Mr. Scott Russell's recommendation, and has been explained by the fact that vibrating solids divide into harmonic lengths, separated by nodal points of rest, and that these last are equally distributed at aliquot parts of its whole length. If the whole extent of the walls be in vibration, its angles should come in at the nodal points in order to avoid the confusion arising from different vibrating lengths; and for this reason they are placed at aliquot parts of its entire length. Thus the hall is itself a kind of passive musical instrument, or at least a sounding-board, constructed on theoretical principles. Whatever is thought of the theory, it proves in practice to possess the excellence which is liable to be lost in the construction of the best-designed edifice.

From the New York Tribune, Nov. 6.

I hesitate to approach a description of the instrument, either as it regards its external appearance, or as respects its contents as an instrument. Externally, it is so vast, so utterly beyond and so entirely different from anything in the form of an organ that we have seen in this country, that to speak of its exterior as a case, as we are wont to do, is an absurdity, and even the German word, Orgel-gehäuse, the organ House, we feel to be inadequate to express the huge proportions, the elaborate decorations and matchless symmetry of this wonderful Palace of Harmony. It is surely, at least, a place where the Queen of Harmony may dwell, if not a Temple in which her patron saint may be fitly worshipped.

Let me attempt to give, in a few words, an idea of its size, as the spectator sees it from the front. The beautiful, exquisitely carved statues that surmount it, almost touch the lofty gold-ribbed ceiling, sixty-five feet from the floor where the spectator sits, and these lovely cherubs, and the holy Saint Cecilia, which, when you stood beside them before they were raised to these giddy pinnacles, towered above your head, seem dwarfed to exquisite statuettes; while far below the floor are the works which give breath to the great instrument—the bellows—worked by an ingenious application of water-power, happily overcoming the difficulty of finding always ready a half dozen brawny laborers to do this indispensable work.

The breadth of the organ is about fifty feet, nearly the whole width of the stage. The central portion projects 18 feet from the stage from the end wall, the swell organ and a part of the wind work occupying a large recess beyond the stage entirely out of sight. I know nothing that so nearly gives an idea of the ground plan as the conventional form of bow (which of four manuals is in the centre beneath a beautifully-carved arch, wreathed with acanthus leaves, surmounted by a colossal female head, open-mouthed, as if singing. Above this a magnificent bust of the great master of the organ, JOHN SEBASTIAN BACH, grand and solemn in its aspect, looks down, colossal, upon the multitude, and still below, the motto, "GLORIA IN EXCELSIS."

Most conspicuous of all parts are the lofty towers that rise on each side of the centre, each containing three of the great 32-foot pipes of solid tin, shining like burnished silver. The eye follows these glittering columns to the richly carved dome that caps the towers, surmounted, high above all, by groups of cherubs playing the lute and horn, the flute and lyre.

Half way down these towers on each side is an exquisite figure resting against its side, with a golden-stringed harp in its hand, one side male, the other female, which are among the most beautiful ornaments of the front.

The outline of these harping figures conducts the eye easily to that part of the exterior of less height lying between these central towers and those that flank the extreme sides.

The central pipes have not yet arrived, and their place last night was filled by the flags of Würtemberg and the United States, and other appropriate decorations.

At each extremity of the front are two lower towers, of different form, square in their outlines, so as to blend in better harmony with the architecture of the sides of the hall. These are also to contain other enormous pipes, which, by mischance have not yet arrived from Europe. The space which they will fill, is temporarily occupied by tasteful ornaments, in keeping with the whole structure. Between these towers and the central ones are rows of glittering pipes, all of the same highly polished metal, forming a most admirable contrast with the black walnut of which the structure is composed. The base of the whole case, below the feet of the great pipes, is elaborately decorated in its panels by carvings in the boldest relief, of groups of various musical instruments, while, at intervals, are giant caryatids of Atlantean proportions upon whose sturdy shoulders rests the ponderous mass or the lofty structure. At intervals are placed black marble tablets, bearing in letters of gold, the names of the great masters of harmony, Gluck, Mozart, Palestrina, Orlando Lasso, and others. To relieve the possible monotony of so great a mass of dark wood, various points of the carvings and architectural ornaments are gilded, thus lighting up the whole, and attracting the eye to portions which might otherwise pass unnoticed. With all this wealth of ornament (which it takes so many inadequate words to describe), there is no overloading. The great size of the organ prevents that, and the effect is the most chaste and faultless.

It would be an idle task to undertake to speak critically of the details of so great an instrument, on a single hearing, even under the hands of such skillful players. Suffice it to say that I heard no dissenting opinions, all agreeing as to its vast volume of tone, so evenly balanced through its entire compass, so full and rich in every part, and supported and sustained by the pedale of twenty stops; agreeing as to the beauty of tone of such individual stops as could be displayed on an occasion like this and as to the perfection of the mechanism which permitted a first performance marked by no accident and no failure.

In writing about this, the recollection of your correspondent cannot help going back seven years or more, and recalling the unwearied efforts of Dr. UPHAM (the President of the Music Hall Association), and the persistent industry with which he canvassed the city and neighborhood, for contributions of every amount, from every source to which he had access, to start a fund which he confidently assured everybody would give to Boston an organ unequalled upon this continent, and in some respects unsurpassed in Europe.

Such untiring energy and enthusiasm could hardly fail of ultimate success. He met everywhere a kindly welcome, and those who could not themselves subscribe, were glad to send the doctor to some friend more happily situated, who could contribute. So, in due time the subscription book was filled and the necessary arrangements were completed between the subscribers and the Music Hall Association, and the preliminary inquiries were set on foot in order to contracting for the work.

The labors of Dr. UPHAM did not end with the successful effort of raising the money. He then set himself to work to study the history and construction of the organ, examined all the principal instruments in this country, and visited the chief organ factories in our chief cities. A tour through Europe was nothing to him in his zeal to do thoroughly what he had taken in hand; so he went on an organ pilgrimage through England, France, and Germany, to hear all the great organs of the Old World and visit the famous workshops where they are made. The readers of "Dwight's Journal of Music" will recall with pleasure the account of this "Summer Tour among the Organs," with which they were favored from time to time during Dr. UPHAM's absence.

The result of these careful and laborious inquiries was a contract made with the Messrs. E. F. WALKER & Co. of Ludwigsburg, whose greatest work, the organ in the Cathedral at Ulm, stands unapproached among the productions of modern organ-builders, and ranks with the greatest works of the master-builders of former days.

Seldom, indeed, is any enterprise so much indebted to any individual for its original conception, for the raising the necessary means for carrying it into execution, and for intelligent, enthusiastic direction and oversight of the work in general and in detail, from its beginning to its successful completion.

The beautiful case was constructed by the Brothers HERTER of New York, the germ of the plan being a design by HAMMATT BILLINGS of Boston, who was the first to recognize the improvements suggested by the artist builders, and to urge the adoption of their modifications of his plan.

Above the keyboard, in letters of gold, we read this inscription:

E. F. WALKER & Co., Ludwigsburg,
Kdm. Wurtemberg.

Begun February 1857, Finished Oct. 1863.

There it will stand perfect and complete, a worthy monument of the builder's fame, so long as time shall spare the walls within which it has been consecrated.

Gounod's "Faust"

(From the New York Times, Nov. 26.)

ACADEMY OF MUSIC.—PRODUCTION OF GOUNOD'S OPERA OF "FAUST."—The "Faust" which M. Gounod has set to music, is not the exuberant dramatic production of Goethe, nor the simple, time-honored legend used by Spohr. It is the melodrama of MM. Barbier and Carré, of Niblo's Garden. The work, it will be remembered, retains many of the most striking situations of the original poem, but its plan, and its dénouement, are different. Those who are familiar with the works of the great German poet, will perceive at once—from the synopsis which accompanies our remarks on the music—where the several divergences take place. M. Gounod's opera was produced in Paris nearly ten years ago. Its success was immediate, and its popularity has ever since been on the increase. Last night saw its production on the boards of our Academy, and witnessed a new success for the composer.

We will proceed to a consideration of the more prominent points of the work. In the first act Faust—old and decrepid—is discovered in his studio—an excessively uncomfortable apartment, by the way, with a megatherium in the corner, and a stuffed alligator overhead—bemoaning the vanity of human wishes, and the emptiness of existence. He determines to seek oblivion in death. Filling a goblet with poison, he is lifting it to his lips, when a chorus of village maidens is heard from without, and arrests his hand. The strain fascinates him for a moment; but when it ceases his gloom returns. He raises the beaker once more, and is again interrupted. This time it is a chorus of laborers singing of the bright sky, the fair earth, and the charms of labor. Rendered frantic by these demonstrations of an external world, of which he knows so little, Faust imprecates his fate, and calls upon Satan to come to his assistance. Mephistopheles thereupon makes his appearance, and a compact is entered into. Faust claims a new life, and is restored to youth, "on the usual terms." The musical plan of this act is ingenious, and the treatment good. The scholarly weariness, disappointment and despair of the philosopher—checked momentarily by the choruses we have referred to—are cleverly realized; although the choruses of themselves are singularly poor, and Faust is sometimes labored as well as learned in his musical agony. When Mephistopheles joins the scene, he comes like an old acquaintance. Gounod has evidently met him before, probably in "Der Freischütz" or "Robert le Diable." He (the Fiend) has peculiarities of his own, however, if not consistencies like Caspar and Bertram in the two last-named works. He is a sarcastic demon, a jocos and genteel devil, who sings acceptably and gets cruelly swindled at last. In the duo of the compact he is diabolically argumentative, and clinches the nail by a tableau vivant of the fair Margherita. She is at her spinning-wheel, and the orchestra gives us for the first time the melody that is subsequently heard in the garden-scene duo of the third act. The way in which Gounod has handled the rather slight materials of this act displays a valuable knowledge of stage effect. It is appropriate and skilful. The concluding allegro of the duet between Faust and Mephistopheles has no particular character of its own, and is barely up to the merit of the earlier portion of the piece. It was badly rendered last night.

The second act opens with the rustic festivities of the Kermesse. Students, soldiers, burghers, maidens and matrons are enjoying themselves. Valentine, the brother of Margherita, joins them. He is going to the wars, and all his friends crowd around him to give assurance of their friendship, and the promise of protection to Margherita, should she ever need it. Mephistopheles mixes with the party, volunteers a song, and sings in praise of gold, (Dio dell' Or, del mondo Signor). After this his conduct is exceedingly reprehensible. He affronts the students, and endeavors to excite a riot. They try to get rid of him with the points of their swords, but the fiend surrounds himself with a magic circle, beyond which the steel cannot penetrate. It is only when the students turn the cross of their swords toward him that he flees in dismay. From this point the festivities are resumed. During their continuance, Faust catches his first glimpse of Margherita, and speaks to her a few sentences of flattery which she does not afterwards forget. The variety and picturesqueness of the action in this Kermesse scene are very pleasing, and have been seized with great effect by the composer. The opening chorus of students, burghers, etc., referred to above, is already famous. The leading theme is fresh, sparkling and spirited, whilst the internal construction of the whole is unusually interesting. It gives scope and a certain degree of originality to all the characters on the stage. The phrases for the soldiers, for the citizens (a shaky set of Jews) and for the students are distinctive, yet they blend agreeably into the brilliant whole. Mephistopheles's rondo in praise of the golden calf is savage and cynical, but possesses vigor. The best part of the scene with the students is where they succeed in subduing Mephistopheles with the hilts of their swords. This is effective and novel. Quiet but impressive traits of infernal relish for mischief are noticeable in every action of the potentate outside the tavern. The finale to the act, and the most popular number in it, is the waltz and chorus (come la brezza). Of the dance it is sufficient to say that it would do credit to any composer—especially to Flotow, from whom it is partly borrowed. It is lively, graceful and well marked. The animation of the finale, of which it is a part, is indeed irresistible, and in its way perfect. What with the chorus accompanying the dancers, and the ballet tripping to the waltz, and the little episode of Faust meeting Margherita amongst the peasants, the scene is literally crowded with excitement and contrast. The passages between the hero and heroine are very brief. He offers her his arm in a courtly andantino, and receives a rebuff in one of the most exquisitely graceful and primly appropriate passages of the opera.

The third act deals exclusively with the celebrated garden scene of the poet. Siebel, the accepted suitor of Margherita, enters. He sings (the part is played here by Mlle. Sulzer) some couplets (Parlate d'amore) while gathering flowers for a bouquet, which he leaves as an humble offering to his sweetheart. The melody is simple, unadorned and touching. It is followed by the cavatina of Faust. Left for a moment to himself, the rejuvenated philosopher is inspired with the scene of Margherita's virtuous and happy home. He apostrophizes the humble dwelling in an exquisite solo (Salvi dimora casta e pura). The thoughtfulness of the philosopher, and the honest aspirations of a generous lover, are beautifully blended in this wonderful composition. Sentiment and expression pervades every note, and this, too, despite the fact that the melodic line is not always clearly defined. Perhaps this obscurity was intentional. It certainly contributes to, rather than detracts from the effect. The moral impression of Faust's reflections is soon dispelled by Mephistopheles, who enters with a casket containing jewels, which he places beside Siebel's modest offering of flowers, and withdraws to see which bait will be taken. In the next number we are introduced to Margherita. Her mind still dwells on the youth she has encountered at the Kermesse, and who there offered her his arm. She tries to purge it of this dangerous curiosity, but throughout the legend which she sings, the incident recurs to her mind, and disturbs her song. These little interruptions display much ingenuity, and give dramatic interest to the melody. The chanson is on Goethe's well-known ballad: "Es war ein Koenig in Thule." It is written in a minor key, and gains what interest it possesses from being thoroughly singable in melody and perfectly square in form. The conclusion of the scene, where Margherita finds the flowers of her old lover, and the jewels of her new one—accepting the latter—is strangely inferior. It is a trivial waltz subject, possessing neither novelty of idea nor freshness of treatment and far beneath the average of the act. The scene between Mephistopheles and Martha in which the wily strategist informs the lady of the death of her husband, is excellently contrived, and the subsequent quartet in which Faust and Margherita join this interesting couple, and both pairs, according to their separate fashions, engage in the arduous task of making love, displays again the happy dramatic instinct possessed by the composer, which, if it does not lead to any new and startling combinations, as it sometimes does with other composers, is used with singular freedom from embarrassment. The love duet between Faust and Margherita (Tardi si fa addio) is built on the theme introduced in the vision of the first act. It is a melodious and lovely inspiration, which, from its earnest feeling, will make its way to every heart. The orchestral treatment is very noticeable, especially in this part of the act. An agitato concludes the duet. It is its weakest feature. The act closes with Margherita's scene at the window. With small and unimportant exceptions, it is from beginning to end grand in conception and superb in execution. Delicacy of feeling and elevation of thought are combined in it to a wonderful degree. If the whole of the music were equal to what we find in the third act, "Faust" would be the finest opera ever written. (!) It is not far from being so even now. (!!)

The fourth act opens with a scene for Margherita expressive of her determination to seek refuge from the jeers of her own sex in the church. The scene at the church naturally follows, and her temptation by, and triumph over, Mephistopheles are described. The piece is very quiet and fine. Valentine's return affords an opportunity for a military fanfare and a soldiers' chorus—both destined to be heard on Broadway for evermore. They are very spirited, but moulded in a somewhat common form. Whilst the warrior is in his sister's town-house Mephistopheles makes his appearance and sings a serenade of a jeering and grinning sort. Valentine rushes out and demands from whom he is to receive satisfaction for his sister's wrongs. Faust, who is with his familiar, draws his sword and the trio of the duel commences. This, like the tenor cavatina, is a small masterpiece. To the musicians it must always be a study; so perfect are its proportions, so admirable its plan, so unequalled its effects. The death of Valentine forms the finale to the act. Although not comparable in any way to the trio, it is a pathetic and even poetic realization of a catastrophe that deprives Margherita of her senses and never fails to grieve and shock the audience.

The fifth act is confined to the prison scene. Margherita is in durance on the charge of having slain her offspring. Her reason wanders, and this affords an opportunity to the composer to indulge in reminiscent snatches of the melodies heard in the earlier acts of the opera. The duo finale is between herself and Faust. Margherita dies and goes up to Heaven on the high notes of the violin. (!) Faust repents him of his sins, falls on his knees and prays for forgiveness. The poor devil, Mephistopheles, who has been at a great deal of trouble in the business, is shamefully cheated out of his dues. Of the fifth act we need only add that it is short, and is remarkable chiefly for a striking recognition of Meyerbeer's style in treating similar subjects.

In manner rather than matter, there are frequent traces of well-known masters in M. Gounod's score. Sometimes they come to us in the shape of harsh modulations, and dreary, drawing intervals, as in Wagner; sometimes in the use of the violins, as in Meyerbeer; and sometimes in weird combinations of the wood instruments, as in Mendelssohn. But these indications of a studious and retentive mind, are far too slight to detract from the general and unquestionable merit and originality of the opera, as a whole. M. Gounod has produced a work of singular interest. That he is a musician of the ripest knowledge, cannot for a moment be questioned; that he possesses an instinct for what is popular, as well as a sense of that which is artistic and good, is also certain. His dramatic aptitudes, too, are remarkably quick. It is safe to say that not a single "situation" in the play has been lost for want of a perception of its value. In the use of the orchestra he is judicious and effective, without being extravagant. We know of no composer who can claim much superiority over him in this respect. "Faust," indeed, although unequal in its parts, deserves to be regarded as the most gratifying addition to operatic music that has been made during the past fifteen years. If—as its success would indicate—it is the pioneer work of a new school of French opera, then we may hopefully look to France for that juste milieu of intellectual dignity and emotional warmth which Germany has sought for in vain, and Italy is not destined to supply.

Musical Correspondence.

[The first two letters were necessarily omitted in our last number.]

HARTFORD, CONN., NOV. 23.—MAX STRAKOSCH has been here with his troupe—Mr. GOTTSCHALK, Mme. STRAKOSCH, CARLO PATTI and Mr. BEHRENS.—Touro Hall was filled at their Concert, of course. Gottschalk was captivating;—but why does he always make a "niunny" of himself, whenever he takes his place at the Piano-forte before an audience—by the nervous attempts to disrobe his fair fingers of those close-fitting "kicks"—giving them (his fingers) an imaginary plunge bath—rubbing and wringing the while—and then turning them out for a general "airing" over the keys? It may suit those of a more exquisite taste, but as a general thing it disgusts more than it pleases. THALBERG was charming in this particular—bowing in that graceful and respect commanding manner—carelessly resting his ungloved hand over the back of a chair, or an edge of the Piano-forte,—then quietly seating himself and performing at once the piece which he had announced upon his programme. However, one is Gottschalk, and the other is Thalberg,—that's all.

The new compositions of Mr. Gottschalk did not seem to "take" with the audience—and it was not until he played (with Mr. Behrens) his well-known Duet, "Ojos Creolos"—that he brought his listeners up to any just pitch of enthusiasm—although he had before played Weber's Overture to "Oberon," arranged for the Piano, with Mr. Behrens. He was again encored after his brilliant and sparkling "Cuban-eyed duet," and performed his arrangement of "Home, sweet home"—producing that remarkable singing effect, which he seems lately to have introduced into his playing. Some one has told me that Mr. Gottschalk interpreted classical compositions very finely in private; why won't he do something of the kind in public, once in a while? It would certainly be acceptable in Hartford.

Carlo Patti played upon the violin delightfully, and was encored. Mme. Strakosch was also encored, but for what, I do not know. Surely not for sweetness of voice, nor for the purity of her pronunciation in the English songs she sung. I hope she will let poor "Kathleen Mavourneen" rest awhile before she again attempts to awake her from her slumbers.

Mr. GRAU's new company have also given an operatic Concert at Allyn Hall the last week—with rather poor success in the way of a house. Mme. LORINI (not Virginia Whiting,) sang finely; but Mlle. MORENSI (an American lady) was the favorite during the evening—being encored nearly every time she appeared. MORELLI was very much liked.

Mlle. CASTRI had a sweet, sympathetic voice, but was ill. Sig. STEFANI, the tenor, seemed to be in bad voice: singing as though he was suffering from a spasmodic contraction of the epiglottis. The concert upon the whole was not the best which we have had of late—the singers not knowing their parts sufficiently—two performers looking at one copy—and the poor (not in ability) accompanist having “daggers” looked at him because he didn’t play just when they took it into their heads to sing.

We are to have a grand treat next week, Dec. 1st, —on which evening our “Beethoven Society” will perform “Elijah,” for the first time in Hartford, with a chorus of over a 100 voices, assisted by Dr. GUILMETTE and the “Germania” orchestra from Boston. Mr. JAMES G. BARNETT is the contractor, Mr. WM. BABCOCK, organist.

PHILADELPHIA, NOV. 20.—The German Opera troupe has been here three weeks and has performed Martha (twice), Stradella (twice), “Joseph in Egypt,” Der Freyschütz, the “Barber of Seville,” Fidelio (twice), and Gounod’s Faust. As but one of these works is new, curiosity was chiefly directed to the manner in which the different operas were brought out. There was naturally a great desire to learn how the new members of the company would compare with the singers they replaced. In judging of the merits of the ladies and gentlemen introduced to the American public by Mr. Anschütz, regard must be had to the fact, that to induce great artists to leave lucrative positions in order to accept engagements involving a long voyage and promising poorer pay, is very difficult if not impossible. For though Mr. Anschütz’s undertaking has proved a success, he could have been imprudent had he ventured too much while German opera was yet an experiment. Under these circumstances, it were unfair to expect vocalists far above mediocrity.

Herr HIMMER (tenor) made his first bow in Flotow’s Martha. Audiences are indulgent with tenors, so rarely is an excellent one vouchsafed us, and would have been satisfied with an artist of less merit than Himmer. He has a powerful voice, and, though affected and unnatural at times, is a clever actor. The other tenor, Herr HABELMANN, has less power, but sings with better taste, and is a more judicious actor than Himmer.

Another new arrival is Madame HIMMER-FREDERICK. Her rendition of the part of Nancy, in Martha, was fair but not good enough to lead one to expect that as Agatha in the Freyschütz she would prove so much better. Undoubtedly, her greatest success, thus far, was Margaret.

Then there is Mme. CANISSA, who is weak in difficult parts and out of tune in every part that she sings.

The new baritone, Herr STRINECKE, is an excellent artist. It were unfair to pass judgment on his voice, as during the entire season he appears to have been suffering from a severe cold.

Last year, the orchestra and chorus were so well drilled, that those who were used to the slipshod manner in which former operatic choruses and orchestras went through their work, pronounced them perfect. These important adjuncts (or essentials) merit the same compliment this season. If there be any room for improvement, it is in the number of the violins.

The great card of the season was Gounod’s Faust. The libretto is nearly the same as the Faust and Marguerite that was performed here a few years ago as a melo-drama.

The opera is conceived in the spirit of the modern French school. There are elaborate orchestral accompaniments, with melodic sprinklings that remind one more of the counterpoint of the Italian opera-writers, than of the German composers, though it is often claimed that Gounod’s tendenz is German. It is difficult to pronounce on such an opera on a first hearing, and I shall indulge in no criticism of special parts, but confine myself to the general impression that the work made upon me. Gounod evidently aims high, and is a man of great musical attainments. He seems to have drawn his inspiration from the same foundation as Meyerbeer, but did this after M. had already been there. A critic in one of our journals, compares the styles of the two authors, setting Faust against Dinorah, the weakest, perhaps, of Meyerbeer’s successes.

There is in Faust sufficient scope for brazen diatonic dissonances; there are several spirited choruses, and there is much that will improve on further acquaintance.

To treat a work like Goethe’s Faust as an opera, is a most ungrateful task; one on which a composer should venture with great care. The attempt to embody the ideal, to present tangible types, or counterfeits of those spiritual creations that find one great source of the delight they afford us in the grandeur with which our imagination clothes them, is always a failure. Is it likely that the music of a Gounod can add to the excellence of a work like Goethe’s? And if that which is added be not equally as good, in its way, is not the addition a senseless one? Would it increase the beauty of a fine painting to cover it with a veil? Would it not lessen the force of the impression that the uncovered picture would produce? Would you not conclude that your picture would be better without the covering? And, by parity of reasoning, that Goethe’s Faust would be better without, than with Gounod’s music?

It is true that the libretto of the opera I write of is but the skeleton of the play that Germania gave to the world because England gave it Hamlet. This makes it the more unpleasant. When, last Wednesday, I gazed upon the tableau of the apotheosis of Margaret, the muslin clouds, the colored fire, and the gilt rays of a miniature sun, reminded me of a Christmas pantomime, and I could easily understand why Lamb said that he would rather read Shakespeare’s plays than see them acted on the stage.

In truth, the tragedies of Shakespeare, of Goethe or of Schiller are not adapted for operatic treatment. There are, in each and all of them, situations in which music might be introduced in some such way as Beethoven has done with Goethe’s Egmont, or Mendelssohn with the “Midsummer Nights’ Dream.” Intellectuals like Beethoven or Mendelssohn would approach the task with such reverence that their music-offering to the drama would be worthy of it. M. would not have longed so anxiously for the subject for an opera, had he dared to venture upon the sea in which Verdi and Gounod flounder so pitifully.

I have just seen Mr. WOLFSOHN’s prospectus and programme, and found it rich with the names of such works and authors as must please the most fastidious of musical purists. Mr. W. will have the assistance of Mr. THEODORE THOMAS, of New York, and Messrs. EICHBERG and KREISSMANN of your city, besides Messrs. AHREND, SCHMITZ, and other excellent resident musicians. He announces a Soiree for the 24th.

Messrs. CROSS and JARVIS will begin their series next month. Miss BARNETTE (of New York) is giving matinees. Mr. GRAU promises to favor us with two operatic concerts, and, to-morrow evening, the German company will give a concert, when their orchestra will play Beethoven’s C Minor symphony!

Nov. 21. I open my letter to add that I was one of that select audience of fifty-four persons who were sprinkled over the auditorium of the opera house this evening, and who represented that fraction of our population who care enough about a symphony of Beethoven’s to leave their home during a shower for the sake of hearing it. I am sure that taste improves with us. Three hundred years ago, Beethoven’s symphonies were not played in Philadelphia. Now they are, and one man out of every ten thousand attends the performance.

NEW YORK, DEC. 8.—Maretszek closed his brilliant and successful season with three performances of Gounod’s “Faust.” The general impression at its first performance was a somewhat unfavorable one, but a better acquaintance with it has ranked it among the most meritorious and popular of operas.

The plot (See third page) is a very interesting one, and presents several very fine situations and tableaux. Miss KELLOGG, as Margaret, or more happily Margherita, has a sweet, plaintive rôle, and renders it with unaffected grace and simplicity. In the solo “C’era un re, un re di Thule,” as well as the duo with Mazzoleni in the second act, she secures the most profound stillness and attention, which seems almost painful, so plaintive is the melody. MAZZOLENI, as Faust, has but an ordinary opportunity to display his fine vocal power. BIACCHI, as Mephistopheles, draws the honors of the opera. His rôle is one of great merit, and his performance is unexceptionable. The overture and choruses are very fine, and the opera is already popular. We shall soon have the opportunity of hearing it from the German company.

Carl Anschütz opened a season of German opera at the Academy of Music on Wednesday last, with “Alessandro Stradella,” and has given the “Barber of Seville,” “Fidelio,” and last evening “Martha.”

It was evident upon the opening night, that the building was entirely too large, to be filled either by the paying patrons of the German opera, or the voices of his artists. The house was meagre and chilly, and the performance was hardly satisfactory, save the efforts of the orchestra and chorus, which Anschütz always makes the feature of his enterprise. Mme. JOHANNSEN, Mme. BERGER, Mlle. CANISSA, Herren HIMMER, HABELMANN, STRINECKE, GRAFF, WEINLICH and SCHULE, are the prominent members of his company, and some are very clever and meritorious artists.

It is to be hoped that Anschütz will succeed with his undertaking, but it is quite evident that the people do not love German opera well enough to enjoy it at his price. The tariff of prices as charged during the Italian season remains unchanged, and it would be much better policy for Anschütz to reduce it by one half.

On Saturday, Irving Place was the theatre of no less than four performances. THOMAS’S Matinée at 12, Philharmonic rehearsal at 3½, “Fidelio” by the German troupe, and Band Concert by the 71st Reg’t. at 8 o’clock. To show the pleasing nature of Theo. Thomas’ concerts, I transcribe the programme of the last one.

1. Symphonie in A minor, Op. 16. . . . . Gade.
2. Grand Fantasia de Concert, “Martha,” . . . . . Pattison.
3. Polka Fantasia. . . . . Herzog.
4. Grand selections from Faust, (by request) . . . . . Gounod.

1. Overture, “Siege of Corinth,” . . . . . Rossini.
2. La Campanella . . . . . Liszt.
3. Waltz, “Gedankengang,” . . . . . Strauss.
4. Romanza: “L’Eclair,” . . . . . Halvay.
5. Quadrille, “Kuenstler,” . . . . . Strauss.

At the matinee on Saturday next, Mr. Pattison will perform Mendelssohn’s Capriccio in B minor, with orchestra, and also a “Grand Concert Overture” of Mr. Pattison’s composition.

Maretszek is in Philadelphia doing well. “Tone” and “Norma” the rage. T. W. M.

The Choral Inauguration.

The union of Handel and Haydn chorus, orchestra and Great Organ on Saturday evening, Nov. 28, was so impressive and so glorious, that the concert had to be repeated last Sunday evening. For convenience we shall speak of the two performances as one, inasmuch as they did not differ very essentially either in the programme, which was the same with one short omission (and still too long, though excellent), or in artistic quality of rendering, or in audience, large on both occasions, yet (strange to say) not filling every seat. The chief difference on Sunday was in the seating of the singers and in the spectacle. The orchestra of 40 instruments (SCHULTZE at their head) occupied the middle of the platform before the Organ, at which sat Mr. LANG. The Soprani and Alti were grouped in curved lines upon either side; and rising behind them, tier on tier, on a temporary staging, the tenors and basses tided back into the side balconies, making a fine sight, with the majestic Organ in the background, its lower corners only being obscured. On the second occasion the chorus occupied a still loftier and wider amphitheatre, built for the concert of the 1200 school children, and the platform came much farther forward into the hall, whereby the sound, especially of the orchestra, told more effectively. The Organ, too, shone out for the first time in all the glory of its front pipes, the missing ones having at length arrived; five of them filled the central field, behind Bach's head, where had been flags; and a large one in each of the square end towers, made the front, hitherto abridged of part of its effective width, shine all along the line. Naturally the last performance is the freshest in the mind, while it was in some respects the better of the two, and therefore our remarks will mainly date from that.

The old Handel and Haydn practice of "playing in" the chorus singers was wisely discontinued, and the first sounds of the programme fell fresh upon ears not already dulled by music never listened to as music. And the first burst was overwhelming:—full chorus of three or four hundred voices, full organ, and full orchestra, all blending fortissimo in Luther's Choral: "A strong castle is our Lord," with which the "Religious Festival Overture" by Otto Nicolai begins for its subject. The volume of tone was immense, the colossal basses of the organ filling in behind and buoying all up, while its upper tones as well as the orchestral instruments added piquancy and brightness; the voices seemed not only firmly held in their places but enriched by such support, and the sonorous ensemble was as round and musical and fresh as it was startlingly grand and powerful. Then followed the long symphonic part by orchestra alone, quaintly old and contrapuntal after Handel's style, working up the theme and fragments of the theme, and working in after a while a new and livelier subject with the Choral, the voices and organ coming in again at intervals. It is a learned and an interesting composition, such as few would have expected from the author of the sparkling comic opera: "The Merry Wives of Windsor;" but it was too long, considering what was to follow, and our orchestra is hardly large enough, coming after such a tutti, to make it sound otherwise than feebly. (O that Boston had an orchestra half as good for an orchestra, as the Organ is for an organ!) Under the circumstances we would have been content with the Choral pure et simple.

Then came Handel's Hallelujah chorus, which of course rolled out in grander volume than ever before, but which, being so familiar, was well spared on Sunday evening.

The grand feature of the first part was Handel's music to Dryden's Ode for St. Cecilia's Day, composed in 1736, never before heard in this country. It is not one of Handel's great works, but it is full of genial and delightful music, it is moderate in length, hardly an hour, and it was peculiarly appropriate to the opening of our Great Organ, not to speak of other coincidences with our case as a people just now. Partly one enjoys it as a curiosity, but much of it also for a certain real characteristic and unique beauty as music, speaking to the higher feelings. The accompaniments were transcribed for this occasion for the Organ, alone, by Mr. Lang. This was interesting as an exhibition of the various fine powers of this Organ in the accompaniment of voices, although we shall not be so rash as to say that it could fully make good the want of an orchestra. Mr. Lang certainly showed fine skill and taste in the selection of stops and in the general treatment. Each piece held the pleased attention; and that even through the somewhat stiff and antique Handelian Overture, which, opening with a broad and stately Larghetto (oboe tones predominant), passes into a quaint fugged Allegro (given with trumpet stop), and ends with a rather slow naive sort of Minuet, with a series of variations, in which Mr. L. contrasted the stops quite charmingly.

The first words: "From Harmony, from heavenly Harmony, this universal frame began," are given in recitative by a tenor voice, which continues, with descriptive accompaniment, in the lines

When Nature underneath a heap
Of jarring atoms lay, &c.,
The tuneful voice was heard: Arise!
Then cold and hot, and moist and dry
In order to their station leap
And music's voice obey;

which last thought is accompanied by little dancing jack-o'-lantern phrases of the instruments, the whole somewhat as Haydn might have written. Mr. LYMAN W. WHEELER showed himself master of the true, chaste recitative style, together with a voice of good power, pure and sweet in quality. The recitative was a good test of the refined intelligence as a singer which he evinced throughout the evening. Then the chorus, in D major, takes up the theme: "From Harmony," with ringing, fresh sonority, the different voices running octaves up and down upon the words: "Thro' all the compass of the notes it ran," and tenors and basses consolidating in grand unison on: "The diapason closing full in Man." How heartily Handelian this!

The next piece is a Soprano air, slow, sweet, full of a subdued and quiet rapture:

What passion cannot music raise and quell?
When Jubal struck the chorded shell,
His lateening brethren stood around,
And, wond'ring, on their faces fell,
To worship the celestial sound.
Less than a God, they thought, there could not dwell,
Within the hollow of that shell,
That spoke so sweetly and so well.

It is preceded by some length of instrumental symphony, hinting the principal motives both of melody and accompaniment which follow. One figure, quaintly rendered by a soft dull stop on the organ, well answered to the "chorded shell." It was sung with purity of tone and truth and delicacy of feeling by Miss HOUSTON, whose noble voice, alike remarkable for sweetness, largeness, flexibility and sympathetic quality, has been much improved of late by culture. She is now an artistic singer, and can adapt her voice to various subjects. True feeling of her music, the instinct of seizing its poetic points, she always had.

From this gentler mood we are roused by: The trumpet's loud clangor. Tenor air and chorus. The trumpet stop of the "Great" organ rang out lustily in prelude and accompaniment, and Mr. Wheeler's voice, though not of the most trumpet-toned, did its herald duty well, uttering the hark! hark! and the charge! charge! with much declamatory energy. The chorus came in splendidly and charged all along the line, with even step, unflinching, full of spirit, the quick reiteration of "The double, double, double beat of the thundering drum" being quite suggestive, and the great sub-basses of the organ thundering to some purpose in the pauses between the harks!

A short march follows, somewhat in the large and simple style of Gluck, well rendered here by round, full organ stops.

The song of "The soft complaining flute," and "woes of hopeless lovers, whose dirge is whispered by the warbling lute," warbles itself away in ornate figures after the quaint old cut, giving scope for various fine flute tones in the organ, offset by stringy tones (Salicional, Dolce, &c.) in which this organ is so rich, to answer for the lute, and taxing the powers of a modern singer. Miss Houston executed it tastefully, albeit with a slight timidity.

The Tenor sings the air of the "Sharp Violins," which the poet couples here with "jealous pangs and desperation, fury, frantic indignation," and all that. A curious piece, with wide, impassioned intervals and quaint figures, in which the singer acquitted himself as only a well taught singer could.

From this point the ingenious imitations are pretty much dispensed with, and the music rises to a nobler height and there sustains itself. For now comes the great theme of the Ode, the praise of the Organ, the praise of St. Cecilia, of Music, and "the great Creator's praise." Henceforth the Soprano is always in the foreground. First, after a slow, cheerful-solemn prelude in full, round organ tone, the air: "But oh! what art can teach the sacred Organ's praise?" A strain of pure, chaste, simple, sustained, heavenly melody, demanding the best art and soul of cantabile singing, and in that respect as well as in its phraseology resembling Mozart's Deh vieni, non tardar, which Mme. Goldschmidt sang divinely. Miss Houston sang as if such an ideal reigned in her mind, her best voice seconding the spirit in which she sang, and went right to the heart. Violin tone went with the voice, full organ tone filling the pauses.

Imitation returns again for a moment to illustrate the point of the poet and the Soprano, which is to contrast the ruder music of classical days of fable:

Orpheus could lead the savage race,
And trees unrooted left their place,
Squacious of the lyre.

with the Christian music which claims Cecilia as its patron saint and muse. The Orpheus air is marked alla Hornpipe, and is a sort of snarling bagpipe strain, which Mr. Lang cleverly imitated by a reed stop. The form of the melody is essentially "sequacious," drawn out in linked sequences and curling roulades. This is a momentary descent from the dignity of the last part of the Ode; but a loftier tone is struck, and the change is like looking suddenly up into a clear Christmas sky with all the stars out, the moment the Soprano begins her recitative: "But bright Cecilia raised the wonder high, when to her organ vocal breath was given." The Finale (solo and chorus) is sublime and worthy of the words:

As from the power of sacred lays
The spheres began to move,
And sang the great Creator's praise
To all the blessed above;
So when the last and dreadful hour
This crumbling pageant shall devour,
The trumpet shall be heard on high,
The dead shall live, the living die,
And Music shall untune the sky.

Each line at first is given out in large, sustained high tones by the Soprano unaccompanied, and then answered with the full weight of all the voices in plain harmony with figurative accompaniment of full organ. The effect is wonderful. Still more so when a shadow falls upon the music at the mention of "the last and dreadful hour," and still more so when the Soprano soars to and firmly holds the high A on the last syllable of: "The trumpet shall be heard on high." Miss Houston's voice was nobly adequate to all this. The last two lines furnish two contrasted subjects, which are worked together with contrapuntal skill and increasing interest and grandeur in an elaborate chorus. "The dead shall live, the living die" is given in short declamatory phrases by one set of voices, while "And Music shall untune the sky" is sung by the others in a free and flowing melody, all combining sometimes on the declamatory notes.

The choruses were all given with precision, spirit and a generous sonority. We could wish, however, more weight on the contralto side, and less of shrill edge, more of the refined and cultivated tone on the part of the sopranos.

Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," which formed the second part, is too well known and justly admired to require us to go into any detail. Suffice it to say, we never have enjoyed it with such complete zest as on those two evenings. Never, surely, was it so well rendered here. All its grandeur and its beauties came out clear and unmistakable. The orchestra (which we of course all wish were larger) gave the three admirable movements of the introductory Symphony in such a way that all felt the warmth, the soul, the imaginative beauty of the music. The choruses, filled out and sustained by the deep, full flood of the great Organ tone, with lively orchestral skirmishing in the foreground, moved on compactly, grandly, and with such momentum as to mark a new era almost in our chorusing. Mr. Conductor ZERRAHN was throughout master of the situation and must have felt proud of his army. The solos were all very finely sung by Miss HOUSTON and MR. WHEELER; Mrs. FISKE seconding the former quite well in the duet: "I waited for the Lord." In the thrilling passage: "The night is departing!" Miss Houston's voice rang out more triumphantly than ever on Sunday evening, electrifying the audience.

Chamber Music.

Messrs. KREISSMANN, LEONHARD and EICHBERG gave the first Soirée of this their second season at Chickering's Hall last Saturday evening. And a delightful evening it was; with the union of three such artists, in so choice a programme as they know how to make, and their artistic pride in making the best that they know how, it could not be otherwise. This was the bill of fare:

1. Sonata in G major, for Violin and Piano, Op. 30, No. 3. Beethoven Allegro assai, Tempo di Minuetto, Vivace.
2. a. Mondnacht. R. Schumann
3. Widmung. R. Schumann
4. Romanza in F major, for Violin, Op. 50. Beethoven
5. Siciliano, in G minor, for Violin and Piano. S. Bach
6. Gewitternacht. R. Franz
7. Die Hurende. R. Franz
8. Frühlingsschmelze. R. Franz
9. Novelletto, Op. 99. Schumann
10. Nocturno, Op. 62, No. 1. Chopin
11. Trio, Op. 100, in E b major, for Violin, Piano and Violoncello. Schubert
12. Allegro, Andante con moto, Scherzando and Allegro moderato.

The Beethoven Sonata has all the fresh warmth and imaginative free play of his earlier style, and was finely rendered by Eichberg and Leonhard. This and the Schubert Trio were the great things of the evening. In the latter they had the valuable aid of WULF FRIES with his Cello; and all the fine inspirations of that marvellous work, whose several movements swarm with fascinating and original ideas, such as no other musical brain since Beethoven seems to have been so haunted with, were brought out with a true artistic skill and fervor. It seemed to us that Leonhard had never played so well; and indeed we might extend the praise to all he did that evening. Sometimes we have had to tax him with treating his music too much ad libitum, even to a degree of wilfulness not edifying nor poetic; but there was no cause to think of that this time; he was faithful to his author, not by any scrupulous constraint, but happily and freely, entering into the spirit of the work, and playing with that fine and vital touch, that easy subordination and faultless mechanical detail to expression, which showed that the work possessed him, making him its organ. With such interpretation the Novelletto of Schumann and the Nocturno of Chopin, both new to the audience, and both wonderful fine and characteristic fancies, and very difficult, proved extremely fascinating.

In the accompaniment of the Franz and Schumann Lieder Mr. Leonhard showed a poetic appreciation and a facility such as only one artist here may have surpassed. Mr. Kreissmann was in fine voice and sang the songs with all his usual fine intelligence and feeling, the voice being all that could be desired except once or twice when forced a little. The "Mondnacht" (Moonlight Night) of Schumann is a most lovely, exquisite creation, lifting one's soul to a purer and serenest atmosphere. "Widmung" (Self-dedication, or Homage of the lover to the beloved), beginning Du meine Seele, du mein Herz! is better known, a fervent, rapturous love song, soaring beyond Beethoven's Adelaide, if that were possible. The wild, impetuous "Gewitternacht" (Night and thunderstorm) of Franz, with its lightning flashes of accompaniment, is almost too much for mortal voice, except at least in a small room, where it may fill and thrill all through and through; we only wondered that the singer could do so much with it. The other songs were altogether charming.

Mr. Eichberg, besides playing the violin part very finely in the Sonata and the Trio, played as solos Beethoven's Romanza in F—a good piece, and yet one that he to whom it is no longer new may easily get tired of before it is through, for it is long and has a certain sameness,—and the fresh little Siciliano of Bach, which always charms.—We missed his usual purity of tone in some parts of the former piece, and once or twice did think expression slightly overdone, although of course the general style was masterly.

The next Soirée of these artists is set down for next Saturday evening, the 19th.

The Children with the Organ.

The Musical Festival on Wednesday afternoon, when, by permission of the School Committee, 1200 children, out of the public schools, sang with the accompaniment of the Great Organ, was an occasion of which no words could fully express the interest and the significance. The significance of it is, that it identifies the artistic bow of promise, which that Organ stands for, with the whole educational aspiration of this free Republic as it takes form and beginning in those free common schools, which are the pride and beauty and salvation of our democratic life and liberty. It couples the artistic and the social promise from the very bud and germ, making school training and the opening of the artistic sense through Music, appear as necessary complements of one another; and therefore it was a wise instinct, and no mere folly of parade, that a few years ago invented this beautiful plan of interesting all the children, and their parents too, in music.

The scene, always a most ideal, memorable one, was doubly so this time. As the long files of girls and boys, entering in all directions, ascended quietly and orderly the tiers of staging rising on both sides of the Organ, till the farthest rows of heads in the first balcony were nearly hidden under the second, while five or six rows also filled a third part of the balcony above, it seemed like some great Catholic cathedral ceremony and procession; the more so, as bright warm colors abounded in the dresses of the girls, some groups of scarlet opera cloaks and shawls suggesting a whole college of cardinals, with altar boys, et cetera. But as they were all seated, still more, when they all rose to sing, with their fresh and handsome youthful faces, beaming with bright intelligence, blushing with the modest bloom of innocence, we could not help fancying ourselves once more before some of those pictures by Fra Angelico, or Lippo Lippi, where the whole sky and atmosphere about the Virgin, or whatever central figure, is full of heads of cherubs and child angels, all flushed with eager song of praise. Here the magnificent Organ temple formed the fitting centre and background, making the scene artistically and wonderfully complete. Good taste had dictated all the details of the arrangement; for instance the dark green covering of the seats relieving the red dresses so refreshingly. And the grey rows of boys, contrasting with the gay flower beds of their sisters—how round all their faces looked, how bright too! they at least might have been cut out of the aforesaid old Italian paintings.

Mr. J. C. D. PARKER presided at the Organ, which was the only accompaniment. After a short voluntary all the children joined their voices in unison in a Gregorian Chant to the words of the Lord's prayer. The wide expanse of fresh, cool tone, rich, pure, even, tranquil, was something to renew one's sense. What could be more beautiful, more touching, for the brief time it lasted? This and the Russian National Hymn, that followed, were to our ear the most effective, and most beautiful of the tutti performances. "Hail Columbia" was bright enough, and steady enough and full of boy voice; but musically it made a poor pendant to the Russian tune.

Next came the Angel Trio from "Elijah": Lift thine eyes, sung by the advanced pupils of the Girls High and Normal School, 120 in number, fair fruits of Mr. ZERRAHN's special training, (who, by the way, conducted the whole with his usual enthusiasm). The voices blended very sweetly and purely, the three parts preserving their melodic outline well, and the lower contralto making together a rich round tone like an organ. Other organ there was none. The choral: "Let all men praise the Lord," from Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," did not sound so well as some chorals we have heard the children sing, either in sustained volume or in purity of tone; but then the unison was naturally their after hearing it so recently in harmony from 400 full-grown voices.

After an interlude of very acceptable Organ selections by Mr. Parker, we were treated to a curious and really beautiful effect, by the melody of the Prayer in Freyshütz being, not sung, but hummed as it were between the teeth of the 1200 children, very softly, swelling now and then with that peculiar stress of an insect hum approaching you—called in the bill "with muted voices." This is an effect which our German Liedertafeln sometimes indulge in. It charmed the audience, so remote and fairy-like it seemed, and had to be repeated. "Old Hundred," the audience joining in the last verse, made a grand conclusion of the concert.

We cannot help believing that, by simply forming part in such a beautiful impressive whole, partaking of a collective act so lyric and picturesque, the children's hearts are elevated, and the latent germ of "the Art principle" within them quickened. It must inspire the love of order, rhythm, unity in all things. And thus, with our higher means, with developed Art, it seems to bring Music back to the old Greek meaning of it as the rhythmical element, the soul of unity and order in the whole human culture.

This unique Festival will be repeated in the Music Hall this afternoon.

Music Abroad.

BOLOGNA, (so writes a correspondent of the Evening Post, in whom we recognize our friend "Trovatore") has always been a celebrated musical centre, and Rossini's predilection for the place induced him years ago to take up his abode here. A house-painter, engaged to decorate his house during the absence of Rossini, depicted in a series of exterior frescoes that admirable maestro as a semi-nude Orpheus enchanting both the animate and inanimate with his strains. The composer of the "Barbiere" was not remarkably pleased with this inconvenient adulation, which suddenly rendered his private residence one of the "sights" of the town.

The Teatro Comunale of Bologna is one of the most brilliant opera-houses in the world, far lighter and more elegant than most Italian theatres. The boxes are very large, luxuriantly fitted up, and each one provided with a projecting balcony, which most agreeably breaks the monotony of the lines of tiers. The audience dress elegantly, and the display of silks and jewelry, to say nothing of beautiful Italian Juliets, is something to remember, even to one accustomed to the elegance of dress and personal beauty exhibited so often at the New York opera, or to the ponderous brilliancy of Covent Garden and Her Majesty's. The opera season has just opened with "Rigoletto," sung by Lotti, prima donna, as graceful a woman as ever trod the stage, and a finished vocalist to boot; by Cima, a good baritone; by Borchard, a contralto, a pleasing Maddalena to any one who has not been spoiled thereby by Adelaide Phillips's inimitable rendering of the part; and by Bignardi, the tenor, who was several years ago in New York, and who has made a great success here in Bologna, by his skilful, delicate singing, rather than a great excellence of voice. For the lighter operas few tenors are more satisfactory than this Bignardi, who was last night called five times before the curtain. At another theatre another opera company is soon to appear in Favorita with the American favorite, Gazzaniga, as prima donna. Albites, her husband, formerly a popular music teacher in New York, has something to do with the orchestra.

PARIS.—Of the new opera by Berlioz, Les Troyens, a flattering telegram appears in the London Musical World of Nov. 7; to-wit;

The new opera of Hector Berlioz was produced last night (Wednesday), at the Théâtre Lyrique, with brilliant success. After the first and third acts the enthusiasm was extraordinary. The grand septuor was unanimously asked for again. All the singers good, but Madame Chardon (Dido) especially superb. The mise en scène, the most splendid ever witnessed at the Théâtre Lyrique. Band and chorus excellent. A genuine triumph for Berlioz.

FLORENCE.—Italian journals announce the engagement of Giulia Grisi at the Pergola. She is to make her debut in Norma. When will the "God-deas" learn that her divinity has passed away!

Gounod's Faust has been given in Florence by Stigelli, Boschetti, Atry, and Pizzigati. It was a great success, and the papers say it was impossible to give an idea of the enthusiasm created. The artists were repeatedly called to receive the applause of the public. Our friend Stigelli seems to be as much appreciated in Europe as he was here.

LEIPZIG.—There was a grand celebration here on the 18th Oct., in commemoration of the great battle in 1813. The Musical Societies sang a Te Deum to 30,000 persons assembled in the market place. Handel's Hallelujah and Luther's old hymn, "A strong tower is our God" were then sung by the whole assembly. Representatives from 150 German cities and the veterans of the war listened to an address in the Town Hall from the burgomaster; and then visited the chief points of interest in the battle field. Ten thousand persons joined in a torchlight procession in the evening and bonfires were lighted on the hills about the city.

MUNICH.—The Second Musical Festival was held here in September, in the Glass Palace, a building erected on the model of the first Exhibition Building in London. It was on a grand scale; five or six thousand persons present, including performers. There was a chorus of 1200 voices; and the orchestra was composed of 100 violins, 40 violas, 38 violoncellos, 30 double basses, 8 flutes, 6 oboes, 6 clarinets, 8 bassoons, 12 horns, 6 trumpets, 6 trombones, and 2 pairs of kettledrums. We have room for but a few sentences from the interesting account of it in the Lower Rhine Musik-Zeitung.

The concert began on the 27th of September, at eleven o'clock A. M. This hour was selected because the Glass Palace cannot be lighted, and because, on the same evening, an opera—and that opera Mozart's Don Juan—was given at the Theatre Royal, a thing never before heard of during a musical festival. The programme was made up of Beethoven's Sinfonia Eroica and Handel's Israel in Egypt. All things considered, the gem of the first day's festival was the performance of the Symphony. We were somewhat incredulous as to whether the large number of executants would heighten the effect, from an artistic point of view, and, still more, as to whether they would attain the precision and the delicate expression which this magnificent composition demands. But the piano and forte, the light and shade of the tone-picture, were rendered in exact conformity with the intention of the composer; just as were the increase and decrease of the waves of sound; as well as the sforzatos, the abrupt breaking off of the fortissimo, also, followed immediately by the piano, being given with great precision. The expression was, certainly, in many passages, seconded by the masses; nay, in several, it was the latter which made it so completely prominent.

After the brilliant inauguration of the festival by the Symphony we had Handel's oratorio of Israel in Egypt. The selection of this work was, in the first place, justified by the admirable way in which it was executed. and then, more especially, by the fact that the large masses engaged could be employed to the greatest advantage in the numerous choruses.

The vocal solos in Israel were sung exclusively by local artists belonging to the Theatre Royal. The principal part of the chorus consisted, as we heard, of local members, the Akademie, the Oratorio Association, the Sängers-Genossenschaft, the chorus of the Royal Chapel, that of the Theatre Royal, and a great many amateurs, a large number of whom are continually being formed and improved, thanks to the performances of musical masses, which are here, luckily for music, so frequently given and so zealously attended in the churches.

The second Festival Concert, on Monday the 28th September, at 11 A. M., took place, like the first, in the Glass Palace. It began with a very admirable performance of a symphonistic work (in D minor) by Franz Lechner, and which, inappropriately enough, he has called a "Suite".

The Suite consists of four movements.—1. Prelude, a lively and richly-figured piece of writing, which at once introduces us to the peculiarity of the composition, by the treatment of the stringed instruments; 2. Minuet, distinguished for the originality of its motives; 3. Variations, which form, perhaps, somewhat too long a series for an orchestral work, although the changes in the tempo, the rhythm and the instrumentation, artistically deceive the hearer as to the length. These Variations are, in other respects, an admirable specimen of composition, not simply interesting on account of the knowledge and art exhibited in them, but melodically pleasing and expressive, being invested with a high charm by the employment of solo parts for the clarinet, the horn, etc., as well as the performance of separate stringed instruments in the full chorus, as, for instance, of all the violins, or all the violoncellos and violas. The Variations conclude with a march, effective more on account of its grandiose instrumentation than by the originality of its motives. Being executed, however, by such large numbers, it produced a powerful impression, which called forth tremendous applause and loud cheers for the composer. 4. Introduction and Fugue, the former in andante time, and the latter in majestic allegro—a piece of writing, into the strict form of which the master allows a gushing flood of free musical ideas to stream.

After this orchestral display, the second part of the concert opened, on the contrary, with a purely vocal work, devoid of all accompaniment. To sing a capella with so numerous a chorus is not only attended with great difficulties, but does not really produce an effect in keeping with the numbers employed. As we have already often experienced at great gatherings of male choruses, there exists for choral singing, as far as regards the executive masses, a limit above which the effect of those masses is increased very little, if it is increased at all, and while the forte is not much benefited if there are a thousand voices singing instead of four hundred, the difficulty of obtaining precision and characteristic expression is augmented. Certainly in Munich the eight-part motet by Palestrina, "Hodie Christus natus est," commenced imposingly, and it was a proper feeling which had selected one of the old master's compositions, adapted, as a Christmas cantata, by its dash, to the development of large masses; the precision and purity of intonation, too, were praiseworthy. But delicacy of expression was, as a rule, wanting.

Next followed a scene from the oratorio of Il Ritorno di Tobia, by Joseph Haydn, for contralto solo and chorus. The Prelude and Fugue for Orchestra, by Johann Sebastian Bach, again displayed the excellence of the united violin-quartet.

The finale to the second act of the opera of Idomeneo, on the other hand, once more afforded brilliant evidence of the eternal magic spell exercised by Mozart's music. The selection of this finale for performance at the Musical Festival was highly judicious. It was here, at Munich, that the greater part of Idomeneo was composed; it was here that, on the 18th January, 1781, Mozart completed it, and wrote, "Laus Deo! I have got over my task!"

The second part of the concert was brought to an end by Beethoven's March and Chorus, "Schmückt die Altäre," from the Ruinen von Athen, a fragment which, by its melodic loveliness and its clear harmonies, seemed to be a beautiful continuation of Mozart's music, and pleased universally. For the third part of the concert, the programme presented us with Handel's "Ode on St. Cecilia's Day."

The third day was celebrated by an evening concert, of which the chief features were Joachim's playing of Beethoven's violin Concerto, Mme. Schumann's performance of her husband's Concerto, and Mmc. Dustmann's singing.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Rock me to sleep, mother. Ballad. Lesta Vers. 25

Thy mother will rock thee to sleep. Lesta Vers. 25

These two ballads, one responsive to the other, add two pretty songs to the pile of home musical literature, now, we are glad to know, already so thick on the top of many home pianos and melodians. The words of the first song have been used before, but the music is new, and we cannot sing about "mother" too much or too often.

My bonny, bonny Mary, O! Song. H. Hyatt. 25

A smooth and cheerful melody.

President's Hymn. Song and Chorus.

J. W. Turner. 25

We here have the new hymn, which is hereafter to be a standard one, set to appropriate music. Sing it while it is fresh.

I know not how heaven will strike the blow. (Non sai che un nume.) From "Robert Devereux." 75

Duet between Nottingham and his wife, the Duchess Sarah. Suitable for a barytone or tenor, and a soprano voice. Full of deep pathos and intense feeling.

We've left for the Union. Song. F. Souder. 25

Patriotic and spirited.

We are fairies of the sea. Duet. S. Glover. 50

An easy and elegant duet, smooth and melodious.

Instrumental Music.

Letty Lorne quickstep. J. C. Johnson. 25

An easy arrangement of a very "laking" air, one of those, which, when a person hears, he cannot be still, but must immediately begin to keep step to it. People, in their second quarter, can learn it.

Zamora Waltzes. J. Strauss. 50

A set of brilliant waltzes in Strauss's well known style, hard, metallic, and without depth of feeling, but enlivening and dance-inspiring.

Il Bacio. (Valse de salon.) Katzer. 50

Katzer's arrangement of the ever favorite "Kiss," which everybody who can play it should know.

Mephisto Galop (for four hands). Lubitsky. 50

Four hand pieces, as a rule, must possess the characters of power and brightness, as the use of double chords, by two performers, precludes much delicacy or tenderness. Hence a wide awake piece, like the above, is a good exhibition piece, and commended as such.

Good Humor schottische. Kapper. 25

Very good humored. Play it when you are tempted to be "out of sorts," for "music hath charms to soothe a" cross person.

Absence. Nocturne. B. Richards. 35

It may be safely said that Richards has not yet composed an inferior piece.

Books.

Union Collection, for Violin and Piano. 50 cts.

Flute and Piano Duets. 50 cts.

These two similar works are favorites, already, and will come into increasing use when better known. Gentlemen who can play the flute or violin, are furnished with the means of passing agreeable evenings, in company with ladies who can play the piano.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Opera in the Family Hapsburg.

(Being preliminary to Number Two of "Half a Dozen of Beethoven's Contemporaries." See Vol. XXIII, Nos. 9 et seq.)

[Before attacking the memory of SALIERI, i.e. with biographic malice prepense—and in all friendliness to the little dark man, who really played a great part in his day and generation—I must put you through a short course of another diet, and inflict quant. suff. of ratherish, but not too, dry matter upon your digestion. That is to say: for ulterior purposes, I wish the readers of Dwight's Journal to be somewhat at home in the private musical life of the family, the heads of which have for so many centuries been rulers of such a large share of Eastern Europe, and more especially to be able to form some definite idea of the relations of the Hapsburgs to the old Italian opera. The question why did not Emperor Joseph II. perceive at once the merits of Mozart and place him at the head of the Vienna opera, instead of retaining Salieri as Kapellmeister and composer, will answer itself, if these relations be once understood. Not that any thing about to be written in this sketch will have direct bearing upon that point—indeed the date of Mozart's advent in Vienna will not be reached—but the origin and strength of the taste of the Austrian imperial family for the Italian opera of the time will appear and be explained.

The basis of these sketches is to be found in certain articles under the signature of "B—r" in the Vienna Recensionen, 1858, and part of the materials in Würrbach's Biographisches Lexicon of the Austrian Empire. As I know of no source in the English language whence the information, proposed to be compendiously embodied here, can be drawn, it is certainly to be hoped that it may prove of musical-historic value if not of interest—and who, knows but some American Polko may find inspiration in it for a dozen musical novels? A. W. T.]

As we have to do with Emperors and Empresses, with crown princes and princesses, archdukes and archduchesses, with a king or two now and then, we must find some means of fixing when they lived,—we must have a date for a starting point. [Blessed be the man that first invented dates! That discovered chronology to be the eye of history, as we used to study in Daniel Whelpley's "Compend" years ago, in J. Q. Adams's administration.]

Anno 26 post urbem (Boston) conditam, anno 26 ante urbem (Philadelphia) conditam, anno 30 post urbem (New York) conditam (i.e. when the Dutch built the block-house on Manhattan Island), anno—say, Anno Domini 1656. It is the last year of William Bradford's Governorship of Plymouth Colony; the second year of John Endicott's third term as Governor of the Massachusetts Bay, the 20th year of Harvard College, and the 5th of John Eliot's town of praying Indians at South Natick. Roger Williams was elected last year President of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations; John Webster is serving his one year as head of the Colony on the Connecticut river. Peter Stuyvesant, last of the Dutch Dynasty, is in the tenth year of his rule over "die Nieuw Nederlandt, Communipaw and the countries beyond—now forming part of that region known variously as the "State of Camden and Amboy," "Copperheaddom" and New Jersey, and of that distant settlement of Swedes and Finns on the farther side of the waters now called Delaware bay; which settlement was conquered by the mighty Stuyvesant only the last year. Samuel Matthews was Governor of the Colonies in Virginia, and Catholic Maryland was in charge of Commissioners sent over by the Puritan Parliament. England had not yet generously begun to empty her prisons, jails and pauper-houses into the wilds of North America, and hence the country of the "Confederate States"—known briefly as "Rebeldom"—was still uncolonized. Beyond the ocean, the grandest man who ever ruled the destinies of England—the Puritan farmer Cromwell—was drawing toward the close of his glorious career.* Baptist tinker Bunyan was ordained to teach and preach only last year by the congregation at Bedford; and the learned Mr. John Milton, the other great literary creative genius of that generation, now in his 48th year, is Latin Secretary to Parliament, or his Highness the Lord Protector, I do not know which—perhaps both—is living, as nearly as I can make out, a second time a widower, blind, but in easy circumstances, down in old Scotland yard, convenient to Whitehall. The play house, so long suppressed by the Puritan and Presbyterian rule, shows signs of resurrection; for Cromwell allows (1656) noseless Sir William D' Avenant to produce at Rutland house entertainments in "declamation and music, after the manner of the ancients," which he calls operas (!). Shakespeare has been quietly reposing just 40 years in the church at Stratford; "rare Ben Jonson," 19 years in Westminster Abbey; and John Dryden is a young man of twenty-five still at Cambridge, I suppose, who as yet seems to have done nothing in letters, but compose a poor poem on the death of a certain Lord Hastings.

And so we get a starting point.

The first two years of tinker Bunyan's preaching were the last two years of the reign of Ferdinand III., Dei gratia, King of Hungary, Bohemia, Rome, Archduke of who can tell how many states, and Emperor of Germany;—an association of ideas, which will enable ten to remember when the Emperor died by referring to the tinker, to one who will fix the tinker in his mind by reference to the Emperor. There has been one Shakespeare, one Raphael, one Michael Angelo, one Handel, one Beethoven, one Bunyan—but as for Emperors!

In July, 1656, Ferdinand III., Emperor of Germany, for the last time celebrated his birthday in one of the summer palaces near Vienna, for on the 2d of April following he died. He was a practical and theoretical musician, and the last musical illustration, but one, in Athanasius Kircher's "Musurgia," Vol. I., is an Italian vocal composition by him in four voices and a figured bass. An extract from a Miserere is contributed by a correspondent to the Leipzig Musik Zeitung for 1826, p. 503. An ancient publication at Prague was an air with 36 variations, also from his pen.

At this last birthday festival was performed a "Drama per musica" entitled "Theti," in five acts, with ballets, text by Diamonte Gabrielli, music by Bertali, imperial chapellmaster. At the close of the opera, his son and successor, Leopold, already king of Hungary, as British heirs apparent to the crown are princes of Wales—"danced a ballet with eight sea-gods."

Ferdinand died April 2d 1657, and the previous deaths of his three older sons now placed the hereditary crowns upon the head of the fourth, Leopold I, who was soon after elected also to the German imperial dignity.

Leopold had been intended for the church, and his education of course had been in that direction during his childhood, and gave him a fondness for science and letters, which he cherished through life and for which he did much. He was but eighteen years of age when his father died, and he found himself in a position to deny himself no desire of his heart. He inherited the Hapsburg passion for music, and one of his first acts was the erection of an opera house hard by the palace, on the spot where now the imperial library contains the musical collection, which during the almost half century of his reign he brought together. In 1688, when the Turks besieged Vienna, it was found necessary to remove the theatre, because, being a wooden structure, the "Greek fire" of the enemy endangered the palace.

Leopold called Padre Kirchner (not Kircher of the Musurgia) from Rome, to teach him counterpoint, and under such excellent instruction the Emperor became a fine theoretic musician, and a voluminous if not great composer; certainly there is no tradition that any of his works were damned. Imperial and royal works of literature and art are always successful at home. See the writings of Louis Napoleon Bonaparte for instance; or the church architecture of his late poor old Majesty, the last King of Prussia. In the imperial library at Vienna the musical productions of Leopold are preserved in quantities,—oratorios, hymns, motets, music to operas, comedies and ballets. He played the flute and had a spinet in each of his palaces, at which he spent many of his leisure hours. He kept up an orchestra and complete troop of singers both for the chapel and the theatre. The vocalists and principal composers came, almost of course in those days, from Italy; that country, which had for so many centuries, been the centre of the world's trade, art, religion, letters and vice, and which, retaining the monopoly of artificial Soprani and Altis—who could have no other hope or ambition in life, than such as depended upon their perfection as singers—had carried vocal and subsequently instrumental music, until the enlargement and perfection of orchestras, to their highest pitch of excellence. When another nation shall become so rich and luxurious, and its priesthood so debased, as to fill its churches and theatres with that class of singers, then will old Italy be rivalled in the perfection of its vocal music.

Bertali was Chapelmaster at Leopold's accession, but after some half dozen years is heard of no more, "gone to his death-bed" probably, and Antonio Draghi's name occurs continually as composer of the court operas, in several cases both of text and music. "B—r" says: "We will specially mention Antonio Draghi here, on account of his almost unequalled fecundity, since in the repertoire of the Court Opera, which we have made running through a period of two centuries, this composer appears with 156 dramatic works, which he composed for Vienna, and which were performed there. They begin in 1663 with "Oronisba," to which Draghi also wrote the text, and end Nov. 8, 1699 with "Alceste," text by Cupeda, ballet music by Hoffer, which opera was performed on the birthday of Archduchess Maria, daughter of the King, afterwards Emperor Joseph I. by command of the Emperor. This composer had in Nicolo Minato, imperial court poet, an equally inexhaustible text writer. For, from the "Atalante," music by Draghi, ballet music by Schmelzer, performed Nov. 18, 1669 in honor of the dowager Empress Eleonora's birthday, to "Muzio Scevola," music by Bononcini, imperial chamber composer, performed on the 'nameday' of Empress Amelia,—he wrote 110 textbooks for Vienna.

The last text book B—r claims to have been the "Muzio Scevola," which was composed by Handel, Bononcini and—who? Attilio, say all authorities but Chrysander, who gives Act I. to Filippo Matteo, called Pippo, first violoncellist in the orchestra, and it is his business to know. Chrysander, too, says that the London "M. Scevola" text book was by Paolo Rolli, so here two doctors disagree.

Beside Bertali and Draghi, we have the names Cesti, Pederzuoli, Sances, Zaini as composers; Schmelzer and Hoffer composers for the ballet and two ballet masters. The "Chapel," technically speaking, consisted of a chapelmaster, a vice do, 3 composers, 5 organists, 34 vocalists and 41 instrumentists—a fine establishment at a time when in Western Europe Louis XIV.th's, "four and twenty fiddlers all on a row," were such a marvel.

The wardrobes and scenery of the court operas were very splendid and costly; for instance, the mounting of "Il Pomo d' Oro" cost 100,000 florins—some $40,000—in those days when the comparative value of money was far greater than now. The regular annual expense of the court musicians was 46,780 fl., besides "remunerations." Leopold examined every candidate for his chapel himself, and every opera offered for performance; in the theatre he always had the score of the music before him, and it was no uncommon spectacle to see him directing the music of the mass from his box in the palace chapel.

His first wife cared nothing for music, but his second, Claudia Felicitas, from the Tyrol, played several instruments and sang well—she was shrewd too. At the Carneval of 1674 she caused to be performed an opera in 3 acts, entitled "La Laterna di Diogene," text by Minato, music by Draghi, in which various "court weaknesses" were brought to the Emperor's notice, and even some lessons administered to him indirectly in the person of the Alexander the Great on the stage.

Leopold shewed the ruling passion strong in death. It was May 5th, 1705, that he lay dying. He had received extreme unction and said his last prayer. Now he called for his orchestra, and to the soft tones of their instruments breathed his last.—Dramatic?

It must not be forgotten that the Italian language was as familiar at court as German; that there were then no German opera and no German singers,—at all events in this part of the world, and even in North Germany it was only in a helpless infancy, not really flourishing even in Hamburg, until near the close of the 17th century. It is curious that English opera with Purcell, and German opera with Keiser both flourished at the same time, and that neither then took firm root, both being crushed out by the Italian opera—but by an Italian opera composed by Germans, Handel, Hasse, and so on!

Review of Mendelssohn's Letters. Second Volume.

From the London Athenaeum.

Letters from the Years 1833 to 1847, of Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy (Leipzig, Mendelssohn; London, Williams & Norgate)

Though no one can accept this second volume of Mendelssohn's Letters—a sequel to the first—as standing in place of a biography,—though every one must regret the delay of his survivors in producing such a befitting memorial, seeing how many of those have already passed away out of reach,—the value of this new revelation exceeds that of the former one. Such a picture of ripe manhood, succeeding to a youth of brilliant promise, as it affords, has seldom been displayed. Mendelssohn's impressions of Italian, French and English travel were so fascinating by the spirit of enjoyment which they breathed, by the rapid acuteness of the writer's observation, by his power of rendering, with a few happy touches of lively, poetical, discriminating language, the magnificent shows of Nature, the precious works of Art, the distinctive peculiarities of character, no matter what their sphere or demonstration. Here we have the golden fruit of that travel and those experiences. Here, after having been shown the aspirant in the fresh and eager pleasure of wandering apprenticeship, we see the artist in the triumphant and generous mastery of his craft.

We fancy, however, that the picture might have been yet fuller and brighter than it is. It is impossible not to feel for those who have read the first letters with some knowledge of the subject, and who, while reading them, discerned editorial indiscretions in no respect consistent with the general tone of caution assumed. Whereas many passages and persons were avoided with scrupulous delicacy, others, claiming more consideration and reserve, were printed and exhibited without mitigation, in a spirit savoring rather of pique against some who are living than of respect for the feelings of the dead—who was the foremost of men to confess and to regret the injustices of a gifted boy's impertinence, into which he must have been more than mortal not to have been hurried by his spirits, his precocious knowledge, and strong artistic convictions. To take but one instance: nothing could be in worse taste than nakedly to print the sarcastic criticisms on "Robert le Diable" in a record from which so many things were omitted, and in which so many things are massed. Few except the initiated will be able to put a name to a certain musical companion of Mendelssohn's Roman life, of whose mistakes he wrote freely, and whose name is here considerately suppressed, out of deference to the feelings of the living. Why, then, should every ill-natured person have been invited to chuckle over the severe judgment flung out in the heat of youth against M. Meyerbeer? The German journalists have chuckled accordingly, and have pelted the composer of "Robert" with Mendelssohn's sharp words. This, we repeat, is cruel to the dead as well as the living. No one that has mixed ever so slightly in Berlin society can be unaware of the spirit of that capital, which is cynicism in its worst form,—that of petty scandal among artists, aye, and among statesmen and philosophers too, such as may befit crones of quality, but not honest and sincere men. The revelations of Miss Ludmilla von Assing, from Von Humboldt's letter-cases, would prove this, had not the fact been otherwise notorious. In Spontini's time, a whisper was allowed to pass round that the real author of "La Vestale" had been disposed of by the crafty Chapel-master, who was reaping his laurels—so much was the Italian detested. It is no indiscretion to state that a Montagne and Capulet disunion reigned between the rival Israelite houses of Mendelssohn and Meyerbeer, both looking to the highest artistic honors and preferments which the Prussian capital had to offer. But we had a right to expect that such paltry rancour should have been buried in the grave of a great and good man; one who, in his mature life, did cordial justice to Spontini and to M. Meyerbeer (as we can attest from recollection); one, too, who, largely because of the pervading influences of bitter and ungenerous, and disloyal colerie-tone, came, as we shall see, to avoid Berlin as a residence, with all its honors and appointments, pressed on him by the direct and flattering encouragements of royal favor, even though the city contained that dear family house to which his heart was drawn, as to a magnet, whithersoever his wanderings led him, and those beloved relatives without whose sympathy and appreciation the most brilliant success availed him nothing.

Still, after all the allowance which the above remarks imply as being necessary has been made, this book is unique in its portraiture of a musician's character. The beardless youths of today's Germany, who whistle away every great reputation of the past with a stupid ignorance—borne out, it must be said, by their pretenses at composition,—who will call Mozart slow and pale, and patronize Beethoven as a pioneer, and admit Weber to be a folk's-composer, and yawn at Mendelssohn as a monotonous and shallow formalist,—should be here rebuked (supposing any sense of shame lingers among them) by the exposure of the thoughts, opinions, and sympathies of the most German of Germans—of the truest of true men, who could prove his greatness as an artist by his catholicity in admiring forms of Art different from his own,—each according to its real worth, no matter whether it was old or new. Let us paraphrase what he writes about Chopin to his sister, Madame Hensel, in 1835: "I cannot deny, dear Fanny, that I have lately discovered that you have not been just enough to Chopin,"—giving excellent reasons for his admiration, and going on to tell of a curious Sunday evening, A.D. 1835, on which he played before Chopin the music of his then unproduced "Paulus," when, betwixt the two acts of the oratorio music, the Polish composer,—not at that time withdrawn, by bad health, and bad Parisian influences, from public performance,—played, as an entr'acte, some of his nocturni. Later, Mendelssohn loved to play and to exhibit these very compositions,—which one of the new pedants would have found disgusting, because not like his own work;—and to dwell on the peculiarity in the music, on the charm in the man, while neither imitating the peculiarity of the one nor emulating the charm of the other.

So, too, whether the great and real artist found something to admire in the technical treatment of the keyboard of the pianoforte by Döhler, or whether he did curious and admiring homage to the union of power and elegance, and perfect mechanism in Herr Thalberg's piano-forte effects,—he was always ready rightly to appreciate, willing to learn, and nowise to be swayed or carried away by any predominant fashion, but ready with love, ready with reason, ready without envy to help, to bring home (that home being always Germany) the best of the best, no matter what the country of birth might be,—no matter how different the usages which separated one musical world from another. He was prepared to try the difficult conquest of the Grand Opera of Paris. He enjoyed practising on the field of success which he had conquered in England. Here is another encounter which shows the man in all his geniality:

"Yesterday (the date is Frankfort July 1836) I went early to Hiller's. Who is sitting there? Rossini, stout and broad, in the most charming of Sunday humors. I know truly few men who can be so amusing and full of spirit as he when he will. I have talked with him about getting the Mass in B minor, and other things by Sebastian Bach sung for him by the Cecilian Society; that will be too rare. The Rossini wondering at Sebastian Bach! But he thinks 'tis as well to do as the people of the country do,—and when he is among wolves will howl."

A closer knowledge of the author of "Guillaume Tell" would have taught Mendelssohn that the Pescoeres maestro did not express interest in Bach as an act of mere complaisance. It is only of later days that the universality of Signor Rossini's musical knowledge, and the retentiveness of his memory have come to be known in all their fullness and force. This trying Bach on the Italian recalls another experiment of the kind, made on another composer of another country, whose pretensions of the highest musical knowledge and the utmost severity of taste may well be called amazing. When visiting Mendelssohn, he, too, without any air of howling when among wolves, expressed no common curiosity about works of Bach unknown to him—the eight-part Motets among the number. Mendelssohn collected these and sent them to the hotel where Z— was staying. When they met again, Z— was duly oracular on the subject: "But do you know," said Mendelssohn, who used to tell the story with infinite humor, "the music came back to me without his even having untied the strings of the parcel!"

Too few letters referring to Mendelssohn's residence at Dusseldorf are given. Yet that was one of the most interesting periods of his life, that which preceded the universal acknowledgment of his genius. He was then, too, in closer connection with theatrical matters than at any later period, having even, during a short period, some share in the direction of the opera conjointly with Immerman, and dreaming even then of writing "Tempest" Music, as a sequel to the "Midsummer Night's Dream" Overture. Difficulties and troubles arose, as they are too apt to do, in the weary world of dramatic enterprise: the failure, too, of an opera produced at Berlin—"Carmacho's Wedding"—may have had its part in damping such ardor in the cause as he possessed. Be this as it may, however, instead of Mendelssohn's opera, which he was always talking of writing, there came his oratorio "St. Paul," which was produced for the first time at the Lower Rhenish Whitsuntide Festival at Dusseldorf, and first in England, not at Birmingham, as the editors of those Letters have stated, but at Liverpool. One critic only, but he was a writer whose prejudices were passion, the late Gresham Professor, made light of the work because it was not Spohr's, and, with an acumen which it is amusing to call to mind, balanced it in the scales of wisdom against an oratorio by Mr. Perry—giving, on the whole, the preference to the latter; but the voice of all England and all Germany was against that arrogant man. There could be no longer an instant's doubt that a star of the very greatest magnitude had risen. The immediate success of his oratorio seems honestly to have surprised Mendelssohn. It assured his position,—which was thenceforward to the day of his death such an one as few, if any, musical artists have ever occupied. He had a home everywhere among the best of the best. In England he exercised a sort of fascination, which has still not passed away. He had admirers enthusiastic enough to collect every possible memorial, not of himself alone, but of all belonging to him. During a quarter of a century, he was the musical type or pattern by which every young beginner anxiously modelled his music. Well would it have been had our young men modelled themselves after his indefatigable industry, his unswerving sense of duty, his upright courtesy, his charity, his resolution to gather knowledge and to recognize what was good in Art, no matter whether it agreed or disagreed with his own individuality! These selected Letters only display this phase of his character partially. They tell how keenly he relished the Shakespearian Readings of Mrs. Fanny Kemble how he was enchanted by a player on a poor little instrument of wood and straw, one Herr Guzikow; but they do not show what pleasure he could also take in a thing so perfect of its kind as the riding of an equestrian, M. Paul Cuzent, for whose performance he actually wrote music (now, we suppose, lost.) Cuzent must have been a superior man, with better ambition than usually goes round in the ring. He retired from the booth and betook himself to the study of music and composition. An operetta by him made its way to public performance at the Theatre Lyrique at Paris; but he followed his patron and friend before he could work out a second career.

While we are indicating blanks which remain to be filled up, the number of which makes the record of a life so richly noble, so necessary, we may call up as an illustration an evening in which the composer of "St. Paul" sat like a delighted child at the corner of a piano-forte, to be regaled till the "small hours" by the inimitable and always artistic whimsies of Mr. John Parry. He would not let them come to an end. "Now a little more—now, pray! a little more!" improvising betwixt show and show, with a vivacity and readiness of invention, such as no royal person could have commanded. He was always, in brief, quickened to do his best by every thing that was real,—superior to the beggarly feeling of the apaiser, of the pedigree man, of the martinet, who think, with Lady Blarney, that "there is a form,"—men who dare not move, and dare not enjoy, and dare not understand, till rubrical warrant is given to their pleasures.

There is small need to dwell on the influence which Mendelssohn's residence at Leipzig exercised over that somewhat Bœotian town, (Bœotian in spite of its University, its fairs, and its publishing-houses). He made it the capital of musical Germany. The concerts there, in his time, were without peer. The players' instruments were poor and their appointments were not good: two deficiencies which he bent himself generously to improve, and which to some degree he did succeed in improving; but there has been nothing before or since comparable to his energy in research, his liberality in welcome, his power of keeping alive an audience a long winter through, without any false or foolish condescensions to the nonsense of the moment.

If Leipzig was Mendelssohn's capital as above described, he as its king could show royal hospitality. In a letter (date 1840) to his mother, he writes of a visit from Dr. Liszt in his best vein. Two men less like one to the other (both being consummate musicians) could not be imagined; but no one of the congregation who, by blind wonder, have helped its oracle to lose itself, can be more outspoken than was Mendelssohn, in tribute to the marvellous power of hand, and memory, and heart, belonging to the guest at Leipzig. And delightful is it, though a little melancholy to those who have a recollection of similar hospitalities, to meet there with Mendelssohn's postscript to all he had written to his mother, in the form of his tale of a party given by him to Dr. Liszt, in 1840, at the Gewandhaus, to three hundred and fifty guests, at which were "orchestra, chorus, bishop (the drink known by that name), cakes, Meeresstille overture, psalm, triple concerto of Bach (played by Mendelssohn, Hiller and Liszt), choruses from "St. Paul," fantasia on "Lucia di Lammermoor," "Erl König,"—"the devil and his grandmother." But the hospitality did not imply acquiescence on the part of the man who lovingly erected a monument to Sebastian Bach, under the shadow of the Thomas Kirche, with any of his guest's feverish vagaries, which ended in the discovery and patronage of Herr Wagner as the great latter-day musical prophet of Germany.

Instead of paraphrasing letters, it may be better for the moment to continue calling attention to the incompleteness of these memorials of a great man's life. We have to pick our way, by aid of some small knowledge, towards the issue of the success of "St. Paul," and the achievements marking the residence of the composer of "St. Paul" at Leipzig, during which time Mendelssohn helped so many bounteously, and helped himself so modestly. As life advanced, however, and with it his consciousness of life's duties and his own powers, it became obvious to him that he could not be a mere mouthpiece to the German winds that blew from all the four quarters of the compass. It was delightful, no doubt, to every one else,—whether such guest was Chelard or Marschner, or other unlucky man whose success had been chequered by the caprices of German popularity,—or whether it was a rising composer from the little-known north, such as Herr Gade—to find a ready welcome—a great artist sitting at the gate, waiting to produce, with all his heart and soul and spirit, all that new-comers young or old could offer. It became obvious, even to a man so liberal as Mendelssohn, that, while directing those Leipzig concerts, he was in no small degree devoting his life to others, whereas a life of his own was waiting for him. Thus, after having as conductor raised a second-rate orchestra, and a series of dull concerts to a brightness and a notoriety which, as has been said, were without parallel, the time came when Mendelssohn felt that he must live for himself; and that he could serve the great cause of German music better by asserting himself as a composer than by being the usher and interpreter of others. Accordingly he slackened his intercourse with the people of his capital as a maker of music for their pleasure. He was, by this time—the later period of his life—sought for, persecuted with attentions, it may be said, on every side, by the great and the powerful. It was not possible that such a man should be allowed to live his own life and to work his own works without reference to courts, or orders, or appointments. So that, after the "Lobgesang" had carried out and enhanced the reputation made by the "St. Paul," and after a small mercantile town had been virtually made the centre of German musical creation—thanks to the presence of an original and conscientious man of genius—it became a necessity that such a man as Mendelssohn should not be longer overlooked. He was to be attached to the court of Berlin at any price.

History may possibly do more justice than is the fashion of the hour to the memory of the late King of Prussia, as a monarch who, during the early part of his reign at least, had liberal views, if visionary, in regard to literature, science and art,—and who did his best to make his chilly and pedantic capital less chilly and pedantic by gathering to it some of the best men of Germany. His wisdom, however, fell short of his aim, because his personality and vanity were stronger than his wisdom. His patronage was too despotic. He was too much given to meddle—to occupy the gifted persons he had enticed to Berlin or encouraged there over chimeras and whimsies of his own finding out, from which no permanent result could possibly arise. His favorite architect, Schinkel, thwarted in the execution of many of his best designs (and whose reputation has suffered from the restraining economy of his master), was, nevertheless, commissioned to waste time, thought and ingenuity in devising plans and working out details for a new capital, as though there was any chance of its being built, supposing even the money had been in the treasury. Mendelssohn, again, was to be employed on tasks only a trifle more genial—tasks almost as useless as any which a musician so conscientious as he was can undertake,—even though they were hailed by a Bunsen as inaugurating a new musical era. Translated Greek tragedies were to be revived and performed after the manner of the ancients, with choral and orchestral music by a modern writer,—though small use could be made of Doric and Lydian and Phrygian modes, as unfit for the time we live in as the masks and buskins of the Athenian stage. The composer's compliance gave to the world two great examples of difficulties surmounted, in the choruses to "Antigone" and to "Œdipus;" but let the best be made of them that faith and reverence can make, they remain still, and must remain virtually, so much dead matter,—at best representing a pleasure of which only the few and the gravely scholastic can partake in all its fulness. To be tied to such services, even had it been in a world where there were no such things as cabals, neither courtiers yawning in secret over the Attic feasts, imperfectly served, which were set before them by royal caprice, would by no means have suited one of Mendelssohn's independent spirit. None could know better than he that to be retrospective is one thing, to attempt to galvanize the shapeless remains (for to such do the relics of Greek music amount) of a by-gone world—still more, to substitute modern creation in their place—is another. To his court-service at Berlin we owe, it is true, that peerless setting of Shakspeare's fairy play, the "Midsummer Night's Dream,"—the setting of the "Athalie" choruses,—and (in another sphere) the noble unaccompanied eight-part Motets for the Cathedral, which stand next to Palestrina's music; but these letters show how he chafed and was vexed in the fetters which pretending lovers of art tried to fling around him,—how, while Bunsen was encouraging him to expend leisure and ingenuity on pseudo-classical dressings of classical works (in which there can be no reality), his heart and mind were breaking away from every command of the kind, however seductively couched. After vain attempts, at the instance of many mistaken friends, to reconcile two impossible things, free agency and court-service, he retired from the fruitless struggle. It is impossible to cite any thing in the whole library of letters written by great men more noble in tone, more direct in utterance, more respectful, without a touch of sycophancy, than those having reference to Mendelssohn's withdrawal from Berlin. On his being pathetically adjured not to be a traitor, not to desert his king as others were doing, he replied that, while he loved his country and honored his sovereign as thoroughly as the best of them (though he was only a musician), he could most efficiently prove himself a good subject by free labor in the wide field of art, as his own instinct led him, and not by attempting, against his better judgment, faded and false modern classicalities, for the poor purpose of giving a learned and refined air to the Potsdam and Sans-Souci of the nineteenth century.

While these negotiations were going on, he was busy over the sacred masterpiece of this century—his second oratorio. What a year was that which brought "Elijah" to light! To show how little these letters will stand in stead of the Biography that should be written, it may be pointed out how meagre of necessity are the notices of the busiest period of Mendelssohn's life as a creator and conductor—the year when within a few weeks were crammed a musical festival at Aix-la-Chapelle, with Mdlle. Jenny Lind,—the production of that excellent Catholic hymn the "Lauda Sion," at Liege,—the Singing Festival with upwards of three thousand male voices at Cologne, over which he presided,—and the hasty bringing out of "Elijah" at Birmingham. Those were weeks full of animation and event—perhaps the culminating time of his triumphs as an artist; and as such relished by him with an exquisite heartiness. He was then pursued by artists and admirers from every part of France and Germany; and would tell, with infinite humor, among other encounters, how, while looking at the Archbishop's tomb in Cologne Minster (a building for which he entertained an admiration amounting almost to a passion,) he was drawn back to the world of "lamp-oil and orange-peel" by the appearance of a composer of no mean merit, Onslow, and the euphuistic and mannered, yet not insincere, compliments of that courtly man!

So long did he loiter, naturally beguiled by the excitements of the summer, that a part of the "Elijah" was brought to London, at the last moment, in fragments; its composer by no means considering his work as complete, not having made up his mind as to some of what are to-day considered its favorite portions. It is a fact that he spoke of the possibility of leaving out that delicious air, "O, rest in the Lord," by which he seemed to set little store, but was persuaded by his friends to wait and see the effect produced by it.

Of all things, the Letters published give only a meagre account. We must here stop, however,—probably to return to the book on some future day; certainly frequently to refer to the treasures of wit, thought and instruction which it contains. Meanwhile, it appears to us the duty of the time is not so much to point out this story or the other fancy, as to urge on the survivors of so great and so complete an artist and so good a man, that they are indulging themselves, not showing affection for him, by withholding such a full biography as is a duty to those who inherit the name of Felix Mendelssohn. The catalogue of his published works, though drawn out by Herr Rietz (his trusted friend), is not correct, and for a simple reason: there are English works omitted, published in London, which he may have failed to enter in the list kept by him for the most part so carefully.

English Organ-Playing.

(From "The London Review,"—August 7.)

Mr. Willis's large organ, originally erected at the International Exhibition, having been transplanted to the Islington Agricultural Hall, was opened on Tuesday last by Dr. Wesley. A performance of the Messiah was given on the occasion by a band and chorus numbering upwards of a thousand, the principal singers being Mdlle. Parepa, Madame Sainton-Dolby, Mr. Wilbye Cooper and Mr. Lewis Thomas. Between the first and second parts of the oratorio, Dr. Wesley performed a fantasia and fugue (extempore). Organ-playing in this country is so profitless a pursuit that any artist who devotes himself exclusively to the cultivation of the grandest of all instruments deserves respectful consideration for an enthusiasm which, whatever fame it may bring, will scarcely produce much more solid results. There is, perhaps, no walk of musical art so absorbing as organ-playing. Singing and violin-playing have powerful fascinations for artistic egotism, but the vainest of singers or violinists must occasionally feel a yearning for something beyond their own individual efforts. Not so the organist—seated at an instrument of sufficient magnitude, with its three or four manuals, (key-boards) and its proper complement of pedals, realizing the grand conceptions of that Michael Angelo of music, Sebastian Bach, or indulging in the reveries of extemporaneous fancy, the organist sinks all sense of the personal in the sublimity of an instrument whose tones are identified with the most sacred and ennobling associations. Among the few English organists of distinction, the late Samuel Wesley (father of the Dr. Wesley just referred to) merits especial mention, not only as an improvisatore of considerable powers, but also as having been the first to introduce among us the fugues of Sebastian Bach. Samuel Wesley's organ playing was that of a clear, though not profound thinker; his natural genius was greater than his technical acquirements, and hence his improvisations were admirable rather for intelligible distinctness than for recondite elaboration. By far the greatest English organist was the late Mr. Thomas Adams, a man whose truly remarkable powers were never thoroughly appreciated save by the few who are capable of following the intricacies of fugue and counterpoint. This gentleman, although, of course, not comparable to Mendelssohn in genius and fancy, was little, if at all, inferior to him (as an organ player) in mechanical dexterity and command of the intricate combinations of counterpoint in his impromptu performances. One, two, and sometimes three subjects (frequently proposed at the moment by one of the audience) were treated with logical strictness and unhesitating clearness, including all those ingenious combinations and devices (inversion, augmentation, diminution, &c.), which are difficulties even in deliberate composition. True, in his free fantasia playing, his style was sometimes disfigured by antiquated mannerisms which he had imbibed from the false taste prevalent during his early studies. Take him altogether, however, Mr. Thomas Adams was a man of very rare and remarkable talent, absorbed in the exercise of his special powers, and reaping but small reward and limited fame—dying the organist of an ordinary parish church; and, so far as we remember, without one word of passing comment. Much interest was excited by the announcement of Dr. Wesley's performance on Tuesday last, and many amateurs of the organ were attracted by the desire to hear a player whose celebrity has not been extinguished by his long absence from London. Dr. Wesley commenced with a prelude in the free style, leading to an andante in which he displayed some of the solo stops of the instrument, and concluding with a fugue which was announced as extemporaneous, the preceding movements it may therefore be presumed being written composition. The subject of Dr. Wesley's fugue was neither new or interesting—it was so trite as to possess no importance in itself, and could only have derived it by an elaborate treatment which it did not receive. A counter subject was added, which, however, speedily disappeared; and after the usual "point d'orgue" and some sequential repetitions of the subject, the fugue was wound up by a brilliant "coda." Dr. Wesley exhibited consummate skill in his treatment of the instrument, his unerring readiness of hand and feet evincing complete mastery over all the difficulties of his art—but, although our greatest living organist, Dr. Wesley can scarcely be considered the equal of Adams either in clearness of rhythmical phrasing, purity of part-playing, or ingenuity in the devices of counterpoint.

Music in Italy.

(Correspondence of the London Musical World.)

Vicenza, October, 17, 1868.

SIR.—The Opera in Italy, as conducted on a first-rate scale, has so often been described that it may be a relief to understand how it is done on a third-rate scale in the smaller provincial cities; and let the Operas at Arona, Verona and Vicenza stand as types of their class.

Arona is a most charming town on Lake Maggiore—neat, clean, amid fascinating scenery, and yet enjoying all the conveniences of access by steamboat and railroad. Nobody ever stops there—English tourists rush on, as if they were running a race, and take the first train to Milan, and, in consequence, the inns are reasonable, and not overcrowded, while the churches seldom see inquisitive strangers examining their treasures under the dictation of Murray.

The theatre at Arona is, like the town, neat and small. As the performance was announced to begin at half-past seven o'clock, I went there at seven, expecting to find a large audience present. My advent excited a flutter among a few shabby officials, who were eating chestnuts by the light of a little oil lamp in the vestibule. One of them went into the box office, lit a candle, and procured a ticket about a foot square, which he sold to me for the sum of one franc, admitting me to the parterre or pit, and then another official stopped eating chestnuts to receive from me the piece of pasteboard as I passed into the theatre.

Instead of the well-lighted, half-filled auditorium I had expected, I found myself in a sort of mammoth cave, dimly lit by one feeble oil lamp, which seemed to be suspended in some miraculous way from the proscenium, and shed a dying glare upon the front of the drop curtain. Not a soul was yet in the house, and a melancholy silence reigned around, the whole scene suggesting an Italian cemetery at night, with the lamp that is always burning in the centre thereof.

Time dragged wearily on, and soon I went out again to nerve my drooping spirits by a stroll in the street. Returning at twenty minutes past seven, I found five people in the theatre, while an extra lamp had been lighted near the door. A few moments later, without a moment's warning, the proscenium lamp began slowly to ascend, and disappeared at the top of the stage. A solemn click was heard, and part of the ceiling of the auditorium parted, disclosing a large chandelier, with the lamps thereof all lighted. The seventh man now entered the auditorium. The chandelier then began to slowly descend, amid the acclamations of the seven auditors. It rested when about ten feet above our heads, and from this elevation generously dribbled oil over the pit.

The eighth auditor now entering was followed by the ninth, with his wife and three small children. At the same time a face was applied to a great aperture in the drop curtain, and a pair of big Italian eyes took a survey of the house. Anxious as I was for fresh demonstrations, I almost missed the next stage of this mysterious series of proceedings, which was the weird illumination of a clock somewhere up near the ceiling. After this a row of foot-lights suddenly popped up from some subterranean recess under the stage, and was followed by a great green carriage top, intended to hide the prompter. Alas! why did it not stifle his noisy tongue! The house was by this time half full; and the members of the orchestra finally strolling in one by one, as if they dropped in casually, and had no particular business there, the opera was actually begun before the excited mind had fairly recovered from the effects of the machinery whose operations I have described.

It was Verdi's Luisa Miller, very fairly sung; a good baritone who, spite of a long grey beard, still looked young enough to be Louisa's grandson; and a robust tenor, a large, splendidly-built young man, being worthy of special notice. The house was quite enthusiastic, and in the final trio of the last act the singers would have excited the admiration of even a London audience. The other opera of the season at Arona is Ricci's Che dura Vince.

Vicenza is one of the most beautiful places in Northern Italy,—quite as beautiful in its location as Verona, of which Ruskin has so much to say. The opera-house, or Teatro Pamato, is a curious half-classic affair, built outside the gates of the city on the finely shaded plain which lies between it and the railway station. The front is a projecting semi-circle, crowned with statues, and presenting among the green trees quite a picturesque—almost Arcadian—appearance. The roof of the auditorium is simply a vast sail of canvas, supported in the centre by a large mast, as in a circus tent. Yet the interior is quite pretty, and well lighted, though the floor is mother Earth alone. Of course the place is only serviceable in fair weather. Here I heard quite as good a performance of Norma (excepting as to chorus) as I have heard in the finest European capitals. The Norma was a Signora Piedola—a large, well-formed young woman of the Medori style, and of striking merit both as an actor and a singer. The next night she sang in Lombardi, where the mediocrity of the tenor and baritone only made her ability the more striking. All the singers were laboring under a cold, and Piedola also was so hoarse, that she sang the air "Non fu Sogno" but poorly, and indeed in one part quite broke down. This misfortune, however, seemed to arouse all her energy, for during the orchestral interlude she stamped her foot almost involuntarily, gathered her strength, and burst out in the repetition of the air with almost startling force and effect. The effort was a dangerous one however. After the air, before she could reach the side wings, she was seized with a fit of coughing which seemed to rack her very frame, and scarcely left her strength to acknowledge the generous applause of the audience. I have not heard or seen her since; but I suppose that in the cold, damp, little roofless theatre of Vicenza, this splendid lyric artist is still wearing and wasting away her strength and her ability.

At Verona I heard perhaps the cheapest kind of Italian opera, at the Teatro della Porta Nuova,—a day theatre. The performance was announceed to begin at half-past four p.m., and I was again, the first at the spot. The theatre was merely a stage, with shabby drapery and drop curtain while the auditorium consisted of a gallery built of rough pine boards, and the intervening space or pit, which was floored only with gravel, and had no roof at all—not even the bit of circus canvas. It was, moreover, an undertaking of no little difficulty to find this theatre, as it was in the rear of a big beer shop, and the only intimation of its existence was a little sign, bearing the words—

BIRRERIA

TEATRO.

The brewery being evidently considered the most important portion of the establishment.

The opera was L'Elisir d'Amore, sung quite well by a half worn-out little prima donna, a neat tenor with a "still small voice" like conscience, an inexperienced and a good basso. The chorus was poor, and the scenery consisted of a view of the church of San Fermo in Verona. The opera began at about sunset, but as night came on, footlights popped up, and members of the orchestra—mostly boys of about sixteen—lit little candle ends. The conductor wore a felt hat and his subordinates generally kept on their caps, as did most of the audience, who were generous in their applause, yet quite appreciative withal of any errors.

Talking about conductors, reminds me of the singular idiosyncrasy of him who wielded the baton at the Vicenza theatre. This brave Signor wore a splendid black beard, which he "cherished with a father's care." Between the acts he would turn around to the audience, take out of his breast pocket a cigar case, open it, and extract thence a large comb with which he would proceed calmly and deliberately to comb this beard. The majestic gravity which characterized this proceeding—the air of utter sang froid with which he languidly gazed at the audience, during the operation, bordered on the sublime. Yet I would not advise Arditi or Costa to emulate this proceeding, at least in public; for only the conductor of Vicenza could do it with that grace and nonchalance so peculiarly his own.

TROVATORE.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW HAVEN, CONN., DEC. 19.—If increase of musical taste in a community is to be judged by the amount of fostering bestowed upon art and its professors, justly indeed may we boast of the refinement and liberality of the communities residing in the capital cities of Connecticut, Hartford and New Haven. The "Beethoven Society," now an institution of the city of Hartford, has just given, with the greatest success, two performances of Mendelssohn's sublime Oratorio "Elijah," one in Hartford and one in New Haven. The large attendance in both places proves how thoroughly their efforts to diffuse a taste for the grand and beautiful are appreciated. The impetus given to this divine art by the performing of such important works is hardly to be calculated; and the visit of the society to this place, for the purpose of enabling us to listen to this great composition, is an event that will live in the memory of all who were present and enjoyed the result of their labors and careful study. I have heard this Oratorio in New York and Boston, but must confess that I have never enjoyed the performance to the extent of the other evening. It may have been from the fact of its being given by too limited a number of voices in large buildings, where the sound was comparatively lost. Here, where the hall seats 2,000 persons, the choruses told with thrilling power, while the mellow grandeur of the harmony, the powerful instrumentation, the sombre loftiness of intonation, which characterize Mendelssohn's style, were brought out with marvellous effect.

The Society had for their accompaniments an excellent orchestra from your city, amongst them, the Quintette Club, and the Germania Society. Their playing exhibited a fine appreciation of the composer's meaning, and I do not exaggerate, when I say, that the accompaniment was the most perfect instrumental performance of the kind I have ever heard.

Not a point of mechanical execution was it so admirable, but in all the higher attributes of mind and spirit, did it stand above all others. I would particularly mention the violoncello of Mr. Fries, and the oboe by Mr. Rebes. The ladies and gentlemen forming this society have very musical voices, the trebles in particular. Every point in the exquisite score, both vocal and instrumental, was brought out distinctly and forcibly; whether in their extreme fortes, their crescendos, and diminuendos, or pianos, and in every degree of light. Their singing was admirable; it seemed as if the spirit of the immortal composer must have been with them. It was indeed a pleasure to listen, because there was no anxiety that all would not be complete.

Dr. GUILMETTE was the Prophet, and well did he perform his part; there was no husbanding of resources. His singing exhibited many physical and intellectual beauties; it would be difficult to select any particular passage for remark, for he displayed his gifts with equal grace and importance throughout; there was no execution of mere isolated passages, while others were allowed to take care of themselves. His pathos as he depicted the sorrows of the heart-broken Elijah; "It is enough; O Lord now take away my life," was truly impressive, and produced a deep sensation, which was made manifest by that kind of applause which bespeaks the irrepressibility and sincerity of the tribute.

The other solos were sustained by Hartford talent. Mrs. HUNTINGTON's singing of "Hear ye Israel" was remarkable for its intensity and truthfulness. She managed her voice with rare skill; there was ease, brilliancy, and a perfection of intonation not often found in a singer. Miss SMITH's singing made a thoroughly favorable impression; she has a voice of delicious purity, and sings with much force, taste and expression. The "Sanctus" of the Angels had Mrs. HUBBLE for the first soprano. She has a superb voice, breadth of tone, and grandeur of sustaining power; her upper notes soared gloriously above the orchestra and chorus. The trio "Lift thine eyes" was beautifully read, and most deliciously sung by Mrs. Huntington, Mrs. Hubbel and Mrs. RISLEY; the latter has a noble contralto voice. The quartet, "Come every one that thirsteth," was finely rendered by Miss VON WAGNER, Miss CURTIS, Mr. HUNTINGTON and Mr. HUNT. The former gentleman has a fine tenor voice. The four great choruses, "Thanks be to God," "Be not afraid," the scenes on Mount Horeb, and the translation of Elijah to Heaven, were a triumphant success.

To Mr. J. G. BARNETT, the conductor, and Mr. W. J. BABCOCK, the organist, great praise is due for the manner in which they have drilled the Chorus singers. To Mr. Barnett, in particular, would I tender my thank; she is evidently a thorough and effective musician, and has great, natural capacities for his position, that of Conductor. He must have studied this great work, with the eye of a critic, and the heart of a lover, and the consequence was, that the audience were enabled to read almost the soul of the composer. His admirable analysis of the oratorio (on the Programme) enabled those not musically educated to enjoy and better understand the different movements in their order.

NEW YORK, DEC. 22.—The German Opera wound up last evening with Gounod's "Faust," its second representation by the Anschutz company. The house was filled from pit to dome, and the enthusiasm unbounded. The choruses of the Kermesse in the second act, and the Soldiers Chorus by the Arion Society, in the fourth act, were rapturously encored, and the opera throughout was a success. The two performances of "Faust" have saved Anschutz from the pecuniary loss which the failure of the previous performances would have entailed, and it is a great pity that he did not commence his season with it, instead of "Stradella," "Martha," and the like, which drew hardly a "Corporal's guard." The German Opera season has proved a failure, and this fact reflects but little credit upon the German population, who have always been such liberal patrons of their own national enterprise. As Anschutz steps out, Maretzek pops in, and our Holiday week will be doubly gay and brilliant, from the presence of the Maretzek troupe at the Academy. Medori, Kellog, Mazzoleni, Bellini and Biachi, will very happily replace Johannsen, Frederici, Himmer, Habelmann, Steinecke, Graff and Weinlich.

The dress circle and boxes, so cold, sombre and dreary the last month or more, will now shine out resplendent with diamonds and beauty, and (vide Herald) Shoddy; Maretzek, Joell and Gosche will be as happy as mortals can be, and the short holiday season of four nights will put money into the pocket of the management, and charity into the hearts of the patrons. New York, with all its sins of extravagance and excess, never was more liberal than at the present time in its contributions to objects of mercy and charity. The Academy on the occasion of a patriotic entertainment for the benefit of the Soldier's Home, on Tuesday evening last, was crowded to excess at an admittance fee of one dollar, and an innumerable number of similar entertainments have received the same generous patronage of the public. So we herald the advent of the Italian opera in Christmas week with joy, for many hearts will be gladdened, many trials softened. Maretzek opens to-morrow evening with Verdi's "Un Ballo in Maschera," with Medori, Brignoli, Sulzer, Mazzoleni, Bellini and Colletti. "Ione," Norma, and "Faust," will be given on the successive opera nights, and "Don Giovanni" at a matinee, and then you will be afforded an opportunity of listening to them yourself, neater home. In February they will return to us for a long and, I trust, successful season.

The second Philharmonic Concert was given to a full house on Saturday evening last. The soloists of the evening were Mme. Virginia Whiting Lorini, and Mr. Robert Goldbeck. The programme comprised Beethoven's "Pastoral" Sixth Symphony; "Le Songe," a Morceau Symphonique, by Mr. Goldbeck, for piano and orchestra; Gade's overture "In the Highland," and Wagner's "Rinsi" overture. Goldbeck's "Le Songe," received the most unbounded praise. "The Pastoral" with all its charming wood, and brook, and bird music was well executed, and a happy introduction to the evening's programme. The concert was under the direction of Theo. Eisfeld. The next will be conducted by Carl Bergmann.

The Harmonic Society give their annual performance of "Messiah" at Irving Hall, on Christmas evening, under the direction of Mr. George F. Bristow. Miss Brainerd, Mrs. Jenny Kempton, Mr. Simpson, and Mr. Thomas, are the soloists.

Messrs Mason and Thomas's soirées of Chamber Music will commence on the 12th of January. They will include the performers of last year, and the programme will present works of interest.

Theo. Thomas's Matinée, on Saturday last, was very well attended, and in addition to the attraction of the performance, an additional inducement was offered in the shape of the presentation of the "Christmas Polka" by Chas. Fradel, to every lady patron. The next will be on Saturday, when an unusually attractive programme will be presented.

"Timothy Trill" had an intelligent audience last night at the Parker Institute, to hear his new lecture on "Popular Music in and out of Church." The points of the discourse were these:—First, "A reform in the musical departments of our common schools by increasing the number of pianos, and teachers therein." Second, "the establishment of free Orphan Schools." Third, "the revival of Oratorios, with boys in place of women." Fourth, "the erection of a hall with an organ, &c." His remarks were honored with frequent applause.

The Christmas Music in the several churches will be unusually fine this year. Much pains and labor have been taken to prepare it, and the performance in many churches will be the feature of the service.

"Trovator" is home again, and I hope ere long will resume his letters to you. The pleasures of his trip through Europe will be ours also, if he will only take his pen in hand and talk.

Concerts.

MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB. The fifteenth season of these true and constant caterers to the advanced taste of the not too many who love the deep and quiet joys of classical chamber music, opened on Thursday evening, Dec. 10. The pleasant Chickering hall was not quite filled, although there was a very goodly gathering of appreciative listeners, including perhaps some who will appreciate better by and by. How one misses the old faces! Not all of them, thank Heaven; but fifteen years bring many changes in all companies. The Club itself, though, is unchanged; the same pleasant faces, the same artistic enthusiasm as for several years past, while in point both of individual accomplishment and of consensus one remarks encouraging improvement. SCHULTZE still holds the leading violin, MEISEL the second, GOERING and RYAN the tenors (these two ready in emergency with flute and clarinet), and WOLF FRIES the violoncello. The programme of this first concert was happily chosen:

1. Quintet in C minor, No. 1. . . . . Mozart.
Allegro—Andante—Minuetto in canone—Allegro.
2. Sonata in A for Piano and Cello. Op. 69. . . . . Beethoven.
Allegro ma non tanto—Scherzo. Allegro molto—Adagio cantabile and Allegro vivace.
- Messrs. J. C. D. Parker and Wolf Fries.
3. Fandango for Violin. Op. 60. . . . . Molique.
Wm. Schultze.
4. Adagio and Rondo Scherzo, from the celebrated Sonata "Le retour a Paris." Op. 70. . . . . Dussek.
5. Quartet in F. Op. 41, No. 1. . . . . Schumann.
Introduction, Andante espressivo and Allegro—Scherzo, Presto Intermezzo—Presto.

The Mozart Quintet made a genial and delightful opening. It is one of Mozart's earlier works, written in 1782, a year after his first important opera Idomeneo, but written originally as a Serenade for wind instruments—two oboes, two clarinets, two horns and two bassoons—and soon afterwards arranged by Mozart in the form in which it is now chiefly known, of a Quintet for strings.

Jahn says of the Serenade: "It has something large and serious about it, not the character of sadness, but of a strong and resolute resistance; note particularly the second theme of the first movement. The andante, together with great tenderness, holds fast to a composed and earnest character, which is uncommonly edifying. In the Minuet Mozart has introduced an exceedingly ingenious contrapuntal trick. The last movement passes gradually from an unquiet into a quiet mood, and ends fresh and vigorous." The Quintet was clearly and nicely rendered.

The Sonata Duo by Beethoven, is one not hitherto familiar here, and is throughout, from the first statement of the opening theme by the violoncello, so delicately imaginative, so instinct with musical delight, so full of happy inspirations all springing from one inspiration, that we trust, the concert room hereafter will often feel its pleasant glow and stimulus. It was played con amore, with truth and delicacy, by both interpreters. Mr. PARKER, certainly, showed a rare certainty, ease and finish in his piano-playing; and this was still more notable in his rendering of the two movements from the Sonata by Dussek, a famous old composer, for first introducing whom to a Boston audience at this late day we thank him. Dussek, of course, would not wear with us like Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Schubert, and the like; he is comparatively tame, monotonous in point of modulation, but elegant and graceful, and deserves to be better known. The Rondo Scherzo, though the theme comes round so many times with little variation, is so full of life and grace and piquancy, so nice in form and detail, and was so nicely, daintily performed, that it gave a very artistic sort of pleasure and was heartily applauded. The violin "Fandango" by Molique is a sparkling thing and suffered nothing in the tasteful execution by SCHULTZE, with quintet accompaniment.

Another string Quartet by Schumann! following up the good work begun by the Club last winter. It certainly says something in its favor, that the new work (new to us, we mean) was listened to throughout with close attention at the end of a concert, without a sign of weariness, but evidently with a most lively interest. It seemed a difficult and a strange work, full of ideas, and, as far as we could judge from a first hearing, was happy in the rendering. We cannot say it charmed us quite as much as the one in A (No. 3 of the same opus) which was performed last year; but it did please us greatly, and perhaps will please still more on further hearing; for which further hearing we here plead and venture on no more remarks at present.

The concert was, artistically, one of the best successes of the Quintette Club, and an auspicious opening of the series, which, though they cautiously promise only half the usual number of concerts this time, will we trust prove so enjoyable as to result in a "to be continued." The second concert falls on the 7th of January.

BOSTON MOZART CLUB. The concerts of our zealous amateurs are in one sense private, and yet not unmentionable. No tickets are sold; you go by invitation: and they are really what they profess to be, "Social Orchestral Entertainments" given to the Associate and Honorary Members. But thier artistic significance is wider, reaching beyond the private, and beyond the social circle. In days when we have actually no professional and public orchestral organization in our city, no "Philharmonic Society," no—to call up the names of blighted hopes—"Germania" or "Musical Fund," it is significant and does suggest a germ of promise, that we have four and twenty amateurs who care enough for Symphony and Overture to bring their instruments together once a week, and even learn unusual instruments for private gentlemen, and hire a "professional" or two to eke out the requirements of a score, and put themselves under the tuition and drill of the best leader they can find, and study out these fine works practically for themselves, and even for their friends and their friends' friends. For, these things being given: a considerable amount of practical musicianship scattered here and there among amateurs; zeal, organization, leadership, and steady laboring together for improvement, it must follow and it does follow, that in due time they have acquired completeness, unity and fluency enough to render some of the master-works with a rewarding glow of triumph to themselves and edification to their friends.

Of course their beginnings are humble, their pretensions small; all that they give you is clear gain; they stand in no way obligated to your patronage, in no way committed to any public service. And yet in one sense, perhaps, they have committed themselves to Art and to themselves, to make the most of a good thing well begun; what they so well appreciate, shall they not keep on and accomplish? In these small beginnings we cannot help hoping there may lie the germ and promise of the true Orchestra that Boston needs. The permanent orchestral society, we mean, whose bond of union is the love and common ministry of Art, and not material interest, which works (primarily at least) for Art and not for livelihood, and which we may look to as the organized certainty of unfailing periodical returns of Beethoven and all the great symphonic masters, as frequently and as cheaply as possible, with all possible perfection of interpretation, at all events with a right artistic and unselfish loyalty to Art in the interpreters. Professional services may be called in, always without stint as far as necessary to ideal excellence; but it has long seemed to us, indeed all our musical experience here has taught us, that the true Philharmonic Society, the true organization for Symphony concerts, should be founded on the love of such music, rather than on the business of music; Art-loving amateurs should originate it, foster it, direct it, and keep it up to the true mark. Not what will make most money or draw in the crowd, but what will go straightest and always to that mark, should be the object of the Society we stand the most in need of. Seek first the kingdom of divine Art and its righteousness, and be content to wait till "these things shall be added."

To return to the Mozart Club. This is the fourth season of their entertainments; and that in Mercantile Hall last Monday evening showed gratifying progress. Our friends seem steadily growing into the full stature, symmetry, vigor and freedom of an orchestra. Under CARL ZERRAHN they have had earnest practice. Their complement of instruments (for a small, outline orchestra) is now nearly whole. We counted 4 first violins, 4 second, 2 violas, 2 cellos, 2 double basses; flutes, oboes, clarinets and horns in pairs; trumpet, and tympani. Bassoons were wanting, also trombones; the skill of Mr. Ribas was called in for first oboe. Some new faces there were, and one or two familiar ones were missing; where was the gallant leader of the violins? Not finally withdrawn, we trust. Yet the "attacca" never seemed remiss or inefficient. The programme was a good one.

PART I.
GRAND SYMPHONY, in D major. . . . . MOZART
Allegro—Andante—Minuetto—Finale; Allegro vivace.
PART II.
1—OVERTURE. "Fidelio." . . . . BEETHOVEN
2—ANDANTE, from Symphony No. 4, (Italian). MENDELSSOHN
3—CONCERT WALTZ. . . . . STRAUSS
4—SERENADE for Select Orchestra. . . . . EISENLOTT
5—OVERTURE. "Italiana in Algieri." . . . . ROSSINI

Of the classical selections, the first two movements of the Mozart Symphony (a very fresh and festal composition, one of his happiest, though written in such haste, for a family festival, that he "scarcely remembered a word of it" a few days afterward and was surprised to find how good it was), and the Mendelssohn Andante, the last particularly, went very well and smoothly. The other parts indeed were creditable; but the Fidelio overture required more of an orchestra. The lighter pieces passed off gracefully and brightly; Rossini's witty, cordial humor came well in at the end, warming as punch and sleighbells in cold weather. The concert found a sympathetic audience; for what it lacked in skill was present in the spirit.

TERESA CARRENO. This uncommonly gifted child pianist, whose playing and, we may add, whose whole appearance produced such a sensation here a year ago, has returned to us. The interval has been spent in Cuba, partly in giving concerts, partly in solid practice, the result being that she has gained in physical strength, in musical skill and understanding, and has added largely to her repertoire both classical and of the virtuoso kind. On Tuesday evening she celebrated her tenth birthday by a concert in the great Music Hall, playing in alternation with the Great Organ.

In an artistic point of view the two things do not match nor in any way go well together: it is hard to establish any relationship between them, except a mutually damaging one; the piano sounded the feeble after the organ, the organ sounded to no purpose, a strange non sequitur, after the piano. Then the Music Hall is far too large a place for unaccompanied pianism, especially for the best or even a fair appreciation of the powers of such a child. Then again it dwarfed the pretty act to nothingness, to see it there, not relieved against, but rather extinguished by the grandeur of that gigantic Organ front,—for front it will be, and not background to any thing that is not of a kindred greatness, that is to say, to any thing less than an oratorio chorus or an orchestra; and even these must be engaged in the rendering of music which is intrinsically great, or still the grandeur of the Organ, Beethoven also, will look cold and spectral, with an unreal and disturbing presence; whereas the moment the inspired, great music is begun, the ice begins to thaw and the whole Organ and Beethoven look instinct with life and thrill in unison. On little things that Organ looks down chillingly; there is no help for it.

These things we mention as so many disadvantages under which charming little Miss Teresa appeared that evening. No wonder if the audience, the house seemed cold, and "influenza" unrestrainable in the assertion of its presence; the time too not quite fortunate, falling just on the reaction from a long and great excitement, that of the glorious Sanitary Fair. If therefore under all those drawbacks the young maiden made a fine impression and won plentiful applause, as indeed she did, it was so much the more to her own credit, say what we may of the arrangement. The programme, divided between herself and Mr. J. B. LANG, between the Chickering grand piano and the Organ, was as follows:

PART I.
1. Prelude and Fugue in C. . . . . Bach.
2. Marche Me Nait. . . . . Gottschalk.
3. Overture to "Egmont" (Transcribed). . . . . Beethoven.
5. Paraphrase de Concert, sur Rigoletto de Verdi. . . . . Liszt.

PART II.
1. Pastoral Symphony. (Transcribed). . . . . Handel.
2. Grand Caprice sur la Sonambula de Bellini. Thalberg.
3. Overture to "Der Freischütz" (Transcribed). . . . . Weber.
4. (a) Impromptu. (b) La Emilia Danza. Teresa Carreno.

Teresa's selections were not so interesting as she could easily have commanded. The Gottschalk March is empty, the Liszt and Thalberg opera fantasias are show pieces; but they exhibited her remarkable clearness, firmness, brilliancy and grace of execution. She has gained much in power, in certainty and ease in executing difficulties, in intelligent conception too, while her touch has a fine vital, sympathetic quality. Among her encore pieces, she played the Funeral March of Chopin, wonderfully for her, but not quite as it should be. After all, what struck us as most fresh and individual in her playing was the two little compositions of her own, which really show music to be the world which she is most at home in. She has lost nothing of her lively, natural, childlike manner, although she has grown somewhat.

Mr. Lang's Organ pieces were played in his usual masterly manner, the Pastoral symphony and Frey-schütz overture being loudly and persistently encored, to which he responded in kind, that is by playing again a part of the same, and not something else.

MORE CONCERTS. A musical spell succeeds the Fair; a whole week of concerts, daily, until Sunday next. We go to press so early on account of Christmas, that we can review no further, and must simply announce the rest.

1. For Wednesday afternoon and Thursday and Friday evenings, three CHRISTMAS ORGAN CONCERTS, with reasonable programmes, with Messrs. LANG and WILLCOX, PAINE and THAYER, TUCKERMAN and —, for organists; and, what we hail as a good sign, a return to wholesome popular prices, fifty cents for reserved seats.

2. Saturday evening, at Chickering's, the second Soirée of those genuine artists, KREISSMANN, LEONHARDT and EICHBERG. Their programme is richer than ever, and indeed the pieces are not only very choice, but, with the exception of one or two Lieder, are, we believe, quite new to our concert rooms. Mr. Eichberg will play a violin Sonata by old Arcangelo Corelli (No. 6, op. 5); then comes a sacred aria by Bach, arranged by Franz, and sung by Mr. Kreissmann; then Sonata (violin and piano) in G, by Beethoven, one of the greatest; then Mr. Leonhardt will play Chopin's Scherzo in C sharp minor; then three songs by Schubert; and for a winding up, the Scherzo and the Andante from Sonata Duo by Schumann, Op. 121.

3. Also on Saturday evening, TERESA CARRENO's second concert in the Music Hall; Miss HOUSTON and Mr. WHEELER assisting vocally, and Mr. DAUM as accompanist.

4. Sunday evening, the annual performance of "The Messiah," by the HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY in extra force, with the Great Organ, orchestra, ZERRAHN for conductor, and for solo singers: Miss MARIA BRAINERD, of New York, Mrs. J. S. CARY, Mr. J. R. THOMAS (basso), of New York, and Mr. L. W. WHEELER.

CHRISTMAS PRESENTS.—What fitter or more welcome to a musical friend than some handsome volume of imperishable music. On Ditson's counter you will find all Beethoven's Sonatas done up in two good volumes; or those of Mozart in one; or Mendelssohn's "Songs without Words." Or should your friend have taste that way, there are the two convenient volumes of Bach's "Well-tempered clavier," [48 Preludes and Fugues.] Then there are standard oratorios in just the shape to carry to the Music Hall, and then beautiful editions of the best Italian Operas, Don Giovanni included, and lighter things for lighter lovers, and simpler for the simple.

NEW YORK.—The German Opera (Anschütz) has not succeeded at the Academy of Music. They have played "Fidelio," noblest of operas, really well, we are assured, but still to empty benches. The "ever-verdant" Frey-schutz, as Fry calls it, was also played better than ever before in New York, to an audience only "improved in numbers over the original statements of paucity and poverty." To quote further from Fry (Tribune, 14th and 16th):

The upper tiers, 3 and 4, for the Academy boasts several benches aloft, had intensely interested Teutonic faces in it, delighted with their favorite interpreter of the loves, lager and free shots of Germany. The brilliant choruses of act 1 passed off well; the old waltz was fluent as ever; "Max" through the lips of Herr Habelmann, uttered his sweet woes with the red devil behind him; "Caspar" (Herr Weinlich) gave his model drinking song, which is too transcendental for vulgar wear. Madame Frederici was much applauded. She uttered the breathings of the prayer with a truly religious fervor, and was loudly encored—but we regret to say by a small audience. We hear a great deal of progress in art, as in learning and virtue; but we are not able to perceive it when the master-work of the romantic musical school does not draw a better audience, while caricatures of the African draw crowds, and an audience is found three hundred times in the year to ridicule the mute and the oppressed. We do not believe with such audiences as he now has that Mr. Anschütz can succeed. There is a great city of native Germans in New York, and they alone ought to fill the house; but what with their neglect, and the Americans who cannot find any merit in the best strains if allied to German consonants and gutturals, there is a deplorable want of proper attendance.

The orchestra of Mr. Anschütz should alone command attendance, not counting the attractions in the vocal department.

The Stage (clearly a German organ), of last Saturday, announces the premature finale, pointing to causes with we fear too much reason:

Thanks to the bad taste of the American opera-going public of this city, who have, during the past three weeks, almost entirely deserted the Academy of Music, not because the performances—as a general thing—were inferior to the Italian opera troupe, but because the toilettes of shoddy could not be displayed to as great an advantage as formerly, and to the evil influence of the daily press, of which the Herald has been the most prominent, Mr. Anschütz will be compelled to discontinue his performances in this metropolis on Monday next.

We cannot wonder that the German editor speaks with some bitterness of the disgrace which the New York public have affixed upon themselves by not supporting the German Opera, an institution which is worth more, in a musical point of view than all the Italian operatic enterprises that have been conducted in this city for many years. Such perfect orchestras, and choruses as those under Mr. Anschütz's control have never been heard in this country, and perhaps will never delight the ears of the New York public again. The artists also have not by any means been so inferior in merit as to deserve the small encouragement which has been extended to them.

Mmes. Johannsen, Frederici, Cannissa, M. Habelmann and others of the company, have always well performed their respective rôles, and if they do not possess as powerful voices as those of their Italian contemporaries, they sing and act with much more attention to the requirements of the operas in which they appear. But it is useless for us to continue either in dilating on the merits of Mr. Anschütz's troupe or in upbraiding the public for the disgraceful manner in which they have acted towards it, for in this city no musical enterprise or manager will succeed who either will not pay the press to laud him and company to the skies, or who cannot establish a fashionable emporium in the hall in which his entertainments take place. With the American people, as far as musical taste is concerned, we can only exclaim, "Vanity, vanity and all is vanity."

Try Boston, Mr. Anschütz; we don't believe the love of music is quite all vanity here.

FARMINGTON, CONN. Twice, for want of room, have we been compelled to postpone due mention of a couple of classical concerts, which took place at Miss S. Porter's Young Ladies' School, Nov. 9th and 10th. This school is privileged in having its musical department under the charge of an earnest and accomplished musician, like Mr. KARL KLAUSER. Not only is good music taught there, but care is taken that from time to time the pupils shall have a chance to hear some of the finest Chamber Music which the city of New York can furnish. For nine seasons in succession it has come to their own door, in the shape of a visit of the Quintette party consisting of Wm. MASON (piano), THEO. THOMAS and MOSENTHAL (violins), MATZKA (viola), and F. BERGNER (cello). Nor do they come with a "country programme," but they bring their best; so that those remote from the musical centres may have some chance at least to hear for themselves what the good music is. This time the programmes of the two evenings were as follows:

- Monday, Nov. 9th.
1. Trio in E flat major. Opus 97. . . . . Beethoven
  1. Allegro moderato. 2. Scherzo. 3. Andante Cantabile. 4. Allegro moderato.
  2. Quartet in G major, No. 1. . . . . Mozart
  1. Allegro vivace assai. 2. Minuetto. 3. Andante Cantabile. 4. Allegro Molto.
  3. Quartet in E flat major. Opus 47. . . . . Schumann
  1. Allegro ma non troppo. 2. Scherzo, molto vivace. 3. Andante Cantabile. 4. Finale, vivace.
- Tuesday, Nov. 10th,
1. Quartet in F major. Opus 18, No. 1. . . . . Beethoven
  1. Allegro con brio. 2. Adagio. 3. Scherzo. 4. Allegro molto.
  2. Sonate in F sharp minor. Opus 11. . . . . Schumann
  1. Introduzione—Allegro. 2. Aria. 3. Scherzo e Intermezzo—Allegretto. 4. Finale un poco Maestoso.
  3. Quartet in D minor, posthumous. . . . . Schubert
  1. Allegro. 2. Andante con moto, (con variazioni.) 3. Scherzo. 4. Allegro molto. 5. Finale, Presto.
  - Valse de l'opera Faust de Gounod. . . . . Liszt
  - William Mason.
  - Ballade et Polonaise de Concert. . . . . Vieuxtemps
  - Theodore Thomas.

CHICAGO PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY. We have glowing accounts of the opening concert of the fourth season, Nov. 13. Chicago, it would seem, greatly needs a Music Hall: its orchestra is as large as ours in Boston, and its Philharmonic enthusiasm greater, judging from the fact that on this occasion Bryan Hall was besieged by hundreds who in vain sought entrance; one account states that a bonus of five to twenty-five dollars was offered for single tickets.

The orchestra, under the able direction of Mr. BALATKA, played Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, (of which the bill contained a brief, uncommonly good analysis), and the overture to Zanetta; and accompanied Mrs. KLOSS (formerly Mrs. Bandt) in the Capriccio Brillante of Mendelssohn, who also played a piece by Liszt. The Times says of her:

Mrs. Kloss is an artist who has few equals. Her conception of the music before her is acute, and her touch more vigorous, clear, and decided than that of any lady performer to whom we ever listened. We think she has an execution almost equal to that of Gottschalk, and with it a much better faculty for interpreting the spirit of the composition than has that renowned pianist.

Extraordinary praise is given to the singing of a young Chicago debutante, Miss FREDERICA MAGNUSON. Her principal piece was "Santo di Patria," a difficult aria from Verdi's Attila. The critic above cited says:

Her voice is a mezzo soprano of extraordinary compass, flexibility, and power. It has all the brilliancy of the highest finish, but, unlike such voices in general, it is full of feeling—not a cold glitter, like that of a diamond. Possessing perfect mechanical execution, yet she never loses sight of the sentiment,—every trill, every swell, every flying leap among the octaves, each modulation of her exquisitely finished tones, is warm with feeling and instinct with inspiration. She uses her voice not to astonish and dazzle, but to give expression to the poetry.

If Miss Magnuson has a fault, it is one which is rather the excess of a virtue. Her body seems so finely harmonized and sympathetic with her mind, that involuntarily she accompanies her singing with a species of dramatic action, which, while its existence should not be discouraged, should be repressed and held under rigid control. A little attention to facial expression, and one or two others of these sympathetic physical correspondences, would greatly enhance the pleasure one enjoys from her singing.

Another rhapsodizes more at length, saying among other things:

She not only sings, but, in our opinion, she lives and breathes the very atmosphere of the spirit of the song itself. She is a natural born tragedienne, and, from the little we heard her Friday night, we should judge that she must have devoted herself mostly to the study of the opera seria, where undoubtedly she will attain the highest position, and pluck her choicest laurels, should she devote herself to it.

We thank Miss M. for showing to our musical people who deprecate dramatic gesticulation in singing, that to sing an opera piece successfully, even in the concert room, one has no need of standing statue-like before an audience like the trembling school girl on examination day, forgetting the spirit of her lesson, but merely repeating the words committed to heart. It was refreshing to see the graceful and impassioned soprano sweep away mistaken notions of concert-goers by her true conception of the aria as well as by the expression of her face on which the meaning of every word could almost be read.

Her enunciation of the Italian is almost faultless, and were we to meet her without knowing her to be American-born, we would take her for a Florentine. As to her voice, every one who heard her will agree with us that a richer and more melodious voice never greeted a Chicago audience. To judge from her middle notes, we would call her a mezzo soprano, but even while we speculate on this, she startles us with the rich, deep notes of a D'Angri, and then again all at once she ascends into the regions of La Grange, though not possessing, as yet, the exquisite flexibility and finish of the latter while in her palmiest days. With continued industry and practice, Miss M. may soon as readily manage and control the bird-like warblings of the wonderful Adelina Patti, as she does now excel her in the richness and sympathetic expression of voice. Her trills were smooth and showed excellent schooling.

Philadelphians are severe on Maretzek's orchestra, having the memory of that of Carl Anschütz's German Opera still fresh in their minds. Vestvali was at the Louisville theatre last week.—Opera troupes are multiplying; we read of a fourth that is about to venture out here in the cold, before the third (Gran's) is as yet safely housed; a little paper in New York, called The Stage, has the announcement, thus:

OFFICIAL.—Mr. B. Ullman is at present giving concerts and operatic performances in the Royal Theatre, Amsterdam, Holland, with Miss Carlotta Patti, and will shortly arrive in this country with a new and well selected troupe of lyric artists.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Save our Flag. Song and Chorus. L. S. Morris. 25

Adds another to the many good patriotic songs in use. Strong and manly, and good for the heart as for the voice.

Banner of the Sea. Song and Chorus. B. Covert, 25

Spirited song in praise of the navy and marine. The "men of the sea" have not been noticed as much, by song writers, as the blue coats on land. This is a good one for them.

Slumber Song. (Schlummer lied). W. Taubert. 25

A charming little cradle song, which mothers who can sing should not fail to procure. Its little stories succeed each other so quietly and dreamily, that any child may be expected to slumber at the end of the last verse.

Ave Maria. Gounod. 21

Gounod's masterly rendering of the Faust music brings other works into notice: among them this sweet and classical song.

La danza d' Amore. (Dance of Love). Lucatoni 35

One of the most fascinating songs. The music is in waltz time, and the expression delicate. It has both Italian and English words, and must become popular as a parlor and concert song.

Past and Present. Song. John Barnett. 21

Good song by a composer well known.

Instrumental Music.

Il mio tesoro. (Don Giovanni), Operatic Tit-bits.

C. Grobe. 40

Mr. Grobe has done a good service, in rendering almost every known melody accessible to those who cannot play difficult music. We have here a "treasure" from Mozart's opera.

Sally come up. Dance. 25

One of the simplest pieces that could be put together, pleasing, and excellent for learners.

Gertrude Galop. W. J. Dietrich. 25

Brilliant and not difficult.

March du Crociato. F. Burgmüller. 30

A fine march of medium difficulty.

Homeward Waltz. J. S. Drake. 50

A work of considerable power and energy.

Zamora Waltz. J. Strauss. 50

Very brilliant, of course, but with a more marked and flowing melody, perhaps, than the average of Strauss's compositions.

Books.

OPERATIC PEARLS.—A Book of Songs, Duets, and Trios, from Favorite Operas With English, French, and Italian words.

Opera in the Family Hapsburg.

So Italian opera alone was known at the Court of Leopold, and in this and in the ballets the highest nobility and even members of the imperial family were often actors in the private performances of the palace. B—r furnishes a list, which he was unable to make complete, as access to certain records was denied him, of such imperial and noble appearances upon the stage.

1661, May 9.—Il Cico Crescente, in tre Intermezzi, per Il Pastor Fido, music by Bertali. This was given in the park at Laxenburg, near Vienna, on the birthday of Leopold, as introduction to a ballet, in which Carl Joseph, the Emperor's brother, a boy of twelve years, danced.

A performance, Jan. 24, 1667, affords a peep at the splendor of the young monarch's amusements. The occasion was his marriage (on the 12th December previous) with the unmusical daughter of Philip IV. of Spain, his first wife. The piece was "La Contesa dell' aria e dell' acqua, festa a cavallo," by Francesco Sbarra, with an equestrian ballet by Carducci, Equerry called from Florence, the operatic music by Bertali, the ballet music by Schmelzer, the whole under direction of the imperial chief Equerry, Count Dietrichstein.

There being no building in which this spectacle could be exhibited, an architect—Passetti—was called to Vienna from Italy, who put up in the principal palace court a temporary structure, sixty feet high, supported on stone columns and arches, with three grand portals and spacious enough for the 5000 spectators, "came from all lands" to witness the performances.

The marvellously poetic idea, which found local habitation in Senor Sbarra's production was this: the two elements Air and Water have a strife (Contesa) as to which has the right to engender the pearl—Margaret, the royal bride—and call their brother (or sister, I do not know which) elements, Earth and Fire, to their aid. At first the quarrel is confined to words with musical accompaniment, but at last they seize their weapons and smite each other hip and thigh,—as Samson did the Philistines, before going to dwell upon the rock Etam—until the Gods and the Emperor interfere and put an end to the contest. This ballet was produced by the nobility with fabulous magnificence. There are described in the text book—still preserved—twelve equestrian ballet figures, which the Emperor led in person. Carl, Duke of Lorraine, was the Air; his ally, Fire, was acted by Count Raimund Montecucoli; Water appeared in the person of the Palatine Count Philip v. Sulzbach, and Count Dietrichstein was Earth. The number of "acting and singing performers" was 38.

Margaret returned to the elements only six years after, dying March 23, 1673; but Leopold comforted himself with the musical Claudia Felicitas on the 15th October following.

1667, June 9. "Vero amore fa soave ogni fatic

ca," text and music by Draghi, was an introduction "ad un nobilissimo ballo di 12 Dame etiope"; which is all the information I have upon this work.

1669, Feb. 16. "Chi più sa manca l'intende," opera in three acts with ballet, music by Draghi. The symphonies and ritornels were by Leopold, who also played the harpsichord part throughout the performance. The names Waldstein—of the famous Wallenstein race—and Mansfeld appear in the list of singers, that of Chilomonseck (queer Italian for Kielmansegg) as 2nd violin. The two unmarried archduchesses, sisters of the Emperor, danced the ballet, to Schmelzer's music.

Same year, Nov. 18. "Atalante," drama for music in 3 acts, text by Minato, music by Draghi, performed at the birthday festival of the Emperor's stepmother, Eleonore. At the close, ballet danced by her stepdaughters, archduchesses Maria and Eleonore.

1670, May 9. "Leonida in Tegea," drama with ballet, text and music as above, with an air in the 3d act by Leopold, on whose birthday festival the performance took place. Actors and singers were the higher nobility.

1670, Nov. 18. "La casta Penelope," musical drama in three acts with ballet; text and music, Minato, and Draghi and Schmelzer; on the birthday of the dowager Empress. The archduchess Eleonore was now deceased, but Maria as Virtue, and four ladies of honor as assistant Virtues, danced the ballet in the temple of Virtue.

1671, June. The young Counts Königseck and Wallenstein danced a Sarabande, music by Schmelzer, in honor of the Emperor's birthday.

1671, Nov. 9. "Cidippe," musical drama, 3 acts, and ballet, by Minato and Draghi, with airs by Leopold; on the Empress mother's birthday. At the close, archduchess Maria and four ladies of honor represented Diana and nymphs.

1672, Feb. 21. "Sulpitia," musical drama and ballet by Minato, Draghi and Schmelzer, on the name-day of the dowager. Archduchess Maria and ladies of the Court represented this time Glory and the heroic virtues.

1672, Feb. 2. "La Tesselonica," musical drama, 3 acts, and ballet, by Minato, Draghi and Schmelzer, on the Dowager's birthday; at the close archduchess Maria, Marchesa Trivulzia and four young Countesses performed "Dance of happiness."

1673, Carneval. "Artemisia," 3 acts, and 3 ballets, text by Minato, performed by the ladies of the court on the private stage as fast-night amusement.

1674, Nov. 10. "La nascita di Minerva," festive piece with ballet, by Minato and Draghi, on the Dowager's birthday, on the private stage. Archduchess Maria and 5 court ladies danced a representation of "Cheerfulness."

1676, June 9. "Il Seleuco," musical drama, with ballet, on the Emperor's birthday. The ballet was "The dance of the Morning Star ten early stars outshining," by the archduchess Maria Antonia and ten ladies of the court.

1676, Nov. 22. "Lo Specchio," a cantata for 5 voices, by Minato and Draghi, sung by "an Archduchess" and 4 Countesses.

1677, Nov. 18. "Rodogone," musical drama, 3 acts, with ballet by Minato and Draghi, performed in the private theatre by the nobility on the Empress mother's birthday. The archduchess Maria Anna with five ladies danced a representation of "Shrewdness" (Klugheit).

1680, Nov. 15. The Court was in Linz. In honor of the name-day of the Emperor, the archduchess Maria Josepha and six ladies of the court danced a ballet, music by Schmelzer.

1680, Nov. 24. Prince Louis of Baden and gentlemen of the Court performed a ballet, "Gli Fentoni," music by Schmelzer.

1682, Carneval. An introduction, vocal piece, text by Minato, and a gipsy ballet, music by Pederzuoli, performed by the King of Poland, the Duke of Lorraine, and the Empress mother's ladies.

1682, June 9. "Il sogno delle Grazie," introduction to a ballet by Minato and Draghi. On the birthday of the Emperor at Laxenburg, performed by archduke Joseph, archduchess Maria Antonia and ladies of the court.

1684, Carneval. "Finto Astrologo," with a comedy and ballet, by Minato and Draghi, performed by the nobility.

1685. "The recreations of the female slaves in Samia," an interlude, with German and Italian text by turns, music by Emperor Leopold, and performed by the Empress mother's ladies.

1685, Carneval. "Scherzo musicale," in the "manner of a scenic representation;" Minato and Pederzuoli, "chapelmaster of the Empress," performed by the ladies of the Empress.

1685, Carneval. "Amftrione," prologue, by Minato and Draghi, performed by the Emperor's chamberlains.

1686, Carneval. Three pieces are given in B—r's list. "Musica per una festa," by Minato and Pederzuoli, performed by archduchess Maria Anna, the Elector Palatine, with ladies and gentlemen of the Court.

Music to a "Comedia" of the "noble ladies of the Court," with alternate German and Italian text, by the Emperor Leopold.

"Il ritorno di Teseo dal Labarinto di Creta," introduction to a ballet, by Minato and Draghi; performed by the Elector of Bavaria and ladies of the Court, after Leopold's return from a campaign.

1688, Nov. 15. "Il Silenzio d' Harpocrate," musical drama, 3 acts, text and music by Draghi, on the Emperor's name-day, performed by the nobility.

Thus we have reached the date of the English Revolution, and the final expulsion of the Stuarts; and nothing is more natural than to compare the elegant and chaste amusements of the imperial family at Vienna with those of the royal family of England, during the period we have had in review. The former are purely æsthetic—poetry, music and the dance combine to do honor to the mother or brother, the Empress or Emperor, in illustrating virtue or representing pure subjects from ancient mythology—the fashion of that age. But he, who has had occasion to study the dramatic literature fostered by Charles II. or his brother and successor James, knows what a perfect moral cloaca the English stage was; and not only what filth was uttered in public by actresses, but what filth was written by women themselves for public utterance. I challenge the production of a loose expression in all these works still preserved in the imperial dramatic archives in Vienna. That in the popular German drama of that age there is much which could not now be revived is certain; but it is chaste in comparison with the contemporaneous English drama, and its humor of that kind does not measure its success by the degree of its filth and obscenity.

1689, Carneval. A ballet, music by Schmelzer, danced by the Queen of Poland and other ladies of Court. Airs by the Duke of Lorraine.

1689, Nov. 15. "L'Harpocrate" again, performed by the nobility on the Emperor's name-day. Probably the text was re-written, as Minato's name appears.

1690, June 9. "Scipio conservatore di Roma," musical drama, 1 act; performed on the Emperor's birthday, by the nobility.

1692, Carneval. "La chimera," fantastic drama, 3 acts, by Minato and Draghi, performed by the nobility.

In this piece were ten "singing persons," among whom were:

Cottis, a lunatic of various fantasies.—Count Zernini.

Acce, a female zany of various follies.—Franz Zernini.

Hipparcho, an astrologer.—Count Waldstein.

Arepsia, in love, but not believing any thing her lover says.—fräulein Countess Waldstein, &c.

The first ballet was of fishermen, danced by six nobles; the second of herb-women, by seven countesses; the third of negroes, by four nobles, and as many women of high rank.

1690. (3?) The first fruits of virtue exhibited in young Cato of Utica. This was a drama in German, but with music and dances. Of the twelve performers, six were children of the Emperor.

Cato—Joseph, aged 15.

Cepio—Carl, in his 7th year.

Portia—Elizabeth, in her 13th year.

Livia—Marianua, in her 10th year.

Julia—Therese, in her 9th year.

Cornelia—Josefa, 6 years old.

1695. Festival music composed by the Emperor, and performed by the archduchesses.

1697, Carneval. "Musica per la Comedia," German, Italian and French text alternately, music by the Emperor; performers the archduchesses and ladies.

1697, Nov. "Sulpitia" again, but with alterations, and airs by the Emperor, new ballets with music by Hoffer, on occasion of Leopold's name-day.

1697, Carneval. Musical interlude, by Minato and Draghi, "Se sia più giovevole la fortuna o il merito?" sung by four ladies. "Confidenza, Speranza, Prudenza, Avertenza."

1698. "L'Amazona Corsara," musical drama, 3 acts; music by Badia, performed by the nobility.

1699, Feb. 28. "Imeneo trionfante," Serenata, music by Badia.

This "Triumph of Hymen" was produced upon occasion of the marriage of archduke Joseph, in the large court of the imperial palace. Thirteen large open-coaches formed a procession, which, entering the court, drove round and came to a stand in a circle, when the Serenata was performed. Three of these vehicles were very magnificent; the central one conveyed Hymen, Jupiter, Hercules, Juno, Hope, a Good Genius, Youth, Pleasure, Union, and a number of Athenian virgins, who were set at liberty by Hymen. [Why? Because, Joseph having taken a wife, they were free to seek husbands?] In the carriage on the right were Apollo, the 17th Century (!) Time, Joy, Leda, Diana, and the four Continents, surrounded by the most celebrated poets [representatives] crowned with garlands. On the left rode Venus and the Graces, Cupid, Mars, Bacchus and Mercury with Tritons and Nereids. The other ten carriages were full of gods and goddesses, (the singers and orchestra).

Here I would suggest that the term "Serenata," as applied to such works as Handel's "Acis and Galatea," may well have had its origin in performances of this kind; for the "Serenata" may be called a short opera, to be performed in costume but without action, precisely the kind of performance, which suited a stage consisting of coaches, in an open court for the theatre. Nor was the Serenata, thus understood, any novelty in Vienna. B—r cites a work, of date 1641, to the following effect:

"Next day there was a magnificent procession; for first came six triumphal cars in the palace court, drawn by small, white ponies, also by bucks and unicorns; on each splendid music, and thereby also trumpets, drums and other instruments were played. Then came Neptune with twelve whales, in which many rustic pipes (? Schalmeien) were heard. Farther there appeared a garden with flowers and fountains, with Venus, and four mountains, with noble music and in splendid array. The last mountain and procession came to a stop before the windows of her Majesty, and a comedy was performed."

1699, Nov. 15. "Il Sole; La Fenice, Al Tempo, Musica di Camera." Text by Cupeda, music by Badia; performed on their father's nameday by "Joseph and his brethren," the archdukes and archduchesses, and gentlemen and ladies of the Court.

1700, Feb. 28. A Prologue to the opera "Il Demetrio," performed by Joseph and his wife, and his sisters, the archduchesses.

It would seem that Leopold's daughters were singers, not dancers like his sisters.

1700. "Diana rappacificata con Venere e con Amore," musical drama, music by Badia, on the birthday of Joseph's Queen, performed by the nobles with some of the actors of the court theatre.

This closes B—r's list of these private and family performances during the life of Leopold I.

Professor Wylde's first Lecture at Gresham College.

From the London Musical World, Dec. 5.

In selecting the theme or thesis of the course of lectures I am about to deliver (the first since my appointment to the office of Lecturer on Music at this time honored College), I have considered well how it is most in my power to carry out the intentions of its noble founder in establishing these lectureships.

In the absence of any "lex scripta," which would have, perhaps, fettered any lecturer and have cramped his remarks within the bounds set to art and science in days gone by, I think some kind of conjecture can be formed as to the views and wishes of one so enlightened as Sir Thomas Gresham, could he now "viva voce" supply the wanting instructions.

In some cases where there is no "lex scripta" for guide and direction, recourse is had to the "lex non scripta" (i. e., tradition.

But art and science progress so rapidly that the traditional instructions of the founder, were they adhered to, would (perhaps, equally as well as written), rob his gift in the present time of the value and use to which it might be applied.

Reading and expounding certain books in Bœthius was, in the time of Sir Thomas Gresham, regarded as the proper course of study for musical university degrees, and it is not improbable that, had any instructions been left by the founder, they would have insisted on the teaching and expounding of these works, which would not have proved very edifying to a general audience.

Being free, therefore, to lecture on any subject connected with music, I intend, bearing in mind the acquirements of the age, to use the privileges of the office to which I am appointed, to discourse on subjects belonging to music as an art and science, according to our views at the present time, in such a manner as may, I trust, be of benefit to those who desire instruction as well as musical recreation. I cannot hope to surpass in style and diction the many learned men who have lectured within these walls, but, as I am one of the few musicians by education who have held the appointment, it is possible the subject of my discourses may be more directly in consonance with the views of the founder.

I find on referring to the list of Professors at this College, that only four out of sixteen who occupied the chair have been acknowledged musicians; the others have been for the most part learned men, such as Dr. Richard Knight, a celebrated physician of his time, and a voluminous writer on every subject except that to which he was appointed in this College, viz., music; Sir Thomas Baynes, the "Fidus Achates" of Sir John Finch, the brother of the famous Heneage Finch, afterwards Earl of Nottingham; the Rev. Dr. Shippen, Principal of Brasenose College, Oxford, &c., &c., &c.—all men doubtless able from their varied accomplishments to lecture on any theme, but less formed on that account to discourse on theoretical subjects. I would here take the opportunity of referring with regret to the loss which not only this College but the musical profession has sustained by the death of the late occupant of this office, one of the few real musicians who have held it. The precept "De mortuis nil nisi bonum," is one which leads men to eulogize those who have passed away from among us, whether they deserved it or not, according to our standard of excellence; but, it is not in conventional terms that I would speak "in memoriam" of the late Professor Edward Taylor. Nothing which I can say, I am aware, will add to the reputation he has left behind him, but I would record in this place (the scene of some of his labors) that the respect shown him whilst amongst us will cling to his memory now that he is departed, and that his name will continue to be held in respect by those who knew him in his professional capacity and private life.

I will now say some few words about the means by which these lectures may be made popular as well as instructive. A discourse on music, unrelieved by examples or illustrations, and not containing anything beyond a mere disquisition, would, I feel, very soon become uninteresting and wearisome. I wish, however, to make these lectures somewhat different from the kind generally delivered at Literary and Scientific Institutions. The object of most institutions in giving Lectures on Music appears to be to get up a concert, which for the most part consists of music totally unfitted to improve the taste. The programme is generally interspersed with anecdotes of composers, their habits and modes of living, in fact, anything likely to amuse and attract a paying public. Now, anecdotes and amusing stories are all very well in their place; but they do not convey instruction, nor, with few exceptions, do the lives of the "sons of song," poetic or musical, contribute any very instructive examples. Geniuses are often very erratic in their worldly proceedings. Extraordinary mental capability for doing one thing well is often accompanied by a "want of judgment" in other things, and by little self-control. But the "eccentricities" of great poets and great musicians should be forgotten, unless introduced in "the works" which they have left behind them, and certainly ought not to be "raked up" as bits of "scandal" and amusement.

Lectures on music consisting of anecdotes and biographical notices have no more to do with instruction in the art than with science, under which name music is allowed to enter into the curriculum of Literary and Scientific Institutions.

Lectures of this kind at all events ought not to be admitted within these walls; here there are no coffers to fill; Art, therefore, need not be lowered for that purpose, but kept upon its high pedestal. If acquaintance is to be made with Art, let it be by exaltation of its admirers, not by bringing it down to a degrading level. The love of a pure and elevated style of Art is not, as it were, indigenous in the mind; it comes by study and reflection, and forms the crowning pinnacle of our civilization. For those engaged in daily occupation, it is not easy to find time to study more than that which brings immediate advantage; it is not easy to learn to appreciate the beautiful in Art. But, I say, let all the time at our disposal be employed in the endeavour to acquire a taste, which, in any art, the more it is cultivated the greater is the pleasure derivable from it. I intend to let the illustrations with which I furnish you be such, as will, I trust, promote this object, as well as illustrate my remarks.

My lecture this evening is on "Form" in musical composition.

The art of composing music is an imitative art; all the great composers owe more or less to their predecessors, although in almost all their works individuality and originality are apparent.

Some are of opinion that the faculty of composing music is a gift bestowed by nature, similar to a good voice, or correct ear: that composers owe everything to what is called genius; that writing in moments of inspiration they produce what is beautiful intuitively, without design, except so far as the will is concerned, and without labor, except as far as it is occasioned by transmitting the ideas received.

Now, I am not going to deny that nature endows some people with a faculty which enables them to become musical composers and withholds that faculty altogether from others. I am not going to deny that musical composers, as well as those otherwise gifted, do sometimes appear to be under some extraordinary influence, which enables them to produce (with apparently little trouble or mental exertion), the sublime and beautiful in a form never before presented, as if it had been revealed to them.

To deny this is to deny the possession of genius at all, and to say that where mental capacities are equal, the same result ensues. No, what I desire to show is, that conceptions of the beautiful are only of use to the patient "Art laborer," to the imitator of the acknowledged forms of musical art, to the thoughtful designer and constructor who designs and constructs after models of known excellence, guided by a taste formed upon the study of what his predecessors had done, and impelled by a sentiment of the mind to give expression to that craving for the new and beautiful, which, like a spirit within him, permits no rest until it has attained it or exhausted itself in the attempt.

Suppose a figure of supernatural beauty presented itself to an accomplished painter or sculptor in a trance; that he had a revelation of what real beauty in form is; his perfected skill might enable him to produce an embodiment of the beautiful far above any imaginative conception. But of what avail would such a vision be to the comparative unskilled artist? Would not his unpracticed hand fail in power to delineate that which he has seen? And would not his attempt at expression be marked by signs of his own unskilfulness, and have no similarity with the perfect form presented to him? For all purposes of reproduction, he might as well have not seen the vision, and he could no more fix the beautiful figure in enduring colors or material than the early philosophers could the fleeting image in the Camera, before the discovery of photography.

Now, conceptions of the beautiful in music doubtless are not restricted to great creators. Visions of the beautiful may have filled the minds of very unskilled musicians; but if the skill have been wanting to form the outline of its embodiment; if the imitative art be deficient; if the manipulatory power fail; if fettered by the trammels of the art, overwhelmed by its difficulties, the mind lose the impression it received and the conception has been realized, of what use has such a vision or conception been to the musician? For all purposes of communicating pleasure to others, that susceptible musician may as well never have existed; his visions are those which may have wrapt his own soul in ecstasy, but not have contributed to the transport of any other. We have many musicians of this kind. I could name many works, in which, amidst a chaos of ideas and ill constructed forms, a feeling of the beautiful is discoverable, and the composers of which, better art, more acute observation and study of acknowledged masterpieces might have enabled to take rank far above their present condition, and perhaps have urged on to accomplish things destined to enduring fame.

Believe me then, there is no mystery in musical composition; it results from a study of form, and is an art that can be imparted like all other arts; and the power of acquirement varies, as well as all other powers of the human mind in different people; but the conception of the "beautiful," the longing desire and cravings of the soul for that which is unseen, for a taste of that true beauty of which it is only allowed occasional glimpses: this power and these emotions cannot be communicated. Whence they proceed and how they arise is as unintelligible as any other problem of the Psychologists, and will ever remain so; consequently Art cannot make a poet-musician, but Art can make the pen ready to depict the beautiful, when it presents itself to his imaginative faculties, and he feels desire to give expression to those emotions and sentiments which, as they are not always active within him, are pure inspirations or revelations of the beautiful.

I have said the art of composing music is an imitative art, but the imitation practised is not like that in the sister arts of Painting and Sculpture. In sculpture, the artist seeks to represent or imitate in marble well known and admired forms and features, or forms and figures of such beautiful properties as seldom or never are found existing in one natural object, but which by imitating the separate beauties of many, he unites into one form of more than ordinary beauty. In painting, the imitation of nature is not so direct; the subject to be represented is idealized and the effect of reality is produced, not by an exact copy of nature, but by that representation of it which cheats the imaginative faculties into a belief that what is represented to the eye is a reality, not a delusion. In both arts, however, the imitation practised is that of nature. Now, in musical compositions by the great masters, there is neither a direct nor idealized representation of nature practised, (except in some few exceptional cases, such as in Beethoven's Pastoral symphony, where the notes of the quail, nightingale and thrush are introduced); but the imitation is confined to that of conventional forms of construction and design, which have grown up from very meagre outlines to their present elaborate dimensions. Unity and propriety of form are two especial attributes of the beautiful. In imitating conventional forms of construction and design these attributes are ensured; hence the desirability of attaining excellence in the imitative branch of the art.

The Monster Organ.

From the Washington Star.

We reprint from a Washington contemporary the following admirable and valuable addition to the literature of musical criticism:

Boston has been greatly excited lately over the inauguration at the Music Hall in that city, of the largest organ in the world, built expressly for "the hub" by Welcher, of Wurtemberg.

The pressure of war news has prevented us heretofore from noticing the organ of organs in appropriate terms, but we now propose to give the readers of the Star some idea of the powers of the "great instrument." We make up our account from the Boston papers and magazines, taking the precaution, of course, to prune down their partial and doubtless high-colored statements to the bounds of credibility.

This monster organ, then, is equal in power to a choir of six thousand throats. Its longest wind-pipes are two hundred and thirty-five feet in length, (requiring the erection of a tower for their special accommodation), and a full sized man can crawl readily through its finest tubes. Eight hundred and ninety stops produce the various changes and combinations of which its immense orchestra is capable. Like all instruments of its class, it contains several distinct systems of pipes, commonly spoken of as separate organs, and capable of being played alone or in connection with each other. Four manuals or hand keyboards, and two pedals or foot keyboards, command these several systems — the solo organ, the choir organ, the swell organ and the great organ, and forte pedal organ.

Dr. Holmes (O. W.) says it was at first proposed to move the sixty-five pairs of bellows, designed to fill the monster instrument, by water-power derived from the Cochituate reservoirs, but it has been found more convenient to substitute two nine-horse power self-regulating Ericsson engines as motive power. Dr. Holmes states that these engines keep an even stroke and work admirably. He adds that no description will do justice to this stupendous instrument.

It requires six able-bodied organists to manipulate this immense musical machine; and those engaged at the inauguration at the Boston Music Hall were J. K. Paine, organist of West Church, Boston; Eugene Thayer, of Worcester; B. J. Lang, of the Old South Church; Dr. Tuckerman, of St. Paul's Church; J. H. Willcox, of the Church of the Immaculate Conception; and G. W. Morgan, of Grace Church, New York. They were selected with reference to avoidupois as well as musical qualifications, their weight ranging as follows:

Paine,	Lbs.
Thayer,	180
Lang,	200
Tuckerman,	175
Willcox,	215
Morgan,	192
	245
Total.	1,225

When in the grand crescendo passages these six organists rose simultaneously from their seats, and receded a couple of paces, rushed forward in line, throwing their collective weight of over twelve hundred pounds upon the pedals, the musical explosion — for by no other name can it be designated — was terribly grand.

Through inadvertence the roof trap-doors of the Music Hall had not been raised, and the first effect of this great detonation of sound was to lift the heavy tin roof from the wall sockets some fifteen feet into the air, holding it suspended there until the immense volume of sound had forced a passage beneath it.

It is proposed to avert similar accidents by placing an immense sound-escape chimney over the Music Hall, after the style of the draught chimney to a furnace; but Dr. Holmes, who has given much attention to acoustics, suggests, perhaps not altogether seriously, that the condensed sound thus vented may fall upon the city in solid chunks, doing damage.

Outside the building the effects were quite as remarkable. It was noticed that the spires of the different churches in the city vibrated over an area of several degrees, the weather-vanes upon them dipping and oscillating in the most singular manner, from the same cause. The walls of houses throughout the city were sensibly shaken, furniture displaced, &c., causing many timid persons to rush to the street, thinking it an earthquake.

In the towns immediately adjoining Boston the concussion was also supposed to be an earthquake. At Newburyport it was thought that the sound indicated a heavy naval engagement off Boston Harbor. At Salem a jarring concussion and report was experienced, resembling in sound a heavy burden train passing over a trestle work bridge. At Jamaica Plain it was thought to proceed from a thunder storm in the direction of Boston, and, curiously enough, the barometer fell several degrees at that point; and the same fact was noticed at Natick, Lynn, and as far distant as Taunton.

The water receded from Boston harbor in a wave of considerable magnitude, and in its retrograde and return swamped, stranded and keeled over several vessels, doing no little damage to the commercial interests.

Gold fish in globes, and fish of all kinds in aquaria, were instantly killed; and what, for a time, was unexplainable, was the fact that they sank immediately, until it was ascertained by Dr. Holmes that their bladders had been burst by the concussion; when, of course, being minus their floating apparatus, they went down like lead. Dr. Holmes states also the remarkable fact that numerous dead bodies of drowned persons were brought to the surface in the harbor and in Charles River by the same concussion. A singular effect was produced by the pulsation of sound from the crescendo detonation passing along the telegraph lines from Boston in various directions, and which travelled a distance of from one hundred and fifty to two hundred miles over some wires, or until considerable bodies of running water were encountered, over which, for some unexplainable cause in acoustics, the Eolian tone—which is described as a wild, uncanny wail—would in no instance pass. Dr. Holmes humorously notes that the same fact is recorded of witches—i. e., that they cannot pass over streams of running water! Another curious feature of this phenomenon was the fact that musical tones swelled and contracted in regular crescendos and diminuendos at equal intervals along the wires. Thus at Worcester, which is forty-five miles from Boston, the sound was barely perceptible, while at Springfield, just double the distance, the tone approached to a shriek in volume.

Dr. Holmes thus explains this interesting fact. It is well known among musicians that the vibrations upon the strings of a violin, harp or any stringed instrument, do not take the shape of a single pulsation with its maximum expansion at the centre of the string, but are divided along the string, in numerous smaller pulsations or crescendos, crossing each other at regular diminuendo intervals, at which latter points the string is nearly or quite motionless. The knowledge of this curious law of vibration readily affords a solution, says Dr. Holmes, to the mystery of the telegraphic crescendo freaks noticed.

Dr. Holmes, who, in company with Mayor Lincoln, a delegation of the Boston city council, and a body of leading savans of the Harvard persuasion, made an interesting pedestrian tour through some eight or ten miles of the main pipes of the monster organ before it was set up, has written a graphic description of the trip, and of the organ as a whole. The party found no difficulty in walking quite erect through at least six miles of the major pipes, and got through the smaller Eolian tubes quite comfortably on their hands and knees. His description of the great instrument has appeared in book form under the apropos title of "Soundings from the Atlantic."

Joseph Mayseder.

Joseph Mayseder was born on the 26th October, 1789, and died on the 21st November 1863.† He was a musical and characteristic original, whose peculiarities cannot well be understood, except by those who scanned him very nearly indeed—a characteristic original, looking so simply and unaffectedly into the world that people fancied that they had summed him up at the first glance—and yet, on the other hand, presenting so many contradictions in his qualities as a man and as an artist, that the observer could not deny he stood before an unsolved psychological riddle. Whoever saw the unpretending old gentleman, without knowing him, would have taken him for an ordinary member of the honorable guild of tailors or grocers. Whoever spoke to him, and in answer to every thing that was said, received an answer hardly any thing beyond a friendly and assenting smile, or the ever-ready assurance, "Yes, yes, I thought so: that is exactly my opinion," must have considered him as a perfectly insignificant personage; and whoever witnessed his nervousness in his social and artistic relations, must certainly have put him down as the arch-representative of Viennese musical snobism.

Immediately, however, the quiet, nervous little man had his instrument in his hands, immediately the clear tone of his violin was heard, people forgot the man to think only of the artist, who had, perhaps, now and then, a little touch of old Vienna about him, it is true, but who, notwithstanding, was a first-class violinist, whose performances, full-toned, harmonious, rounded and easy, like all that is artistically perfect, delighted his eagerly attentive hearers.

Mayseder's tone was not particularly great, but it was full, round, and as clear as a bell, while his manual skill was marked by irreproachable neatness, and that unfailing certainty which executes without a single fault all it has once undertaken, because it never undertakes any thing that it is not convinced it can perform. His conception was not alone always simple, unaffected, natural, and free from aught like mannerism, but interpreted with a noble fervor, and inspired with an inimitable grace, which, to judge from Mayseder's appearance and behavior, no one would have supposed he possessed.

Mayseder's sphere of action was never extended beyond the Austrian frontier—scarcely, indeed, beyond the ramparts of Vienna. In that capital, however, his efforts were fully appreciated and unquestioned. At the Vienna Congress, and even more during the period from 1820 to 1830, he frequently appeared as a concert-player, sometimes alone, and sometimes with the popular violoncellist Merk, or with the well-known virtuoso on the guitar, Giuliani. At that epoch he composed a large number of gracefully brilliant solo-pieces, trios, quartets with the piano, variations, serenades, etc. During the latter half of his life, he withdrew more and more nervously from publicity, playing as a rule, only as first violin in the Imperial orchestra, as soloist in operas and ballets, and as a quartet-performer in private circles. As a quartetist, he had, under Schuppanzigh's guidance, acquired, at an early age, a pure, elevated style, which, combined with his natural artistic qualities, adapted him, above all, for executing in perfection the quartets of Haydn. In this capacity, he was, and ever will be, a model for all who heard him. Next came his rendering of his own works, as well as those of Spohr, Mozart, and the "first" Beethoven. For the "later" Beethoven he wanted grandeur and passion, and sometimes the true dash of expression, and for the "latest" Beethoven inclination and comprehension besides. Of modern composers, he played Mendelssohn, though he was not especially fond of that master; he was not the man to introduce new works. His rendering of old compositions, above all of Haydn's, as we have already mentioned, produced an agreeable, a refreshing, and an artistically-purifying impression.

With Mayseder, consequently, there has sunk into the grave a specimen of true artistic worth, and, at the same time, a portion of that old Vienna, partly genial, and partly snobbish, which now will probably form a portion of History, for it will hardly ever be resuscitated in a similar shape. May, however, all that was good and beautiful done by these individual representatives of the art of old Vienna be preserved in our words and our writings, as well as in the memory of all lovers of art, as a valuable legacy, so that it may still exert its influence beyond the grave, encouraging, fructifying, and purifying, as a model to be imitated, as a symbol of genuine style, and as the fundamental thought of that serious training which the present generation so greatly needs.

Berlioz's New Opera, "Les Troyens."

"Spiridon," in a letter to the Evening Gazette, translates several opinions; among others this:

Here are the criticisms of Mons. d'Ortigue: "Is it not a strange thing that a musician who has been classed for five-and-twenty years, and who, it must be confessed, proclaimed himself five-and-twenty years ago among the romantic and fantaisistes composers, should have selected for his definite work, a subject borrowed from the pure, classical order? There are in Mons. Berlioz's mind two great objects, which have been for him the two great sources at which he has alternately drawn the inspirations of his art. In his earlier manhood he became possessed of a sincere passion for Shakespeare, whom nobody understands and has more completely at the finger's ends. But there remained in his breast of the school studies of his youth a scarcely inferior passion for Virgil, whom he knows by heart. So much for his poetical masters. As for his musical masters, we may, perhaps, find here the analogy of the same contrasts. Every body knows Mons. Berlioz's tendencies and predilections, and he does not conceal them. To an ardent admiration for Beethoven and Weber, in instrumental music, who represent, or who formerly represented, in his opinion, modern and romantic musical genius, he joins a not less ardent admiration for Gluck and for Spontini in lyrical music, and they represent in his opinion antique and classical musical genius. I know Mons. Berlioz thoroughly. An artist, a musician, a critic, a judge of his powers cannot misprize the immense value of men like J. S. Bach, Haydn, Mozart and Rossini. I name these only. He admires them, but this admiration evidently occupies in Mons. Berlioz's mind a secondary rank only; it is, so to say, an intellectual admiration, which, except certain works or certain pieces of these authors which spontaneously excite his sympathetic fibres, does not rise above an intellectual imagination, but leaves his imagination and heart calm; while for Gluck, Spontini, Beethoven and Weber, this admiration is almost always raised to enthusiasm, although I hasten to say, it is always the result of reflection and of criticism. Such is Mons. Berlioz's nature. . . . Mons. Berlioz has not considered whether an antique subject suited well with our contemporary theatrical tastes and usages; nor whether the subject of Aeneas and Dido, which, notwithstanding repeated attempts, has never hitherto been successful on the stage, offered real chances of success. No, he has not reckoned all these things. He felt that this picture of Dido's loves and misfortunes might inspire the musician that is in him and he wrote his 'book.' . . . I do not mean to pretend that Les Troyens is a work without fault. It contains real, nay, considerable faults. The recitatives and the airs are too often confounded together in it; the airs in it wear the mien of the recitative and reciprocally; in both the accompaniment is sometimes overloaded; the abruptness and harshness of some modulations may be noticed; we may point out a phraseology which is sometimes laborious and inverted, and want of connection between the periods of a piece; we expect in vain a transition which isolates these periods while at the same time it connects them together; we may regret the accumulation of accords on measures which require only one, so that the ear, disconcerted, loses the sentiment of tonality, feels the clue escape from it, and this clue would often be a single note, one holding note. We could desire more simplicity in an antique subject. It may be seen that I am far from wishing to attenuate the defects of this score, and Mons. Berlioz himself provokes this critical examination by the minute care he has given to all the details of expression. But at the same time what accents! what constant elevation! what respect for truth! what beautiful lyric declamation! And what an admirable orchestration! Alternately brilliant, profound, colored, varied, impetuous, poetical and always sonorous, while remaining sober and discreet! But one must not go to hear Les Troyens with one's ears full of Italian cabalettas and the filling formula of the vaudeville school of the Opera-Comique. . . . Let Mons. Berlioz know this: He shall never taste repose on earth; he belongs to those men of talents destined to struggle gloriously all their life long. His perseverance, his talents, his ideas of the true, the noble and the beautiful, his firm conviction are the qualities which, despite some differences of doctrines and opinions, attached me thirty years ago to Mons. Berlioz's fortunes, and made me, a pure classic, follow him in all the phases of his composer's career; happy, having reached an age when a now long experience brings me back more and more to the study and the love of the old masters, to give to the great victorious artist a new proof of a friendship which honors me and which I have, perhaps, the right to call foreseeing as well as disinterested and devoted.

Fine Arts.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

The Late Collection of Pictures at the Athenæum.

Those who have lingered in London, in the season, must remember the delight of the British Institution in Pall Mall, which from year to year gathers the finest things in England, and England is the richest country in Europe, except Italy, in the old Art. They are the contributions from private collections in London and the neighborhood, and dispersed with the end of the season after three months exhibition. The selection is varied annually. May we not indulge the hope that some similar scheme may be inaugurated here; and if on a scale necessarily of less importance and value, of more need to the artistic culture of New England. Are we to be behind the English in liberality and public spirit? Is our Art education to be entirely neglected when there are means at hand to improve and extend it? We trust not; but let it be said, without fear of contradiction from the discerning, that the knowledge of Art here, and feeling for it, are out of all proportion backward, and behindhand, when compared with the general intellectual advancement and culture of the community, and its relish for the æsthetic in other directions, as in music, gardening, architecture, books and their adornments. The collection just dispersed alas! too quickly, for its adequate effect upon the public taste and feeling, was, no doubt, the rarest and best ever brought together in this city, and perhaps in the country, when we consider the variety of periods and countries; the styles and schools represented—if not in all cases adequately—yet very fairly and pleasingly. With a rapid review, too hasty, glancing and imperfect to be satisfactory, or in any degree appreciative, just, or critical, within the limits of this article, let us, for the present attend, to the teaching one notable picture may afford us; for we cannot hope to particularize the varied excellence that was here assembled. One object, well attended to, and exhausted, is better than many glanced at, and confused, leaving kaleidoscope impressions in the mind, of no value to our education.

Every one must have noticed, as you entered the inner room, the striking portrait, by the door, of Epes Sargent, 1756, by Copley; done in such a strong, and manly, but we venture to think, mistaken manner. In one sense the more real a thing is in Art the worse it is; for reality is not a function of art; and it would be a mistake to suppose that this portrait is in a high, or true style of painting. It affects reality, but flesh and blood, in consequence, look like a casting of steel, slightly tinted. No warm blood would flow and no celestial ichor; no life be extinguished, were he wounded—that steel-cold man: nor could he wink, or fold his hands, for they are rigid as ice. In short, this is a very clever and plausible untruth in art; else was Denner, who was never excelled for reality, a greater painter than Titian.

Looking more carefully, and truthfully at nature, we find flesh has softness, texture of life, transparency; and absorbs light and transmits it; is transfused with glow and luminous quality; humid with perspiration, and surface tenderness, and the indescribable result of organization; a play of light, and subtle change, and palpitation, or livingness, which this hard handling does not render, and any painting can but suggest, and faintly give. We have but a part of nature here, roughly approximated—form—but not the most delicate and exquisite quality. Flesh painting is one of the subtlest things in art and most difficult.

It cannot be too much insisted on, that Art is suggestion and abstraction; that it is not its province to achieve the impossible—reality—which nature has done in an infinite way before her;—nor the semblance of reality. It is a subtle abstraction of qualities, and impressions, which please the artistic sense, and refined imaginings, and feelings of the soul: a record of the impression exterior nature—the objective—makes on the inner nature of man, the artistic sense and soul—the subjective. If reality were the function of Art, its use would cease; for have we not nature about us in sky, and field, and leaf, and flower, and tree, and the human face divine; and cannot we step out any day, or turn round any moment, and behold these. Should we then go to dull paint and canvas for a "counterfeit presentment." Would not Art be a senseless, tame thing, if it were only the transcript of nature, if that were possible, or even a clever illusion. Are we, and our essence, and interior selves something different from nature, or are we material and external, like much of Art as it is, and as far as it goes; or have we souls and feeling, and is it a nicer and nobler point to record their manifestations and moods? No, Art is greater than nature, as Goethe said; and it is of the soul, or higher being—a subjective, and yet an objective thing; like man himself, compounded of two natures, soul and body; founded in truth, but uniting in itself the spiritual as well as the material, of which the universe is composed. It has soul—feeling—in it, or it is nothing worth: To reproduce nature by pigments, and on flat canvas; or in cold, hard marble is impossible. Then is it not what we can do, to fix our fleeting souls, our finest perceptions, insights and feelings in her presence; her inspiration, and the emotion she excites? As perspective and drawing, are not space or matter; but the abstraction, the mind and eye make, to represent them; but they must be true to nature—objectively founded—subjectively done. Moreover, art is the impression of the higher and keener, and instructed, or trained senses, and gifted souls, which get more out of reality than the common faculties and ignorant, can perceive, or are constituted to feel and represent. It is a sad failure, and a perverted strife with nature, when reality is attempted; a false direction, and a low standard and aim, and at once ceases to be high art, which is essentially spiritual, ideal, though derived from and depending upon nature, and founded rigidly on its laws—its higher laws. It must not in its wildest, fancifullest flights and most aspiring creations, overstep this modesty of nature, but possess and exhibit a verisimilitude, without which, it is vain extravagance and personal conceit, tawdry and conventional fiasco.

Some artists are essentially creative; but they must have this verisimilitude. Such was Michael Angelo, who transcended nature; and left in his superhuman conceptions, too vast in significance to be finished, the record of a soul which despised the petty limits of mortality, and leaving the ignorant present behind him, aspired to the function of creator. Curious littleness which can see nothing in him but extravagance and monstrosity, vulgar strength. Such was Shakespeare in Caliban and the Tempest, the witches, the Ghost; and Lear, in his passion, like a god, apostrophizing nature. Such was Rubens, endowing ancient myths with a new life; and Keats, and the painter of that little group of Satyrs in the late exhibition; and such is Beard in his comic drama of the bears. Such in music is Beethoven, who, ever to our feeling and apprehension, is as the recreation of a world after chaos. We recognize the elements; we never knew them so combined. Alchemist, archimage, enchanter, this potent chemist is as Shelly called Byron,

"The Pilgrim of Eternity."

Such is Gustave Doré, in his wonderful interpretations of nature, and the weird and imaginative. Such eminently was Dante.

It is no doubt given to the highest minds to create, but it must be out of nature as we find her, and no false metal. It must be the true material, worked up and touched by the master and creative hand; no theatrical, melodramatic, conventional, academic and extravagant counterfeit. No false sublime, or pedantry, and academy, as in some German work; no material sublime, seeking to achieve the immaterial, by accumulation of parts. The infinite and sublime are to be subtly suggested, felt, and indicated; not delineated, and elaborated, and made out obviously, else are they a caput mortuum.

Ball's Statue of Washington.

[Correspondence of the Round Table]

Boston, December, 1863.

The last great fair held in Boston before the present, was that, I think, four years ago, in aid of the fund to give Ball a commission for a statue of Washington. After conscientious labor, the small equestrian model which was then exhibited has grown into a colossal plaster image, considerably modified in contour and detail, and now nearly completed for the founder. Mr. Ames of the Chicopee Works gives, I believe, no hopes of being able to undertake it, as long as the present war demands so largely of his foundry, and as at least a year and a half must elapse after the plaster is cut up and put into his hands before he can present us with the completed bronze, it is likely to be some years yet before it will find its permanent position.

Mr. Ball intended the work to be just the size of Brown's in Union square, N. Y.; but in working it up to a state of finish, he has exceeded that by a few inches. The horse is a powerful animal, as light in shape as a war horse is allowed to be, and the artist has laboriously fashioned him, working from living models, casts (some of his own making), and photographs. He is reined in to a stand still, and taken before all his feet are fixed to the ground. Washington sits erect, dressed as a general, his eye peering into the distance as if watching some manoeuvre of his troops, the point of his drawn sword fallen upon the wrist of the bridle hand, as if, having pointed out with it a direction to an aid, it had dropped while his attention was riveted, and thus found a resting-place which enabled the artist to give the needful repose a statue should have. The head of Washington is a noble one, and is based upon Houdon's, undoubtedly the most authentic, and in the opinion of the venerable Josiah Quincy, the only one where resemblance has not been made dubious by the idealizing trick of the artist. Mr. Ball has not, however, neglected to study thoroughly the head by Stuart, now in the Boston Athenæum.

The entire effect of the composition, as it now stands in the spotless white of plaster, is very gratifying. The artist has had the advantage of a sufficiently large and lofty room to build it up in, one which he had erected purposely, with proper lights, and a turn-table, which enables him to present every aspect of it to varying light. It has been a pleasure to see the conception come forth under his tools, and these, I may say, are seemingly very rude—not that they are not the very things he wanted, which they doubtless were. The ordinary implements for moulding in clay were, of course, unfit for the material he worked in. There was first a framework of iron bars, following the curves of the legs of the horse, projecting for the neck and head. Then wisps of hay, or some such material, were put in a bulk, till a rude resemblance of the horse was formed. The structure was now ready for the rough splashes of moist plaster, and the shape acquired with using mere pieces of iron hoop for scrapers, or smaller implements of almost as rude construction, of this or the other curve, or varying in the shape of point; or with rough files, looking much like a boy's hat, set thick with screws imbedded to their heads at an angle. Then, when the horse was about completed, I saw it one day with wisps of hay hanging on each flank; these again became the legs of the rider, and upon this rose the body, and finally came the minute care that scratched away, and scratched away, till every detail came out perfect. It is not yet definitely settled by the committee having it in charge where the statue will be placed. There could hardly be a better place for it, however, than the public garden, directly opposite the opening of Commonwealth avenue.

Mr. Ball has now in hand the small model of Forrest as Coriolanus, which some of that actor's friends have ordered. He has already moulded the tragedian's head, and takes the two with him to Italy in the spring, there to set up the model in life-size, and superintend its transmission into marble.

Every time I go into his studio I regret that nothing has been done with the statuette of Allston, which he brought back as one of the fruits of his Italian study when he returned seven or eight years ago. The contemplative artist sits in his loose robe, with some of the insignia of his art beside him, half rapt in look, much as if considering the maxim that comes so forcibly to every true artist's mind, "Life is short and art is long." This model is worthy of being put into permanence. It ought to adorn some spot where a society that he did so much to elevate may have a constant recognition of one so lofty, so pure, so enduring. Mr. Ball knew Allston in the happy artistic relation of almost filial reverence. The great painter was a man that bade a young artist God-speed heartily and yearningly. His good nature could even brook youthful arrogance; but Mr. Ball was not a man to be guilty of what another, notoriously if not worthily, known in art circles was. He took his instruction devotedly, and has lovingly embodied his reverence in his ideal of the man.

Music of the Holidays.

The old year went out and the new year came in full of music. From Christmas Eve to Twelfth Night there has hardly been an evening without its concert; and it is flood-tide still. True, with all these temptations we have missed the syren voice of all, the Symphony; we have had no orchestral concert; and, as we have said before, not all the charms of organ, opera, oratorio, string quartet or piano can fill up the vacuum one feels in the absence of the Orchestra performing in its own right and not as mere accompaniment. But we live in hope. If the effect of this one year's privation might only be to give us twice as large and twice as good an orchestra another year, it would be a small price to pay for it. Meanwhile the heterogeneous multitude of musical performances since our last issue is bewildering to any purpose of a fair and full review. Even to hear all has been impossible; to remember and digest all that has been heard, not less so; and still more is it impossible, within our limits, to speak of all that really left a clear impression. He who can listen to all the music that is made in such a season, must have long ears, and not critical. We will put down here such slight record as we can.

CHRISTMAS ORGAN CONCERTS. First in order came three concerts with the Great Organ, on Wednesday afternoon, Dec. 23, on Christmas Eve, and on the evening of Christmas. These drew fair audiences by varied programmes and a return to the old popular price of fifty cents. The selections on Wednesday were these:

1. Prelude for the Organ.....Sechter.
Followed by the first two "Commandments" from "Mt. Sinai".....Neukomm.
2. Flute Concerto, Adagio Allegretto.....Rink.
3. "Benedictus"—(Mass in G.).....Weber.
4. Organ Fantasia.....S. P. Tuckerman.
Introducing the "Russian Hymn" and "God save the Queen."
1. Sonata in D. (Maestoso, Andante, Fugue Maestoso).....Mendelssohn.
2. Prelude in C Minor.....Hesse.
Followed by "The Dead March in Saul".....Handel.
3. Overture to "Egmont".....Beethoven.

The performers were Dr. S. P. TUCKERMAN and Mr. B. J. LANG. The former gave a good taste of the large and satisfying quality of the full organ in the pieces by Sechter and Neukomm; the first a composition of considerable interest, the second consisting mainly of effects of full plain chords; and we confess when we cannot have a real polyphonic organ composition à la Bach, we like next best to fall back on passages of full plain harmony; for in each chord there are so many voices blended in a great Organ, that the listener is free to imagine all sorts of fascinating fugal complications. The sweet Weber Benedictus he illustrated with appropriate stops very acceptably. His Fantasia on National airs was not much to our taste. In the second part he gave us a respectable specimen of the compositions of the celebrated Breslau organist. Hesse, who died but recently, and renewed ("by request") the sensation once before produced by the pedal thunder in the solemn march from "Saul." Of Mr. LANG's three selections we have spoken before. It was good to hear the Mendelssohn Sonata again, the same which made so fine an impression at the "Inauguration;" it sounded even better this time. Mr. Lang is more and more at home among the stops and couplers, and works them together with fine tact.

On Christmas Eve the first part was played by Mr. THAYER of Worcester, as follows:

1. Christmas Offertorium.....Battiste.
2. Andante from Sixth Sonata.....Mendelssohn.
3. Fugue in G minor.....Bach.
4. Offertoire.....Battiste.
5. Trumpet Chorus from "Samson".....Handel.
6. Marche du Sacre from Le Prophète.....Meyerbeer.

The first Offertoire was jubilant; we liked it better than the second, which had been played at the School Children's Festivals. The Bach Fugue was not the great one in G minor which we have heard before; it was a shorter one and yet a very fine one and finely played. The trumpets sang out lustily in the "Samson" chorus. The Mendelssohn Andante was a good acquisition to our list of real organ music, while the march from the Prophète was nothing of the kind. The young organist won much praise by his execution.

Part II. was by Mr. J. K. PAINE.

1. Christmas Music:—(Selections from the Messiah.)
a. Chorus, "For unto us a child is born." b. Pastoral Symphony. c. "Glory to God" and "Amen" Chorus Handel.
2. Air and Chorus.....Gluck.
3. Toccata in F.....Bach.
4. Vivace from Trio Sonata in G.....Bach.
5. Variations and Fugue on the "Star Spangled Banner".....J. K. Paine.

It did not seem to us that those "Messiah" choruses suited the organ so well as they did the season; yet many passages told very grandly. The adaptation from Gluck, given in the full, round "organ tone" (diapasons, principals, flutes, &c., without reeds and fancy stops), was just of the right quality for simple honest organ music. The magnificent Toccata in F was splendidly played and won loud and warm applause; these are the things whose power is sure to be more and more felt as the ear grows familiar with them; here was progress in the listeners since that opening concert! The quick movement from the Bach Sonata, too, with softer stops, was charming. Mr. Paine's Variations and Fugue have come under notice more than once before; he has earned this credit in his treatment of such popular themes, that what he writes is real composition, polyphonic, having unity and development, in true organ style.

The third of these concerts we were not able to attend, and can only give the programme:

The programme contained for novelties, the Allegro of Concerto No. 1, in G, by Bach, and the "Midsummer Night's Dream" overture, played by Mr. LANG; Exaudi nos, Mozart, Gloria from Haydn's 15th Mass, and Eia mater, Rossini played by Dr. TUCKERMAN.

Messrs. KREISSMANN, LEONHARD and EICHBERG gave their second Soirée at Chickering's on Saturday evening, Dec. 26; and there was such an audience both in numbers and in character, as nothing but the real zest of the preceding soirée could have drawn. There is the certainty of something stimulating to the finer sense in the announcements of these artists. The programme was as choice as it was new, each piece yielding fresh and keen enjoyment.

1. Sixth Sonata for Violin, (Op. 5,) in A major, [1700,] with Piano Accompaniment. A. Corelli.
Grave, Allegro, Toccata, Adagio, Allegro.
2. Aria.....S. Bach.

6. No. 2 and 3, from [Op. 121.] Schumann.

The enjoyment of the Corelli Sonata, however, was chiefly that of curiosity. Interesting for its quaintness, and by comparison with things in like form by his contemporaries Bach and Handel. Of the latter you detect characteristic features in his Italian older brother. Compared with the Suites and Sonatas of Bach and Handel, the movements here are very short and humble flights; but there is an honest heartiness about them; no sickly sentimentality or nonsense; and you see that they knew how to play the violin in those days, and it takes a good artist like Mr. Eichberg to do the old piece justice now. The Toccata is a very slight and momentary freak compared to Bach's Toccatas. The final Allegro we found really interesting.

Thanks, hearty thanks to the singer who has the will, and who has taken the pains to be able, to initiate us at all into the incomparable sacred vocal music by Sebastian Bach! And such a singer is our excellent Kreissmann. The Aria, as he sang it with Mr. Leonhard's fine rendering of the difficult accompaniment, plainly made a deep impression; few liked to let it pass with a single hearing. It is a song of thanksgiving, introduced by a few phrases of that marvellous recitative in which Bach is as much the master of masters as he is in counterpoint; every phrase, every interval, every sustaining chord is fraught with meaning and with feeling, and speaks to the soul. Gluck and Mozart are great in this art,—this expressive, not dry technical art, mind you—but Bach will be acknowledged even greater when he is known as well. The words are: But one of them, when he saw that he was healed, turned round and praised God with a loud voice, &c. Mr. K. gave it in German, with fine voice and accent, with all the nobility of style and feeling of the music. The Aria itself was sung as it should be, and that is ascribing very high and rare qualities to the singer; for a singer has learned more of the truest vocal art in mastering one of these arias, than he could perhaps in the whole repertoire of modern Italian opera. The melody, quite different from the common cut of melodies, and yet none the less melody because it is inseparably intertwined with the parts or voices in the polyphonic accompaniment, is so broadly laid out, moves with such long reaches of rhythm, is so lofty and sustained in style, so closely wedded always to the thought and feeling of the words and to their very sound, so free from the hacknied cadences of modern song, that one must be indeed an artist to deliver it with ease and grace, as well as fervor, so as to make its beauty felt. This Mr. Kreissmann did, and we only hope that he will do it again for us and often. There will be no lack of lovers for such music, let it once become familiar.

The Beethoven Sonata was a new revelation of the same unmistakeable genius, known to us in so many works of his, yet new in every one. There is a rare subtlety and fineness in the musical ideas of this Sonata; so naturally and simply are they treated, each point, each phase in the development, each unexpected, welcome return so felicitous and beautiful, that it seems a purely spontaneous product of imagination. And yet it is full of the most cunning mastery of practised art. We found particularly charming the first movement. What a fascinating little  motive  it sets out with! just a quaint phrase of four notes playfully flung out by the violin, but so strangely novel, so challenging to the best art and fancy of such a composer to work it out into a poetic whole! The Scherzo, again, is in an admirable humor, thoroughly original and charming, and the Finale, beginning with quite a common sounding rondo melody, as is Beethoven's way sometimes, yet proceeding to develop latent possibilities such as no other would have dreamed of! Eichberg and Leonhard played it to a charm. We know not when the former has played with such absence of anything like exaggeration, such chaste purity of style, in addition to his other excellencies.

The Schubert songs were of the best and sung in Mr. Kreissmann's best style and voice. The Scherzo by Chopin had not been heard before in any of our concert rooms; one of the most impassioned and most full of meaning of that pianopoe's purely individual creations; full of difficulties, in the overcoming of which and in interpreting the work as a whole Mr. Leonhard was most happy—at least so far as it depended upon him, for to the hearer, and possibly somewhat to the player, the latter portion was disturbed by the noisy manner in which some thoughtless people, having no music in their souls, bespoke especial attention to the important fact that they were leaving us. The Scherzo must be played again. The two pieces by Schumann were the best movements from a Sonata for violin and piano; very fine and characteristic. They too should be heard again.

CHRISTMAS ORATORIO. The Handel and Haydn Society of course gave us "The Messiah" (Sunday evening.) They always do that, as the year comes round, even if they do nothing more. And it is a good thing to do,—one of those good old conservative customs which has a meaning and beauty in it which the annual recurrences of a life-time cannot exhaust. It is the best thing our old Oratorio society can do at Christmas, until perhaps they shall be able also to bring out on some other evening in the same week the "Christmas Oratorio" (Cantata) of Sebastian Bach. It would be pleasant to compare them. But this time, if they gave us nothing new, they gave us Handel, that great work of his which most speaks to the common heart. They gave it for the first time with the Great Organ, grandly buoying up its massive choruses and filling in behind with its great wealth of harmony. They gave it with unusually full chorus seats, perhaps 350 voices, drilled with unusual pains; with the best orchestra that could here be raised; with good solo singers, with CARL ZERRAHN as conductor, and B. J. LANG as organist. There was an immense audience, at double the old price, so that every seat in the Hall, apparently, was filled.

Of the performance as a whole, it may be fairly said that there was a life and spirit in it which made it easier to overlook many defects. It was not the best achievement of the Society by any means, and it was far from being the worst. So far as the coöperation of the Organ went, it was a success; that made the choruses more ponderous and grand, and withal more brilliant, its hundreds of blended voices in each chord, with all its finely attuned "mixtures" and harmonics, being clearer, truer and more penetrating than the indifferent average of human organs. (To this advantage there was also possibly an offset, of which presently.) Some of the choruses, the great broad popular ones like "Hallelujah," went splendidly. Others, the more fugued, and fragmentary, full of points to be snatched up quickly now by this and now by that set of voices, went badly (such as "He shall break their bonds asunder"). We doubt not this was in a great measure owing to unaccustomedness in singing with the organ, as well as to the new location of the different bodies of the singers which the Organ has made necessary. The conductor stands far out in front of the organ; its tone reaches his ear an instant after the key is pressed down, so that the organist has to anticipate by just that instant. The pipes, according to the quarter where they are housed, arouse and bear off the singer in spite of the conductor's wand. The tenors, for instance, sit right against that side of the organ where all the strong pipes of the "great" organ, trumpets, cornet mixtures and all, leap out aloud. There is general bewilderment; Conductors wonder that the Messrs. Tenors will still keep in advance; all but the most resolute, sure singers drop away for fear of doing mischief, leaving the burthen of the work in a great measure to the Organ. But these are difficulties which time and familiarity will remedy. It seems quite desirable that the Society should sing as often as possible in the new circumstances, till they feel at home in them. The same difficulty, it will be remembered, was once charged to the strangeness of the Music Hall itself, without the organ; time cured that.

There was fault too in the orchestra. They began out of tune, and several times were guilty of "an uncertain sound." But this sin they too might charge with reason on the Organ; it being awkward to adapt their instruments at once to its low pitch (the new French pitch) so effectually as to feel at home in it. Time will bring the remedy for this too.

A few words of the Solo Singers. Miss MARIA BRAINERD, of New York, new to a Boston audience, made, we are sure, a far better impression generally, and that too among quiet, sincere, earnest and not unexact music-lovers, than any one would infer from the newspaper criticisms of the next day. She has some sterling qualifications for an Oratorio singer, if not all, her voice is a clear, pure, true, sweet and powerful soprano, flexible and evenly developed, facile for running passages, as in "Rejoice greatly," and sustaining itself well in "I know that my Redeemer." She seemed to approach her task earnestly and conscientiously, and gave, as we have said, much pleasure. True, she has faults; there was too much of the false kind of portamento, or sliding from tone to tone; too much suggestion otherwise of opera or miscellaneous concert singing, rather than of the chaste and noble Oratorio style. Perhaps we might have found more of this at home; but can we not afford also to honor merit from abroad, such as we find it?

Mrs. CARY's contralto grows more and more rich and musical; her first air sounded to us a little dry and timid; but "He was despised" and the others made a deep impression: for there was feeling, style and finish in the rendering. Mr. WHEELER really deserves to have more power of voice, the quality of tone, the method, style, conception, spirit and expression are so good. He is an intelligent and conscientious artist. Nor is his power of voice by any means painfully inadequate even for the Music Hall. Such as it is, we had far rather have it with his style, than thrice as great without it. It is but fair to say that he did well with "Thou shalt dash them."

Mr. J. R. THOMAS, of New York, pleasantly remembered here, has remarkably even and clear execution in the bass songs, but the voice seemed rather dry and sympathetic,—perhaps owing to a cold.

NEW YEAR'S ORGAN CONCERTS, three of them, by Mr. MORGAN, ought to be mentioned next; but our space is gone, and all but mere mention must be postponed. They were highly successful. In two of them he had the aid of singers:—Mrs. KEMPTON, from New York, who comes back to us signally improved, a most satisfactory contralto; Miss HOUSTON, who won new honors, and Miss BRAINERD, to whose excellence in concert singing no one, we believe, took exception.

SACRED ORGAN CONCERT. Last Sunday evening Mr. PAINE and Dr. TUCKERMAN, with the aid of Mrs. KEMPTON and Miss HOUSTON, performed a very rich programme, only much too long, to the largest audience since the opening, and most patient and pleased listeners. But this too must lie over.

Mr. PARKER's Vocal Club sang Mendelssohn's "Athalie" and other choice selections to the delight of Chickering's Hall full of their friends last Monday evening. We hear it will be repeated, when we hope to have more room to speak of it.

ITALIAN OPERA. Max Maretzek, with his famous troupe, nearly all of them to us new singers, made a brilliant opening at the Boston Theatre on Monday evening in Petrella's "Ione." We have only room to say that "Ione" has at least the one great merit of being well constructed for dramatic effect, and that the singers made the most of it. Trace of originality or spark of genius in the music we could not detect. Hacknied Norma sounded new and noble after it. The singers were all distinguished by the dramatic quality—we hardly dare to say the finest kind of that quality, which is often most dramatic when it is most quiet—but by the demonstrative, strong, "effective" kind. They were mostly large, muscular, energetic persons, with large, powerful voices, and entered into their work with great abandon, sang and acted with all their might. This quality in the robust tenor, Sig. MAZZOLENI, a man of noble figure and bearing, was so in contrast with sweet-toned Brignoli's indifference, that he made one large class of the audience crazy with delight and commended himself not slightly to the rest. His voice has not a very pleasant quality, sounds forced and is afflicted with the tremolo (so were all their voices more or less, except the admirable baritone BELLINI, a true artist both as singer and actor); but he has large compass, good execution, sustained power on high notes, and is never wanting in the intensely dramatic. We heard him the next night in the first act of Norma, and are not sure that we ever heard that ungrateful scene of Pollione given better.

Mme. MEDORI for a prima donna has qualities to match. A large, richly developed soprano, fine execution, earnest fidelity to dramatic requirements, good declamation, no lack of tenderness sometimes, but best in the climaxes of passion. "Casta Diva" she sang too dramatically for our taste, but there were splendid points. Mlle. SULZER is a fresher, but a less finished and more timid singer, with a telling contralto, only slightly tremulous as yet, and won much favor. Signor BIACHI, although tremulous, is a noble basso. As we said, they all act well. The chorus is much larger and better than we ever had in opera; the orchestra uncommonly efficient, and the conductor, Sig. NUNO, a very able one.

These are mere first impressions. Why be in a hurry to find singers great and to ascribe to them the rare gift of genius?

The Concert of the Quintette Club, the Organ Concert of the three brothers CARTER from Canada, divers Operas, &c., came too late for notice this week.

This evening Messrs. KREISSMANN, LEONHARD and EICHBERG give their third Soirée, with a splendid programme, as usual.

Music Abroad.

London.

The December musical journals describe the great organ recently placed in Doncaster Cathedral, by Schulze, regarded as a first-class sample of German organ-building, and containing nominally 94 stops, but really not so many, and not so great an instrument as that by Walcker, in our Music Hall.

The musical lectures of the new "Gresham Professor" are reported in full; the introductory will be found in another column.

The first Great Choral Meeting of the 1600 members of the London Division of the "Handel Festival Choir" had rehearsed "Jephtha" in Exeter Hall, Costa directing.

The "Monday Popular Concerts," at St. James's Hall, count up to No. 138, and they have only been established three or four years. Certainly a flourishing institution, and a most successful attempt to furnish classical music, rendered by first-class artists, to the people, at low prices. In the last concert, young Lotto, the Bohemian violinist, till lately only known in the virtuoso, Paganini sort of music, has here been taking the lead in the first Quintet and the Septet of Beethoven.—Quartets of Beethoven and Haydn, and has played with Arabella Goddard a couple of Sonatas by Dussek. The famous lady pianist has also played a Solo Sonata by Mendelssohn, (his only composition of the kind), Weber's Sonata with clarinet (Lazarus) in E flat, Woelff's Ne plus ultra Sonata, and in Hummel's Septet. Schubert's B flat Sonata, No. 6, had the masterly interpretation of Charles Halle, who also played Mendelssohn's Second Trio with Lotto and Paque. Mr. Benedict conducted; other instrumental artists, a rich list, took part in the concerted pieces; and vocalists (Santley, Wilbye Cooper, Miss Emily Spiller, Renwick, Mme. Rudersdorf, Sims Reeves) sang selections from Benedict's Richard Cœur de Lion, from Handel's old opera Esio, songs by Bennett, Glinka, the Russian, Spohr, Henry Smart, Ardit, Gounod, &c.; Reeves sang Handel's "Deeper and deeper still," Mme. Rudersdorf Schubert's grand sacred song "Die Allmacht."

The "National Choral Society," under the direction of Mr. G. W. Martin, has opened its winter season in Exeter Hall with Handel's Judas Macabæus; Mr. W. H. Cummings acquitting himself creditably in Sims Reeves's great tenor part, and Mlle. Parepa, Miss Palmer (the delightful contralto) and Mr. Santley ditto in the other parts. Mr. Martin, it seems, has taken a large body of fresh young voices, and has "done wonders in raising them in a short time from charity hymns and part-songs to oratorios."

English Opera is still experimented with and still discussed as warmly as ever, Musical World and Athenæum being agreed for once, at least on the subject of a primo tenore; the latter says of the last new opera by Balfe:

"Two adjectives will characterize Mr. Balfe's share in 'Blanche de Nevers' ('The Duke's Motto'). The music is weak and wearisome, and, like that of 'The Desert Flower,' has not a point (so far as we followed it) that dwells in remembrance. Mr. Balfe would seem to have taken leave of such freshness of melody as he possessed, some four years ago—otherwise in 'Satanella.' He writes now, moreover, with a negligence for the orchestra betokening a disregard of reputation not pleasant to meet. In brief, we can imagine any number of pages thus covered, with a solitary effort of fantasy, still less exercise of science. This, then, is a specimen of opera at a low ebb—scene succeeding to scene, ballad to ballad, some of them pretty in their own artificial way, but none having the slightest permanent value. What matter? A new Rossini could not be better received than Mr. Balfe has been throughout his long and prolific career. There is small chance now of his giving an earnest thought, and as little, it may be feared, any more gracious melody. In part, this habit of slack composition has been, doubtless, engendered by the circumstances under which it has been exercised. The Covent Garden composers might be called on to write by receipt; and this receipt, it is needless to add, enjoins peculiarities more marked than winning when the 'lion's share' of the music is to fall to the lot of a tenor, who is also manager, and, lastly, is Mr. Harrison. It is time plainly to say, that no great opera can be sung, that no good opera can be written, when this star is in the ascendant. His voice, never pleasant, now requires management from note to note, is as often false as true, and has often three or four different qualities in its register. These faults cannot be carried off even by acting as careful and well-intentioned (if frequently over-conscious) as his, nor by an articulation meritoriously distinct, which has always placed him apart from most of his comrades. There can be no good opera written in which this gentleman has to be measured for the principal serious and sentimental tenor part. We would gladly have been spared the necessity of saying this; but season goes after season, and opera by receipt after opera by receipt: in England's present musical plight, we ought to have some better theatrical story to tell. Let us add, as a matter of justice, that Mr. Harrison acts adroitly in this difficult double part."

New operas by Mr. Harry Leslie and by Mr. Benedict are said to be in preparation; and Punch says:

We are happy to be able to state that the prospects of English Opera are as brilliant as ever, and that a series of new works is in course of preparation. Mr. Wallace is engaged upon a libretto founded on the Ticket of Leave Man; to be followed by a new opera by Mr. Balfe, founded on Leah; to be followed by a new opera by Mr. Wallace, founded on Miriam's Crime; to be followed by a new opera by Mr. Balfe, founded on Bel Demonio; to be followed by a new opera by Mr. Wallace, founded on Manfred; to be followed by a new opera by Mr. Balfe, founded on The Ghost; to be followed by a new opera by Mr. Wallace, founded on Cool as a Cucumber; to be followed by a new opera by Mr. Balfe, founded on the Irish Tiger. Other new works by the same eminent composers, and based on subjects judiciously selected from the current playbills, are talked of, and it is truly gratifying to look backwards and forwards and watch the progress of English musical art.

Jullien (the younger), like his great exemplar, keeps up great "monster" promenade concerts, at Her Majesty's Theatre, frequently giving a "Mendelssohn night," a "Beethoven night," &c. Camillo Sivori's violin has turned up in these concerts. Vieuxtemps has concluded his tour in England, with Carlotta Patti, and gone to Paris, soon to return and lead in the "Monday Populars."

Winter Concerts, under Mr. Manns, are given in the Crystal Palace. At the fifth, they had Mozart's Symphony in B flat, No. 11; Beethoven's E flat Concerto with Miss Agnes Zimmermann for pianist, who also played pieces by Taubert and Paner; and Mendelssohn's Hebriden overture. Strange to say, an Italian singer, Signor Marchesi, sang a recitative and air from Sebastian Bach's Cantata: Der Zufrieden-gestellte Æolus, "with good voice and still better feeling." Also Miss Parepa sang: "What shall I sing?" (Benedict) "Daughter of Denmark," (Brinley Richards), &c. Madame Arabella Goddard was engaged for the next time.

LEIPZIG.—At the 7th Subscription Concert in the Gewandhaus, a new Symphony in A, by Judasohn, was performed. Dr. Gunz, from the Royal Opera, Hanover, sang Boieldieu's air: "Komm, o holde Dame," from La Dame Blanche; "Gott, welch ein Dunkel hier," from Fiddio; Schubert's "Frühlingstraum," and Wüllner's: "Nicht mit Engeln;" adding, in obedience to the general desire of the audience, Schubert's "Horch, horch, die Lerch;" Spohr's E minor concerto; Vieuxtemps's "Rêverie," and Paganini's "Perpetuum mobile" were played by Harr Auer, who met with a very gratifying reception on this, his first appearance at these concerts. Beethoven's Leonore overture, No. 3, was performed in a masterly manner by the orchestra. A selection of chamber music was given at the third concert of the Euterpe Association, the principal artists being Herr Ehrlich, and Herren D. Ahna, and Espenhahn, from Berlin. The concert began with Herren A. Rubinstein's B flat major trio (Op. 52.) This was followed by Beethoven's Romance, in G major, for violin, Bach's "Toccata" in D minor, and Mendelssohn's Variations in D major, for violin and piano-forte.—The programme of the eighth Gewandhaus Concert included symphony in G minor, Mozart; "Ner Sturon," for chorus and orchestra, J. Haydn; Concerto, in G major, for the pianoforte, Beethoven (played by Mad. Clara Schumann); overture to Genesefu, R. Schumann; "Variations sérieuses" for the pianoforte. Mendelssohn (played by Mad. Clara Schumann); and the Thirteenth Psalm for chorus and orchestra, Woldemar Bargiel (first time of performance, the composer conducting).

Oh, weep no more for brave boys gone. Salem. 25

A good war song. Add it to your collection. These emanations from the patriotic spirit of the times, will be very valuable in the coming days, when we shall all be considered heroes, and this, the heroic age.

Mother, oh sing me to rest. B. Covert. 25

Words by Mrs. Hamans, and fitted to one of Covert's rich, expressive melodies.

O Lord, remember me. Shout song of the freed-men of Port Royal. 25

Down in the lonesome valley. " " 25

Two contraband hymns, so queer that one can hardly help laughing, so earnest in their spirit that one cannot laugh, and so musical, that one cannot help liking them. They have extra verses, for those who would prefer their melodies without the grotesque words.

Instrumental Music.

Le Prophete. Rondeau. 4 hands. D. Krug. 60

The splendid march from the Prophet, which is a difficult thing to play smoothly as a solo, is here arranged in a form not difficult, but very effective. It is one of those things that roll off grandly at a semi-annual exhibition, and would sound well with a double set of performers, on two pianos.

Up sailors, the anchor rises. Field flowers. No. 2. Oester. 25

In the wheat fields of Germany, the passer by is often pleased with the modest blue or red flowers which rear their heads amid the ripening grain. Oester's pieces are of that character, short, simple and unpretending, but pleasing and useful to learners and players not advanced.

Lusitanian grand constitutional march. Dos Santos. 25

A grand march with a Spanish flavor.

Monumental city galop. Garrett 25

True love. Polka mazurka. Faust. 25

Hurricane galop. Oester. 50

Snowbells. Spring carol. Oester. 50

One has but to read the name of the composer, to be sure of good pieces.

Books.

The libretto of Iona, containing English and Italian words, and the music of the principal melodies. 25

Iona is certain to be a favorite opera, and amateurs and musicians should forthwith make themselves acquainted with it. With one of these librettos, those who cannot attend performances soon understand the drift of the opera, and can enjoy the most taking melodies. The book is just finished, and contains a careful English translation.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

"Adsum."

DECEMBER 23-4, 1863.

"And just as the last bell struck, a peculiar, sweet smile shone over his face, and he lifted up his head a little and quickly said, 'Adsum!' and fell back."—The Newcomes.

I.

The Angel came by night—
Such angels still come down—
And like a winter cloud Passed over London town;
Along its loomsome streets,
Where Want had ceased to weep,
Until it reached a house
Where a great man lay asleep;
The man of all his time
Who knew the most of men;
The soundest head and heart,
The sharpest, kindest pen.
It paused beside his bed,
And whispered in his ear:
He never turned his head.
But answered, "I am here."

II.

Into the night they went.
At morning, side by side,
They gained the sacred Place
Where the greatest Dead abide;
Where grand old Homer sits
In godlike state benign;
Where broods in endless thought
The awful Florentine;
Where sweet Cervantes walks,
A smile on his grave face;
Where Goethe's quaint Montaigne,
The wisest of his race;
Where Goethe looks through all
With that calm eye of his;
Where—little seen but Light—
The only Shakespeare is!
When the new Spirit came,
They asked him, drawing near,
"Art thou become like us?"
He answered, "I am here."

The End of the Play.

The play is done; the curtain drops,
Slow falling to the prompter's bell:
A moment yet the actor stops,
And looks around, to say Farewell!
It is an irksome work and task;
And, when he's laughed and said his say,
He shows, as he removes the mask,
A face that's any thing but gay....

Who knows the inscrutable design?
Blessed be He who took and gave!
Why should your Mother, Charles, not mine,
Be weeping at her darling's grave?
We bow to Heaven, that willed it so,
That darkly rules the fate of all,
That sends the respite or the blow,
That's free to give or to recall....

So each shall mourn, in life's advance,
Dear hopes, dear friends, untimely killed;
Shall grieve for many a forfeit chance,
And longing passion unfulfilled.
Amen! whatever fate be sent,
Pray God the heart may kindly glow,
Although the head with cares be bent,
And whitened with the winter snow.

Come wealth or want, come good or ill,
Let young and old accept their part,
And bow before the Awful Will,
And bear it with an honest heart.
Who misses, or who wins the prize?

Go, lose or conquer as you can:
But if you fall, or if you rise,
Be each, pray God, a gentleman.

Opera in the Family Hapsburg.

Joseph I. had a short reign of six years, but a busy one, for it was the time of Prince Eugene of Savoy, and John Churchill, Duke of Marlborough, and of musical and dramatic doings at court (the reader may be glad to know) I find no record. Joseph's only son died in infancy, and thus his brother Carl became his successor.

The young king, born in 1685 (Oct. 1), a few months only after Handel and Bach, was in Spain carrying on the war with Philip V. for the throne of that country, when the news of his brother's death (April 17, 1711) reached him. He hastened to Vienna, assumed the various crowns which were hereditary in the family of the Hapsburgs, to which he added, by election, that of the German Empire in October, and that of the Kingdom of Hungary in the next May.

1711. Not an uninteresting point of time for us, though not particularly so in our own land. There have been great political changes in the colonies, most of which have now royal Governors, and many have been consolidated—for instance, his Excellency, Joseph Dudley, appointed Governor by King William in 1702, rules from the capital, Boston, Maine, New Hampshire, Massachusetts Bay, and Plymouth colonies, and a part of Vermont, if there is anything up in the Green Mountains to be governed. The Governor of New York, General Hunter, has jurisdiction also over both East and West Jersey, and Charles Gookin, Deputy of the English proprietors, rules both Pennsylvania and Delaware. In New England, two little boys are just learning to read, who are to have no small share in putting an end to this appointing of Governors in these Colonies; one of them, five years old, is the son of Mr. Franklin, soapboiler in Milk street, Boston; the other, Stephen, son of a Mr. Hopkins, in Providence, R. I., if my memory does not deceive me.

But if we look 'home'—as our forefathers in those days called England—we shall see much to interest us, just at this date. The Rev. Jonathan Swift, editor of that political sheet the "Examiner," is just giving to the public his "Proposal for correcting and improving the English Language," stolen bodily almost from De Foe's "Essay on Projects," a man whom the Reverend gentleman hates but plunders; young Mr. Pope is just bringing out his "Essay on Criticism;" and (my favorite Essayist) Steele has closed his Tatler and, with Addison—who has come back from Ireland—is producing the daily numbers of the Spectator. De Foe, a greater man than either, "unabashed De Foe," ready to sacrifice every thing, life itself if need be, for the right, the strongest, noblest specimen of moral power of that day—without the qualities or the desires, which could enable him to be counted among the "wits" of Queen Anne's reign or to flourish at the coffee houses—is enjoying once more a gleam of sunshine, for the Sacheverell trial last season has made Harley again minister, and Harley has taken the Editor of the Review—the fearless, not earless, as Pope unjustly called him—to kiss her Majesty's hand. And De Foe, with a strength of conviction, and power of common sense amounting to genius, is battling for the principles of the Revolution. Eight years are still to pass before, giving up politics, he is to produce the most original, delightful, popular and immortal work—Robinson Crusoe—which the world has seen since Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress."

Handel's first opera written for England, "Rinaldo," is having its wonderful success, and Addison, whose "Rosamund" has not proved a successful match against the Italian opera, is, in the Spectator, ridiculing Rossi for calling (in the Preface to Rinaldo) 'Mynheer Hendel the Orpheus of his age,' and is making merry over the flight of sparrows introduced into Armida's garden in the same opera.

Carl VI., born Oct. 1, 1685—had just completed his 26th year when crowned Emperor (Oct 12.) He had all his father's passion for music, though not his fecundity in composition. I find no records of operatic music written by him; but he appears to have produced a pretty large quantity for the harpsichord and of vocal pieces in other forms, especially canons. A Miserere for four voices with figured bass, composed near the close of his life, is among his autographs. Like his father, he assembled distinguished musicians at his Court, examined the candidates for the office of Chapelmaster, and the scores of operas presented for performance; and sometimes at private productions in the summer theatre of the Favorita Palace, in the Augarten, he played the harpsichord from the full score. His master in counterpoint was the famed Johann Joseph Fux, whose "Gradus ad Parnassum" he caused to be printed in a splendid folio volume, dated 1725.

In free composition he was pupil of Caldara, who from 1716 to 1736, twenty years, produced fifty-two operas for the Court theatre.

Carl's ear for music was celebrated; no fault escaped him; but a composition which satisfied him could arouse him to enthusiasm. B-r's reading of the old anecdote of the Emperor and Fux seems the most probable; namely, at the third performance of the Opera "Elisa," (text Parlati, music Fux)—first given in the Favorita theatre, Aug. 28, 1719, on the birthday festival of Empress Elizabeth, Carl was so delighted with the music as to seat himself at the harpsichord and accompany the entire performance. Fux, deprived of his proper office, stood by and turned over the leaves, and at the close exclaimed "Bravissimo! Your Majesty might very well take my office."—"I thank you, my dear Chapelmaster, for your good opinion," answered the Emperor," but I am very well satisfied with my own."

It is well known, continues B—r, what a good influence Carl's advice exerted upon Farinelli [the castrato, of whom the Englishwoman said, "One God, one Farinelli"]. That famous singer was three times in Vienna;—in 1724 (with Porpora), in 1728 and 1731. On one occasion, when the Emperor was accompanying him, he remarked how much his vocalism would gain if he would less frequently overload his melodies with such long-breathed ornaments. This advice was followed by Farinelli, and from this time dated the marvellous depth of expression of his adagios.

There were during Carl's reign four regular family festivals: the Emperor's birthday, October 1; his nameday, Nov. 4; the Empress's birthday August 28, and her nameday Nov. 19.

For Nov. 4, the Empress provided an opera in the great theatre, and for August 28, the Emperor one for the summer theatre in the Favorita. These were but occasional works and, though produced with great splendor, were performed but two or three times each. The mounting of one of these operas cost from $25,000 to $30,000. The costumes were of velvet and silk richly embroidered with gold and silver, the very members of the Orchestra appeared in splendid dresses, and neither the opera in Paris nor in London could at that time, in the matter of the vocal and instrumental music, the costumes and decorations stand any comparison with the imperial court theatre of Vienna. [I am not ready to admit this statement in one particular—namely as to the vocal music of the London opera, say from 1720 to 1735, for Handel was the composer of a very large proportion of the operas given, and the greatest vocalists then living were at various times engaged. In other respects, yes.]

The annual expense of Carl's opera was in round numbers $100,000—of which 43,000 florins was for the "Chapel" or musical establishment, which was thus made up:

- 1 Court chapelmaster, J. J. Fux.
- 1 Vice chapelmaster, Antonio Caldara.
- 3 Composers, Badia, Francesco Conti and Porcile.
- 2 Composers for ballet, Matheis and Holzbauer.
- 3 Italian court poets, Stampiglia, Zeno and Pariati, afterwards Pasquini and Metastasio.
- 1 German court poet, Prokoff.
- 34 men singers.
- 8 women singers.
- 1 Concert master and his assistant.
- 32 players of string instruments, 2 theorbos, 1 viol di gamba, 1 lute, 5 oboes, 5 bassoons, 4 trombones, 1 horn, 13 trumpets, 1 drum.

There were also two ballet masters.

Prince Pio was general operatic director, and the whole was under the charge of the Obersthofmeisteramte—which four words in one I take to be the equivalent of Lordhighchamberlain's office, the longer word by six letters. In the "Court-kitchen-department" was a special "musicians' butler" with two assistants. Of all retainers of the court, the musicians alone, when enfeebled and superannuated, still retained their offices and drew a salary.

Carl VI.'s regard for Fux is well known to all who are familiar with musical history. B—r gives a pleasant proof of it. In 1723, in August, the court was in Prague, and the celebration of the Empress's birthday (on the 28th), took place in a temporary theatre put up for the occasion, a sort of amphitheatre without roof. The opera was "Costanza e fierezza," a festive piece by Pariati, with opera music by Fux, and ballet music by Matheis, written for a chorus of 200 voices and an orchestra of 100. As the day drew near, Fux was taken ill, and had to make the journey to Prague in a litter. At the performance, the Emperor caused Fux to sit next himself in an easy chair as spectator, while Caldara had the direction.

But let Gerber tell these stories of Fux in his way:

Fux (Johann Joseph), imperial chief Chapelmaster in Vienna, born in Styria about 1660, filled this distinguished and honorable post some 40 years, under the Emperors Leopold, Joseph, and Carl VI., all of them as thoroughly taught in music as a prince ever can be. The regard of this last-named Emperor for his old chapelmaster went so far, that, in 1723, being afflicted with gout, Carl had him transported from Vienna to Prague in a litter, where the old man had the pleasure to hear, sitting near the Emperor, his opera performed by 100 singers and 200 instrumentists.

He took another method of showing his appreciation of Fux's talent the next year; for on occasion of the birth of an archduchess [Maria Amelia, Apr. 5, 1724] Fux produced an opera which pleased the Emperor so highly, that upon the third performance, he made a lottery for the benefit of all who sang or played in it, with jewels, gold watches, snuff-boxes, &c., for prizes. All the tickets drew prizes, the least of which was of 500 florins value, the highest going up to 1000. 1500 and even 2000 fl. The eldest archduchess, [the afterwards famous Empress Maria Theresa, then about seven years old, born May 15, 1717] sang in the piece on the stage, and the Emperor himself directed the entire performance at the harpsichord. As he entered the orchestra, the score of the opera, most splendidly bound, was presented to him in the name of the Empress, upon which the Emperor, after bowing to her, placed himself at the instrument and gave the signal to begin. It was on this occasion that Fux, who stood behind the Emperor, after noting many proofs of Carl's skill in the most difficult passages and many a bravo! at last exclaimed, "Oh, it is a pity that your Majesty has not become a virtuoso." Whereupon the Emperor turned to him with the remark, "No matter, I have it better as it is." [Neues Lexicon, article "Fux."]
